

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1832.

At 12 o'clock, the Senate was called to order by the Secretary, Mr. LOWRIE, (the VICE PRESIDENT being absent, and the President pro tempore, Mr. TAZE-WELL, having resigned his seat in the Senate,) and thirty-two members appearing in their seats, and there being a quorum, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to proceed to the election of President pro tempore, which was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER said he understood it was the intention of some of his friends to bestow their suffrages on him for President pro tempore. He desired to state, in advance, that his duties as Senator of the people of Mississippi would require his particular attention on the floor of the Senate. It would, therefore, be extremely inconvenient for him to discharge the duties of the Chair, and he requested that the kind partiality of his friends should be waived on this occasion, and that they would make choice of some other Senator, as presiding officer.

The Senate then proceeded to ballot for President pro tempore as follows.

FIRST BALLOT.

Mr. WHITE,	-	-	-	14
FOOT,	-	-	-	8
TYLER,	-	-	-	3
SMITH,	-	-	-	3
BELL,	-	-	-	2
KING,	-	-	-	2

There being no choice, the Senate proceeded to a second ballot, which resulted as follows:

Mr. WHITE,	-	-	-	15
TYLER,	-	-	-	9
SMITH,	-	-	-	4
BELL,	-	-	-	1

There still being no choice, the Senate proceeded to ballot the third time, which resulted as follows:

Mr. WHITE,	-	-	-	16
TYLER,	-	-	-	12
FOOT,	-	-	-	1

A fourth ballot was then had with the following result:

Mr. WHITE,	-	-	-	15
SMITH,	-	-	-	2

The Senate proceeded to a fifth ballot, which resulted as follows:

Mr. WHITE,	-	-	-	17
SMITH,	-	-	-	1

The Hon. HUGH L. WHITE, of Tennessee, having received a majority of all the votes, was declared duly elected PRESIDENT of the Senate, pro tempore, and being conducted to the chair by Mr. TYLER, of Virginia, returned his acknowledgments to the Senate, as follows:

"To the members of the Senate, I tender my sincere acknowledgments for the distinguished honor conferred by their vote,

SENATE.]

Vetoed Bill.—Standing Committee.

[DECEMBER 10, 1832.]

"No person, who has been so long a member of this body, could have been selected, who has made the rules of its proceedings less an object of his study. This circumstance will make my errors more numerous than might be anticipated, and will throw me oftener on the kind indulgence of the Senate.

"Whatever my errors may be, I have the consolation of knowing that they can be revised and corrected at the instance of any member; and I beg every one to believe, that so far from feeling hurt at the correctness of my decisions being questioned, it will be matter of gratification, that the sense of the Senate may be taken, in every instance, when it may be supposed I am mistaken.

"Whatever industry and attention can do towards removing defects in qualifications, I promise shall be done; and I shall take the chair, determined that, in anxious desire to do that which is just towards every member, and that which will most promote the correct discharge of the important business we may have to perform, I will not be exceeded by any who have preceded me."

On motion, it was ordered that messages communicating the election of Mr. WHITE as President pro tempore, be sent to the House of Representatives, and to the President of the United States.

Messrs. GRUNDY and FRELINGHUYSEN were appointed on the joint committee, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him of the readiness of the two Houses to receive from him any communication; and After the usual resolutions respecting the supply of newspapers, &c. the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 4.

The sitting to-day was occupied in receiving and reading the President's Message, [for which see Appendix] of which 5000 copies were ordered to be printed.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 5.

No business of importance was transacted to-day—the Senate remaining in session only a few minutes.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 6.

The President laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, containing the Treasury report of the state of the finances, for the year 1832; which was ordered to be printed.

VETOED BILL.

The following message was received from the President of the United States:

WASHINGTON, DECEMBER 6, 1832.

To the Senate of the United States:

I avail myself of this early opportunity to return to the Senate, in which it originated, the bill entitled "An act providing for the final settlement of the claims of States for interest on advances to the United States, made during the last war," with the reasons which induced me to withhold my approbation, in consequence of which it has failed to become a law.

This bill was presented to me for my signature on the last day of your session, and when I was compelled to consider a variety of other bills of greater urgency to the public service. It obviously embraced a principle in the allowance of interest different from that which had been sanctioned by the practice of the accounting officers, or by the previous legislation of Congress, in regard to advances by the States, and without any apparent grounds for the change.

Previously to giving my sanction to so great an extension of the practice of allowing interest upon accounts with the Government, and which, in its consequences, and from analogy, might not only call for large payments from the Treasury, but disturb the great mass of individual accounts long since finally settled, I deemed it my duty to make a more thorough investigation of the subject than it was possible for me to do previously to the close of your last session. I adopted this course the more readily, from the consideration that as the bill contained no appropriation, the States which would have been entitled to claim its benefits could not have received them without the fuller legislation of Congress.

The principle which this bill authorizes, varies not only from the practice uniformly adopted by many of the accounting officers in the case of individual accounts, and in those of the States finally settled and closed previously to your last session, but also from that pursued under the act of your last session for the adjustment and settlement of the claims of the State of South Carolina. This last act prescribed no particular mode for the allowance of interest, which, therefore, in conformity with the directions of Congress in previous cases, and with the uniform practice of the Auditor by whom the account was settled, was computed on the sums expended by the State of South Carolina for the use and benefit of the United States, and which had been repaid to the State, and the payments made by the United States were deducted from the principal sums, exclusive of the interest; thereby stopping future interest on so much of the principal as had been reimbursed by the payment.

I deem it proper, moreover, to observe, that both under the act of the 5th of August, 1790, and that of the 12th of February, 1793, authorizing the settlement of the accounts between the United States and the individual States, arising out of the war of the Revolution, the interest on these accounts was computed in conformity with the practice already adverted to, and from which the bill now returned is a departure.

With these reasons and considerations, I return the bill to the Senate.

ANDREW JACKSON.

December 6, 1832.

The Message was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed. Adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 10.

The PRESIDENT announced to the Senate the appointment of the following standing committees for the session:

ON THE JUDICIARY—Messrs. Wilkins, Webster, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, and Mangum.

ON THE POST OFFICE AND POST ROADS—Messrs. Grundy, Hill, Ewing, Tomlinson, and Buckner.

ON ROADS AND CANALS—Messrs. Hendricks, Sprague, Dallas, Hill, and Buckner.

ON PENSIONS—Messrs. Foot, Chambers, Dickerson, Sprague, and Poindexter.

ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—Messrs. Chambers, Tyler, Holmes, Clayton, and Miller.

ON THE CONTINGENT FUND—Messrs. Knight, Dudley, and Tomlinson.

ON ENOBBED BILLS—Messrs. Robbins, Robinson, and Ewing.

After distributing the various subjects of the President's Message to the appropriate committees, and disposing of some minor business, adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 11.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. CLAY rose and said, it would be recollected that during the last session a bill had passed the Senate, which originated in the Committee on Manufactures, to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds arising from the sales of public lands. At a very late period of the session this bill was sent to the other House; and owing, probably, to that circumstance, and probably to some other causes, the bill had not been definitively acted on by that House. Rather, he would say, there had been no express decision of the House for or against the bill. It was indefinitely postponed. He was desirous of again obtaining the sense of the Senate on this question, and should it be in accordance with the vote of the last session, to afford the other House the opportunity of a more full examination and discussion of the bill.

He therefore gave notice that he would, to-morrow, ask leave to introduce a bill to appropriate for a limited time the proceeds of the Public Lands.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. WILKINS, pursuant to notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to provide for the satisfaction of claims due to certain American citizens for spoiliations committed by France on their commerce, prior to the 30th September, 1800.

The bill was then read twice, and on motion of Mr. WILKINS, ordered to be referred to a select committee of five members.

Mr. WILKINS said that previous to the balloting for the committee, he wished to remark that, as it was probable the usual courtesy of the Senate in appointing the mover to be on the committee, might be extended to him in this case, he wished it to be understood that he did not desire to be on the committee. He would rather that, in his room, some gentleman might be appointed who was more conversant with commercial business. He desired, however, that it might be understood that he had in no way changed his original opinions on the subject of these claims.

The PRESIDENT replied that he believed it was the duty of the Chair to appoint the committee.

Mr. WILKINS. Then I wish the Chair to consider my remarks as addressed to himself.

Mr. SMITH. I do not think it very proper to appoint commercial gentlemen on this committee. They might be interested in the result.

The conversation here ceased.

[The following members were appointed by the Chair to compose the committee: Messrs. WEBSTER, CHAMBERS, DUDLEY, BROWN, TYLER.]

ELECTION OF CHAPLAIN.

The Senate then proceeded to the election of a Chaplain; and on the fourth balloting the following was the result:

For the Rev. Mr. PISE,	22
Rev. Mr. RUSSELL,	12
Rev. Mr. HATCH,	4

So that the Rev. Mr. PISE was declared to be elected. [He received nineteen votes on the first ballot.]

After the consideration of Executive business, Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 12.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. CLAY, agreeably to notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in the United States and for granting lands to certain States.

The bill having been read twice, and being before the Senate, as in Committee of the whole.

Mr. CLAY said that this bill had been before two committees of the Senate, and that it had been passed at the last session by a considerable majority. He thought, therefore, that there would be no necessity for its reference to any committee at this session. The bill was precisely the same as the one which had passed the Senate last year, with the exception of the necessary change in the time when the bill would take effect. If, however, it was the wish of any Senator that the bill should be referred he had no objection. He would prefer to have the bill made the order for some convenient but not very distant day, when it might be taken up and discussed. If agreeable to the Senate, he would say the fourth Monday in this month, or the first Monday in January. He did not see that it was necessary to send the bill to a committee, but if any gentleman wished that course to be taken, he repeated, he should not object to it.

Mr. KANE said that it would be recollected that this subject had recently been referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, by the reference to that committee of so much of the President's message as relates to the public lands. An important proposition, indeed a new one, had come from the Executive on the subject of the public lands generally. That proposition was now before the committee; and he hoped that the gentlemen from Kentucky would consent to a reference of his bill to the same committee. Mr. K. concluded by moving this reference.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

INTEREST TO STATES.

Mr. CHAMBERS asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill providing for the final settlements of the claims of States for interest on advances made to the U. States during the late war.

The bill was read, and ordered to a second reading.

After notices for various bills, and receiving sundry resolutions, adjourned.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 13.

Mr. SMITH, instructed by the Committee on Finance, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed, with as little delay as may be, to furnish the Senate with the project of a bill for reducing the duties levied upon imports, in conformity with the suggestions made by him in his annual report.

This resolution lies on the table one day.

COMMERCIAL STATEMENTS.

A joint resolution offered by Mr. SMITH, to provide for printing the annual statements of commerce and navigation was then taken up.

SENATE.]

Commercial Statements.

Mr. SMITH briefly stated the reasons which had induced him to offer this resolution. Referring to the act which directs the Secretary of the Treasury to report these statements annually to Congress in the first, meaning, perhaps, the first Monday of December, or as soon after as possible—he complained that the document did not very frequently find its way to the members until the session had terminated, and they had returned to their homes. He did not get his last statement until the end of October or the beginning of November. He referred to the great but unsuccessful exertions which had been made by the Secretary to obtain the statements, at an earlier period, from the officers who had to prepare the details. The Secretary hoped to send in the next statement, by the 1st of February; and after that time, it would be long before it could be printed, and presented to the members. The object of his resolution was to give authority to the Secretary to have the document printed so that it might be printed, sheet by sheet, as the matter was furnished from the Department, and under the supervision of the Treasury. The difficulty arose out of the impossibility of getting the reports of the various officers in proper time. The Secretary complained that he could not get them in time; unless some penalty could be inflicted for neglect and delay, he did not see how the officers could be coerced into greater diligence.

Mr. HOLMES admitted that there was ground for complaint as to the delay in furnishing these annual statements. It often happened that they were not received until long after the termination of the session; perhaps not before May or June, instead of early in January. The report has to be delivered to the Secretary of the Senate, and afterwards to be printed. The adoption of this resolution would lead to the printing of the statements beforehand, but the evil would not thereby be remedied. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury gives the returns up to the 30th of September, and he saw no reason why the report should not be made before the 1st of January. It was said that there was no penal sanction to the law, and that the officers could delay their returns without incurring any penalty. It is so; but he should suppose that neglect could be prevented; that if the Secretary could not remove an offender, he could report his neglect to the President. He thought the subject should be further considered, and with this view, he moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the Senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

RE-CONSIDERATION.

When the doors were re-opened, a motion had been made by Mr. POINDEXTER to reconsider the order of the Senate to adjourn till Monday, for the purpose of giving an opportunity to-morrow, for the adoption of the resolution offered to-day by Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Finance.

When Reporters were admitted, Mr. HOLMES had just opposed the motion.

Mr. POINDEXTER succeeded him in a few remarks in opposition to any call upon the Head of a Department for the project of a bill. In his opinion, the Senate ought to look to their own committees for draughts of bills, and to the Departments merely for information. He had a strong objection to sending either to the President, or any one of the Departments, for a bill. He would look to the regular committees for the bills, and the committees would look to the Departments for such information as they might require. He could not consider this resolution, therefore, in the light of an ordinary call for information; and whenever it should be taken up, he would record his name in opposition to it. Not that he was ever opposed to call on the Departments for information, but that he regarded the calling for a bill as derogatory to the character of the Senate.

Mr. TYLER regretted that on a mere motion to reconsider the order for adjournment, the merits of the resolution should be brought up for discussion. Notwithstanding what had fallen from the Senator from Mississippi, however, he should still calculate on having his vote in favor of the resolution. He reminded that gentleman that the existing law required of the Secretary of the Treasury to communicate to Congress all the information concerning the finances of the country. In obedience to this law, the Secretary had stated that there might be a reduction in the revenue to the amount of six millions. This was the broad proposition of the Secretary. Was not the Senate justified then in calling upon the Secretary to state in what manner this reduction could be effected? Are we not to call on him to furnish a bill of particulars which we may make the basis of our legislation? The resolution did no more than call on him for such bill of particulars. He considered that the objection of the gentleman from Mississippi would apply with great force to any other of the Departments; but for the reasons he had stated, he did not think it applicable to the Treasury. He expressed his hope that the Senate would reconsider the motion to adjourn.

Mr. MANGUM said a few words against the motion to reconsider, and against the resolution itself. Unlearned as he was in these matters, and untutored in the precise course which had been customary, he was not disposed to call on any body but the regular committees of that body for the draught of a bill. The Secretary, it was true, was required to furnish all information concerning his Department, and he could see no impropriety in his furnishing the Senate with details; but he would prefer that the committees should examine the facts, and if they agreed with the Secretary as to the main points, it was for them to go to him for such details as they might require: as a matter concerning the dignity of the Senate, he should feel himself called on to oppose the course which was now suggested. He would not call on any branch of the Government for the project of a bill.

The question was then taken on the motion to reconsider; which was decided in the negative—ayes 17, noes 18. And the Senate adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 17.

Mr. POINDEXTER offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate, with as little delay as practicable, a detailed statement of the articles of foreign growth or manufacture, on which, in his opinion, the present rate of duties ought to be reduced, specifying particularly the amount of reduction on each article separately, so as to produce the result of an aggregate reduction of the revenue six millions of dollars, on such manufactures as are classed under the general denomination of protected articles; and that he also append to such report an enumeration of articles deemed to be "essential to our national independence in time of war," and which therefore ought, in his opinion, to be exempted from the operation of the proposed reduction of duties.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the resolution was ordered to be printed.

COMMERCIAL STATEMENTS.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution offered by him relative to the printing of the annual statement of commerce and navigation.

Mr. HOLMES remarked, that he had no intention of opposing, nor did he intend to propose amending the resolution. He would suggest, however, to the mover to avoid the supposition that the intention was to take this portion of the public printing from the public printer,

DECEMBER 17, 1832.]

Tariff Duties.

and give it to another; whether it would not be better to insert an amendment, providing that the work should be executed by the printer of one of the two Houses of Congress. He presumed this arose from an inadvertence in drawing the resolution, and had made the suggestion, in order to avoid the idea, that might otherwise be formed, that the object of the resolution was to take so much work from the public printer. He regretted that the resolution did not go a little further, (as in its present shape it was not, in his opinion, calculated to reach the object in view,) and do something that would tend to procure for them the documents a little sooner, which would make some provision of law necessary, by which the public printer would be allowed more time to expedite the work. He did not believe, however, that any sanction of a penalty by Congress would be necessary to prevent any remissness on the part of the collectors, as the Secretary of the Treasury undoubtedly had it in his power to report any dereliction of duty to the President, with a view to the removal of the offending officer. This would have the effect to let those officers know that their returns must be made in time to comply with the requisitions of the law.

Mr. FOOT said, that he had an objection to the resolution itself. It was calculated to release the custom house officers from making their returns. Some do not make their returns in time. If the Executive cannot enforce the law on this subject, there ought to be an enforcing act. It is of great importance to have the documents in season. Sir, I am entirely opposed to the resolution in itself.

Mr. SMITH observed, that it was unimportant to him individually, whether the resolution passed or not, because he expected hereafter to have no participation in the subject of it. His sole object was the future convenience of the Senate, and to expedite the public business. His attention had been called to this subject, by the remarks of the Senator from Maine, of the last session, and the acknowledged inconveniences resulting from the late receipt of this important document referred to. Now his resolution went to remedy completely the inconveniences complained of; for a part of the returns embraced in this very document, were already received by the Treasury Department, and could now be put to press if the department had the power to print it; and then the remaining parts could be printed as received. The public printer, Mr. S. said, had much to do, and of an important nature, at the very time this document usually came in, (1st January.) It would take much time even to examine the proof sheets, as consisting of nice and great calculations, in figure work; and indeed he did not believe that two proof readers could do it in two weeks. Now all this could be avoided by the adoption of the resolution. It was, as he said before, no object to him; his only object was the convenience of the Senate hereafter.

Mr. FOOT again remarked, that the honorable Senator had said well, that we ought not to legislate for ourselves as individuals. Sir, I do not aim to legislate for myself, but for my country: and this is a duty which I will not yield or abandon while I have a standing on this floor.

Mr. SMITH said, he had not intended to convey the idea that they were legislating for themselves. When he spoke of the convenience of the Senate, it was in reference to the expediting the public business.

Mr. HOLMES said, that he too never had any idea of legislating for himself, though he did not expect to be here again. There are many of us, he said, not legislating for ourselves but for posterity, except, indeed, some bachelors, who could not legislate for their posterity.

Mr. POINDEXTER said, there is no necessity for this measure. It is the custom of the Senate sometimes to print the usual number, and sometimes an extra number. On this point the Secretary of the Treasury is not competent to decide. But there is another objection to a transfer, as proposed by the resolution. It would give more power of public patronage to one of the Heads of Departments, which they already possess to a disproportionate amount. The Secretary may give the printing of the documents to any printer he chooses; thereby releasing him from that responsibility to Congress which rests on their own public printers. I move, then, to amend the resolution, by inserting after the word printed, "by the printer of the Senate or House of Representatives."

The question was then, taken, and Mr. P's amendment was carried without a division.

Mr. BIBB said, he could not see the necessity of this resolution. He would read to the Senate the law of Congress providing for the transmission to Congress of these statements at each session. [Mr. B. here read the law.] Now, said Mr. B., do we mean to change this law of Congress by the passage of a resolution, and provide that the statements shall be sent ready printed, by the Secretary of the Treasury, to the members at their respective homes, and in his own time, instead of laying them before Congress? When the statements are sent to us, said Mr. B., we have them under our own control, and can dispose of them as we please; but it will be quite otherwise should the resolution pass. He believed that the Secretary of the Treasury had it in his power to send in the statements in time for Congress to print them before its adjournment; and he should like to know who were the persons not performing their respective duties, in time to enable him to do so. Sir, said Mr. B., I, for one, am covetous of that portion of patronage of the Government possessed by the two Houses of Congress, and am not disposed to deprive them of it, to bestow it on any of the Executive departments.

Mr. SMITH said, the resolution is not opposed to the law. The only difference from the usual practice, proposed by the resolution, is, that the documents shall be submitted to the Senate, not in manuscript, but in print. The whole object of the resolution is to save time. The reports of collections must be made up after the 20th of September. If the documents were placed before the Senate by the 1st of January, their action upon them could not be completed by the 1st of March. The public printers, from their numerous engagements, are not able to print them in time. It is difficult to collate and copy the documents. Two men could not do it in less than two weeks. The Secretary could have them printed as they were made out. The only difference would be, that they would be submitted to the Senate in print, and not in manuscript: not to the individual members of Congress, as the gentleman had intimated, but to the two Houses of Congress. Last session an extra number was printed: they were not delivered to members, but to the House. There is no power transferred to the Secretary. He is bound to present the usual number. The resolution cannot interfere with the law. The Secretary is required by the law to submit his report by the first of December, or as soon after as possible. The Senate want to have the documents early, no matter whether in print or manuscript, so that they can act upon them during the session. He saw great inconvenience in the present mode: he only wished for convenience. It is difficult to get the documents from manuscript in less than two weeks.

Mr. POINDEXTER said, the resolution seemed to involve some difficulties, and he, for one, wished for time for further consideration. He would, therefore, move to lay it on the table.

The resolution was then laid on the table, without a division.

TARIFF DUTIES.

The Senate then proceeded to take up the orders of the day.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. SMITH, on Thursday, being under consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed, with as little delay as may be, to furnish the Senate with the project of a bill for reducing the duties levied upon imports, in conformity with the suggestions made by him in his annual report.

Mr. TYLER said that he had been chiefly instrumental in prevailing on the Committee of Finance to adopt the resolution now before the Senate. It had been adopted without opposition, and seemed to meet the entire approbation of all the members, save one. Under these circumstances it had come before the Senate. He intended it for good. He thought a speedy action on the subject of the tariff was indispensably necessary; that it was due to the country, to the condition of the finances, and demanded by the fearful crisis into which our affairs had been unfortunately plunged. A great crisis had arrived, and definitive action—powerful, well sustained, and efficient action—was necessary to save the country. The subject could not be blinked, and he, for one, resting upon the principles on which he had all his life acted, was ready for action. He was not for shedding blood in civil strife, but for prompt legislation, which would heal the wounds of the country. He found himself, however, differing with some of those with whom he commonly acted, and without whose aid the resolution could not be carried. Some objected for one cause, and some for another. He hoped that those objections would yield to better reflection, and that those who agreed in the main, would not differ about unessentials. For the present, he declined to press the subject, and moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The resolution was accordingly ordered to lie upon the table.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, the Senate then proceeded to the consideration of Executive business. After which, The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 18.

THE TARIFF.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. POINDEXTER being taken up,

Mr. SMITH requested that the resolution might lie over for the present to allow time for examination.

Mr. POINDEXTER said that he had no objection to suffer the resolution to lie over. But as it was necessary, on account of the labor it would impose on the Department, that it should be speedily acted on, he gave notice that he should call the resolution up for consideration on the day after to-morrow.

After forwarding a number of bills, and disposing of sundry minor matters,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 19.

REVENUE FRAUDS.

The following resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. SPRAGUE, was taken up:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making further provision for the protection of the revenue, by prohibiting officers of the customs from trading in articles not subject to duty.

Mr. SPRAGUE, in a very few words, stated that he had been induced to offer this resolution in consequence of letters which had reached him from sources entitled to the highest respect, communicating the fact that great frauds were committed by officers of the customs, carrying on a traffic in articles not subject to duty. Having received this information from quarters entitled to weight, he wished it to be referred to the Committee on Finance, to examine and report whether some legal provision to prevent these frauds might not be expedient.

The resolution was then agreed to.

MISSOURI CANAL.

The bill to grant a quantity of land to the State of Missouri, for the purpose of enabling said State to open a canal in the Big Swamp, between the counties of Cape Girardeau and Scott, to connect the waters of the river St. Francois, and the river Mississippi, was read a second time, and after a brief explanation by Mr. BUCKNER, of the condition of the lands through which the canal was proposed to be made, was reported without amendment.

MR. SPRAGUE put a question to the Senator from Missouri as to the quantity of land which was proposed to be given to the State, and whether the whole of it came under the denomination of a swamp?

Mr. BUCKNER replied that it was intended to give two and a half miles on each side of the canal, and that the swamps extended six miles. There was very little good land which was not inundated, and most of that was settled by public or other grants. These persons were protected by the bill.

On motion of Mr. SPRAGUE, who wished time for further information, the bill was, for the present, laid on the table.

PUNISHMENT OF CRIMES.

The bill supplementary to an Act to provide for the more efficient punishment of certain crimes against the United States, &c. was read a second time.

The bill being in committee, some discussion took place in reference to its various details, in which Messrs. DALLAS, CHAMBERS, EWING, HOLMES, WILKINS, TYLER, MANGUM, and BIBB, participated.

The discussion chiefly related to that clause of the bill which prescribes the punishment of solitary imprisonment, from one year to five years, at the discretion of the Court, for persons convicted of having counterfeit notes in their possession. This discretion was, on one side, deemed too great to be vested in any court, because five years solitary confinement is a punishment equal to death. On the other hand, it was insisted that, in such case as was provided for by the clause, the inception of the offence ought to be punished as severely as its consummation. Some amendments were made in the details of the bill.

The bill, on motion of Mr. BIBB, was laid on the table.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 20.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. CHAMBERS, from the Select Committee on French Spoliations, reported a bill similar to one before the Senate at the last session, with a verbal amendment, which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. CHAMBERS took occasion to state, that, as the chairman of the committee was absent, it was not the intention of the committee to call up the bill for consideration until they should have the pleasure of seeing him in his place.

After disposing of a number of petitions, resolutions, and private bills,

Adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 24.

REDUCTION OF DUTIES.

After the Senate had disposed of some other morning business,

Mr. POINDEXTER moved that the Senate do now consider the following resolution, which he offered on the 17th instant:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate with as little delay as practicable, a detailed statement of the articles of foreign growth or manufacture, on which, in his opinion, the present rate of duties ought to be reduced, specifying particularly the amount of reduction on each article separately, so as to produce the result of an aggregate reduction of the revenue of six millions of dollars, on such manufactures as are classed under the general denomination of protected articles; and that he also append to such report an enumeration of articles deemed to be "essential to our national independence in time of war;" and which therefore ought, in his opinion, to be exempted from the operation of the proposed reduction of duties.

Mr. SMITH said, that as the Senate was now thin, he hoped the Senator from Mississippi would suffer his resolution to continue on the table, until after the holidays.

Two of the Committees of the other House, as he was informed, had been for some time past engaged in the preparation of a bill on this subject, and had received the aid of the Secretary of the Treasury in their work, having had repeated conferences with that officer to ascertain his views. He hoped, therefore, that the resolution would be permitted to lie on the table a few days, until the Senate should be fuller than at present.

Mr. POINDEXTER stated that it had been his intention, pursuant to notice which he had given, to call up this resolution for consideration on Thursday last; but it would be recollected that, on that day, the Senate went very early into the consideration of Executive business, and that, in this way, his intentions had been frustrated. If this resolution involved any important principle, he should have no objection to acquiesce in the suggestion of the Senators from Maryland, and to suffer it to lie over for the present. But it was nothing more than a call for information constructed in the ordinary manner, involving no principle, and asking for information, the importance of which at the present moment was obvious to every member of the Senate. If the Senate were to have any of the information called for by his resolution, it ought to be in their possession immediately after the holidays, if possible, in order that they might proceed to action upon it without delay, as this was the short session. He did not apprehend that there could be any opposition to the resolution itself. It would be out of place, while considering it, to go into a discussion of the great principles involved in the tariff question; and the only views which could present themselves would be whether it would be expedient or not to call for the information, whether such course would be at all disrespectful to any branch of the Government; and whether the information required would be useful in aiding the Senate to form just conclusions on the great questions. All other debate would be entirely premature.

He hoped the Senate would now agree to consider the resolution: and if there should be found any thing objectionable, either in the language of the resolution, or in the details of information for which it asked, the Senate could dispose of it in such way as their wisdom should direct. At all events, he trusted that his motion to take up the resolution would prevail.

Mr. KING said that he did not ordinarily object to the consideration of resolutions calling for information, but he could not avoid expressing his hope that this resolution would not now be considered. The subject itself properly belonged to the House of Representatives, and a committee of that branch were now ready with a report on the subject, which would have been probably made to-day, had the House been in session, and would not, he presumed, be postponed beyond Wednesday. A resolution very similar to the present had been laid on the table by the Senate but a few days since; and the understanding was, that the subject should not be again taken up until the other House had acted upon it. This resolution appeared to him to differ from that in no essential point, and ought also to lie over, and then the two resolutions could be considered together.

To the latter part of this resolution, however, he would now state that he had a particular objection. It asked for "an enumeration of articles deemed to be essential to our national independence in time of war, and which, therefore, ought, in his opinion, to be exempted from the operation of the proposed reduction of duties." He contended that this part of the requisition ought not to go to the Treasury Department, but to be addressed to the Secretary of War, within whose province it would naturally come to answer such interrogatory. He wished that this resolution might lie until the House had come to some action on the subject, and then both the resolutions before the Senate could be taken up and disposed of together.

Mr. POINDEXTER again rose to reply. He had hoped that no Senator would, on the present motion to consider, have touched the body of the resolution; but as the Senator from Alabama had done so, in order to prevent the Senate from agreeing to the consideration, he felt himself bound to say a word or two. The Senator from Alabama was of opinion that the latter part of the resolution ought to be addressed to the Secretary of War. It might be so, but if it was, the course was new to him. He would briefly give the reason which had induced him to give to the inquiry the direction which he had chosen. He then referred to the message of the President, in which it was suggested that it would be found expedient to reduce the duties to the necessary wants of the Government. The Secretary of the Treasury, following up this principle, after a variety of views, had echoed this sentiment of the Executive. As to the technical objections, therefore, which had been taken to the reference to the Treasury Department, he thought it was disposed of by the suggestion made by the Secretary. How was the Senate to decide what articles, "essential to our national independence in time of war," were deemed by the Secretary as entitled to exemption. If the views of the members of the Senate were to be substituted for those of the Secretary, one gentleman might tell you that he considered woollens as one of these "essential articles," because they enter into the necessary clothing of the soldier in time of war. Another gentleman would, with equal truth, and on equally good reasoning, tell you that cotton was one of these articles "essential to our national independence in time of war." Now, he wished to know what the message and the report of the Secretary meant! He wished to see the scheme of the Secretary. And the information could be furnished under the eye of the Executive, and by any officer he might select.

And why was all this difficulty thrown in the way of his resolution? One gentleman had said that the other House ought to act, in the first instance. Another stated that the Senate ought to let the Secretary of the Treasury communicate his views sub rosa. Now, he wanted to see what the Secretary meant by his generalities. He wanted the Secretary to show his hand. He desired to know what he meant when he talked of a reduction of six millions of duties. The situation of the country at this moment was very imposing, and demands the early action of Congress. It was necessary that it should be known whether the existing law is to be abandoned, or whether it is to be adhered to. If the decision shall be to adhere to the present tariff law, let it be quickly made, that the public attention may be fixed. But now, since the issuing of a certain paper, the proclamation of the President, all was confusion and uncertainty. The Secretary of the Treasury, he presumed, would give the information which was required, without hesitation; and the Senate would then be in possession of materials for a just decision. To himself it was matter of some surprise, that when one honorable Senator wanted information on a particular subject, another honorable Senator, who may have had greater facilities for obtaining the knowledge, and who, therefore, did not require the lights asked for, should rise in his place to start objections to the inquiry. Discussion of the subject was now out of place. In order to test the sense of the Senate on his motion, and to see how gentlemen voted, he would ask for the yeas and nays.

A sufficient number rising to sustain the call, the yeas and nays were then ordered.

Mr. SMITH said that it devolved on him to state some of the reasons which had induced him to vote against the consideration of this resolution at the present time. The Senator from Mississippi had said that he wished to draw from the Secretary his scheme as to the reduction of the duties. Now, the Committee on Finance had presented a resolution expressly calling for this scheme, in the most plain and practical form, that of a bill. The honorable Senator had objected to that resolution, because it called for a bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER explained that he thought bills should originate in the legislative branch, and with the Executive departments.

Mr. SMITH resumed. If that resolution had been adopted, the Senate would have been furnished with a bill, embracing every item on which a reduction of duties was contemplated. He then adverted to the distinct character of the message of the Executive, and the reports from the Secretaries, and contended that the views in the former, did not, of necessity, control those in the latter. A call, in reference to articles essential in war, might be directed to the President or to the Secretary of War, but could not be properly addressed to any other department.

The Senator from Mississippi had stated that this resolution embraced no important principle. Now, he (Mr. S.) thought it touched one of great importance. He recollected that Congress called on General Hamilton for his opinions. The opinions of that gentleman had, at that time, great weight on a certain portion of the people; they had great influence on almost all the opposition. He recollected that Mr. Giles protested against calling on the Secretary for his opinions, and the call was also opposed by Mr. Madison, John Nicholas, and others. The ground taken was, that it was the duty of the Secretary to furnish only facts when they were required, and that it was for Congress to construct opinions out of these facts. The information which was now asked by the resolution would have no influence on his mind, or on his course, although it might have its weight with other Senators. He was opposed to calling on any head of department for his opinions. It was only for them to furnish the facts. The resolution involved the principle which had been discussed in 1797. He would not consent now to call on the Secretary for his opinions, any more than he did then, when he opposed the practice on principle. He was indisposed to array the opinions of the Secretary against his own, or those of other Senators. He was, therefore, against the motion to consider.

Mr. HOLMES expressed the difficulty he had to comprehend precisely what had fallen from the Senator from Maryland concerning opinions. That Senator, it appeared, although he would not call on the Secretary for his opinions, would have no objection to call on him for a bill. Now, what was a bill but opinions.

Mr. SMITH. "Facts."

Mr. HOLMES resumed. A bill was framed in consequence of opinions, and to embody them. And when a distinction was taken between an opinion and a bill, it seemed to him to be a distinction without a difference, unless the bill called for was not to be received as the opinion of the framer. In reporting a bill an opinion was given on the principle on which it was founded, so that, as regarded the requisition for the opinions of the Secretary, the present and the previous resolution were the same thing. If the Senate was to act at all on the resolution, he thought it not material whether it was now, or at another time; but if the information were to be asked for from the Department, in the form of a bill, it would carry an appearance as if no member of the Senate, or any one else, could draw a bill, in terms of technical accuracy, but a clerk of a Department. He was unwilling to let it go forth to the world that a Senator could not frame a bill; and would prefer that the necessary information should be asked for informally.

The question was then taken on the motion to consider the resolution, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Clayton, Dickerson, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Knight, Miller, Moore, Poindexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Tipton, Tomlinson—20.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buckner, Dudley, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King, Mangum, Robinson, Smith, Sprague, Tyler, White, Wilkins—15.

So the Senate agreed to consider the resolution.

The resolution was then again read, and Mr. POINDEXTER modified it, by inserting after the words "six millions of dollars," the words "as expressed in his annual report."

Mr. KING considered the modification which had just been made as rendering the resolution still more objectionable. There was no such expression in the annual report of the Secretary, as was attributed to it by the modification. The resolution referred solely to what were termed "protected articles." Such was not the language of the report of the Secretary. The language of the letter was principally on protected articles, and did not convey the idea of reduction on protected articles exclusively.

He did not understand what the Senator from Mississippi meant by persons having information in their possession, which other gentlemen did not possess; and that the Secretary would give his opinion sub rosa. He was certain there was nothing in his language to warrant the impression that any gentleman were in possession of exclusive information. He knew of none. And as to the Secretary of the Treasury, he felt assured that that officer would not shrink from an avowal of his opinions; but that he was ready at any moment to show his hand.

The Committee of Ways and Means of the other House had been laboring, with the aid of the Secretary of the Treasury, to frame a bill, and were now ready to make their report. So also the Committee on Manufactures had been occupied in a similar labor. He thought that the Senate ought to wait for the result of their labors, before they proceeded to act on the subject.

But he had another, and a still stronger objection to the resolution. It was a call on the Treasury Department for information which was not within its province. Why should a call be made on the Treasury Department for an enumeration of munitions of war, small arms, and similar necessary articles, when there was in existence a Department of War? Let the call be made there.

The resolution, he regarded, as not doing justice to the Secretary. It imputed to him expressions for which he was not to be held responsible, and was calculated to produce erroneous impressions. And it called on him for information which was not within his reach. The resolution might, with more propriety, be addressed to the President, and he could send it to a proper officer for a reply.

When the report of the Secretary of the Treasury was received last session from the Department, it met with opposition on every side, and was finally defeated; and it was probable that his communication now would meet with a similar fate. He would now make a proposition which would free the resolution from the objection which he felt to it as it now stood.

Mr. KING then moved to strike out the following words:

"And that he also append to such report an enumeration of articles deemed to be 'essential to our national independence in time of war,' and which, therefore, ought, in his opinion, to be exempted from the operation of the proposed reduction of duties."

Mr. BROWN then asked for the reading of the resolution which was offered some days since from the Committee on Finance—

The resolution being read,

Mr. BROWN then said that he should vote against the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi, even if the amendment of the Senator from Alabama should succeed. He preferred the resolution of the Committee on Finance. He felt assured that the Secretary would not shrink from the responsibility of giving his views. In the report which he had already sent in, he had exhibited candor, frankness, and an admirable system of doctrines, which entitled him to confidence. He could not agree with the Senator from Alabama, that the Senate ought to suspend their action on this subject because the House had not yet acted. At a moment of such deep importance, when the harmony, and, perhaps, the integrity of the Union are in danger, he thought that there should be no delay, but that the Senate ought to act at once.

Mr. POINDEXTER said the Senator from Maryland seemed to object to a call for opinions on this great subject. Did that gentleman recollect that, in the reports of Mr. Hamilton, as to the condition of the finances, he confined himself to statements of facts principally? It was thought, by some members of Congress, that he should be called on to communicate his opinions. The democratic party were opposed to a call for opinions. But now it had become a fashion with the departments to volunteer their opinions. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury contained opinions expressed in general terms, and the Senate had a right to call for specifications.

It would be recollected by the Senate, that this was not a new practice. At the last session, they had called on the Secretary of the Treasury for his opinions as to the reduction of duties. The call was made, as it appeared on the Journal now before him. The call might with as much propriety be made now, and he had no doubt that the Secretary would be as ready as he was before to give his opinions on the subject.

The Senator from Alabama had raised an objection to the latter part of the resolution, because the Secretary of the Treasury had not carried out the views of the President on this point, but had confined himself to the protected articles. He would read what the Secretary had said on the subject, because if he had not touched this point, it might be improper for the Senate to meddle with it.

[Here Mr. POINDEXTER read a paragraph from the report which adverted to the propriety of giving especial protection to articles which were necessary to the preservation of our national independence.]

Thus it appeared that the Secretary proposed to exempt articles which were "essential to the national independence in time of war," showing that there existed a strict coincidence of opinion on the subject, between the President and Secretary. It was said that the Secretary, in the construction of his annual report, acted independently of the views of the President. He did not so understand it. He had always supposed that the Cabinet acted in subservience to the President, more especially in the suggestion of any new views. Would it not appear strange if one of the Secretaries should assume the right to declare war? Had not the President a right to control their opinions? Could he not remove them when he found that they were no longer disposed to act under his control?

As to articles which are necessary in time of war, the President had declared that they ought to be exempted, and the Secretary of the Treasury follows out the idea. He desired to act in conformity with the views of the President and the Secretary on this point. But he must first ascertain what these articles were. If the Secretary were to furnish the specifications called for by his resolution, would not the Senate act more understandingly and harmoniously? Certainly they would. But any discussion which might be gone into, to determine these articles, would be something like the consultation of the citizens of the besieged town in the fable; one declared his preference for iron, as the best material for fortification; a second insisted on the superiority of wood; while a third declared that there was nothing like leather. So it would be found, that among the Senators there would be found as great a diversity of opinions. He knew that the President and the Secretary would not shrink from the avowal of their opinions. He stood forward the advocate of their opinions; and he found himself placed in a singular position, inasmuch as he was opposed by those who were the friends of the administration.

The present crisis was one which demanded action: The people wished to know what course Congress were about to pursue; and he hoped they should proceed to act without delay, so that this now distracted country might once more repose in peace and serenity.

Mr. SMITH said two or three words in explanation of what he had said concerning the distinctness between the opinions of the President and those of his Secretaries; and added, that the Secretary had confined himself to a general expression, and that the details which were now demanded did not lie within his reach.

Mr. SPRAGUE stated that this was not, in his opinion, a resolution calling for information as to facts. It was only calling for opinions in a more specific form than that in which they had heretofore been given. He was opposed to this practice. He thought that the Departments had already influence enough, and he would not magnify that influence still further by calling on them for their opinions. The facts were already before the Senate. The fact that the revenue was now greater than the wants of the country demanded, was before the Senate. They also knew the amount of the duties on protected articles, and they knew what the articles were on which duties were collected. The amount of the revenue and expenditures, the amount of the duties which accrued, and the names of the articles, were all before the Senate. And what more was required? They propose to ask the Secretary of the Treasury his opinion on what articles reductions should be made? He would not consent to do this. He thought the Senate were competent to do it for themselves. It might be true that he would be willing, in this instance, to draw out the Secretary on the subject of the reductions which he had in view; but he was against the general practice, and not for it. If the Secretary had volunteered certain opinions, he (Mr. S.) was not disposed to ask him for more. He objected to this resolution for substantially the same reasons which had induced him to oppose the resolution calling on the Secretary for a bill. But he was, in fact, more opposed to that resolution than to the present, because it called for the opinions of the Secretary in a still more emphatic manner. It had been predicted that the Senate would become merely the recorder of the decrees of the Executive, but he had never yet heard the suggestion that laws were to be prepared at the department, and merely sent to the Senate for passage. It had been said that the plan was a convenient one. He knew it was convenient, and it might be still more convenient to have the laws prepared by one man. But he thought it would be much better to submit to the inconvenience of the established practice, than by concentrating all business in one, to concentrate all influence there also, and thus to prepare the way for the introduction of still greater evils. The two Houses of Congress had already less, and the Executive Department more influence than they ought to have.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN rose, and expressed his regret that he should be obliged, in this instance, to differ with his friend from Maine. The reports of the Secretary of the Treasury to the two Houses were made in obedience to a special act of Congress, and not at the requisition of the President. It was an official document, called for by both Houses of Congress, to have all the influence which its character would enable it to exercise. The call was therefore addressed to the Secretary, not to the President, because the President could exercise no control over the matter. He would call on the Secretary for this reason. The Secretary had stated that by a tariff policy, based on proper principles, a reduction of six millions might be made, without prejudice to the claims of existing establishments. Here, then, was a very important fact. It was desirable to know what the Secretary means by "a tariff policy based on proper principles." One object of the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi was to fix these generalities. An Executive officer had told the Senate of a tariff based on proper principles? In another part of his report, the Secretary explains his meaning, to counteract foreign legislation, to protect our own industry, to cherish those branches within ourselves which supply the means of preserving our national independence.

The resolution proposed to ask the Secretary what was his view of the extent of these general terms, which did not depend on their grammatical construction, but on the manner in which the mind of the Secretary was brought to bear on the subject. If the question as to the most important article to be protected were to be put to his colleague, he would unquestionably reply, iron; and a majority of the Senate, perhaps, would say woollens. It had gone through the country, that a reduction could be made of six millions. It was necessary to know how this could be effected. And to obtain this knowledge, they must send to the department whence the suggestion had been communicated. Their constituents must know what was meant. It was a plain, practical, common sense inquiry, what was intended by means of national defence? Did the phrase refer to arms and munitions, to powder, cannon balls, and the like? It was proper that they should have a definite and practical answer. Thus viewing the subject, he must give his vote in favor of the resolution, and against the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HOLMES acquiesced in the correctness of the views which had been taken by the gentleman from New Jersey as to the relative duties of the President and the Secretary; and to revive the fading recollections of the provisions of the act of 1789, which created the Treasury Department, he read so much of it as prescribed the duties of the Secretary. He then adverted to the facility with which the present Secretary suited his opinions to the tone of the Congress to whom they were addressed. His views appeared to be in a constant state of mutation, and he was very well disposed to fix him on this point, and to discover what he really did mean. In the opinions of some, iron and lead would be deemed articles of the highest importance for defence. But the fable of the gentleman from Mississippi did not strictly apply here, where there were no fortified towns, to render iron, wood, and leather the most essential articles. Other commodities here superseded those. The soldier, in these times, must have his blanket to clothe and protect him. Consequently flannel was an article of great necessity. The soldier, it was true, must fire his musket, but if he were to perish of cold for want of a blanket, he could no longer fire it. So also, on the same principle, it might become necessary to impose a protecting duty on flour, and beef, and pork, because the soldier must eat; and on cotton, because he must have shirts to wear. Thus you might protect every thing, or nothing. The Secretary is now required to tell precisely what are his views, and when the Senate had got at his meaning, they could then judge for themselves. Acting under the provisions of the act of 1789, they called on the Secretary to give, in a satisfactory manner, those views which he had now given unsatisfactorily. It was desired to know if he was in favor of no tariff, or of a tariff, and if a tariff, if of a tariff up to the hub. One section of the country had claimed this administration as anti-tariff, while another had regarded them as advocates of a tariff. It was wished to have this problem solved, to have this question settled. The President might have on this subject different views from the Secretary. Under this resolution, the Secretary would be bound to give his opinion as to the points in which he differed from the President. The Senate would then determine which they thought right, and which wrong, or whether either of them was right. Amidst all the conflict of opinions, it was the proper course for the Senate to go right on, and to do their duty.

Mr. BROWN said it was his wish to gratify the gentleman from Maine, and to obtain such information as would expound to him what a judicious tariff was. But he was attracted by a higher motive than this. He wished the Senate to act on this subject at once. It was important that there should be instant action. He agreed generally with the other Senator from Maine, as to the inexpediency of calling for opinions, as a general rule. But he did not feel disposed to apply the principle in this case. The gentleman had said that he would not give the department too great influence. The opinions of the Treasury Department last session were not so fortunate as to receive the registration of the Senate. This was proof that they did not carry with them so much influence as that gentleman had supposed. The officer only acted under the direction of the Senate in communicating his views. He hoped that all false notions of etiquette would be discarded. He wished that the country should meet the crisis, and the sooner the better. Believing the Secretary to be most conversant with the subject, from his habits and his opportunities, he would prefer at once to apply to him for a bill. The Senate could then accept or reject at their pleasure. He had the same object in view with the gentleman, but thinking the resolution of the Committee on Finance the most specific, he would now move to insert that as a substitute for the present.

He then moved to strike out all of the resolution after the word "Resolved," and to insert as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed, with as little delay as may be, to furnish the Senate with a project of a bill for reducing the duties levied upon imports, in conformity with the suggestions made by him in his annual report."

Mr. TYLER said that he was pleased to find that gentlemen who were known to be the advocates of the tariff were in favor of this call upon the Secretary. He thought it furnished somewhat a favorable augury, that the Senator from New Jersey, (Mr. DICKINSON,) standing at the head of the Committee of Manufactures, should be found voting for a call on the Secretary of the Treasury for information in relation to a subject on which that honorable Senator had bestowed so much labor and attention. He could not but hail it as an evidence of a disposition on the part of that Senator to make a proper abatement of the taxes, and to contribute something towards restoring public harmony. What other motive could influence gentlemen in making the call, he could not imagine. Mr. T. said he had voted against taking up the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi to-day, for reasons which must be obvious to all. The vacant seats which presented themselves in every direction, seemed to oppose an action at this time; but as the Senator from North Carolina, (Mr. BROWN) had moved the resolution from the Finance Committee in substitution of that moved by Mr. POINDEXTER; he proposed to say but a word or two in its favor. He preferred it to the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi; because that proposition might give rise to a disorganization on the protective system, when he (Mr. T.) wanted a substantive tangible response. The country had long dissertations on political economy, volumes in the form of reports had been written on the subject. He was sick of them, and he believed the country nauseated at them. We want, said Mr. T., no more homilies, but a practical measure on which every man in the country may lay his hand as something tangible and certain. He wanted to introduce no British custom, but he wanted a bill with the stamp of the treasury, and why not have it? Should we now stand on mere forms, when the country is menaced with civil war, and a threat is made to collect the taxes at the point of the bayonet? When he was called on for military force, he should be disposed to inquire whether every other means had been exhausted, before resort was had to the sword. Let us, then, call upon the Treasury for its project, and let us not alarm ourselves at the idea that we are to become serviles and minions to the Executive, because we call upon it for aid in the present important crisis. He, however, begged gentlemen to believe that he was not trembling with fear and apprehension of danger. He should but poorly represent his State, which in the present crisis was as terrified as at any precedent period of her history, if he could give council to fear. He honestly loved the Union, however, and he deemed it right that every conceivable effort should be made to save it. He believed it better to vote for the resolution from the Committee of Finance, because it was plain and direct in its object, and he accordingly should do so.

Mr. MANGUM said, that he preferred the amendment proposed by his honorable friend and colleague, [Mr. BROWN,] to the original resolution: that he should vote to insert it, but upon the final vote of adoption he should go against the whole measure in every form. He had occasion, a few days ago, to intimate his opinion upon the resolution proposed to be substituted, when it was first reported by the Committee on Finance, and then regretted his inability to take as favorable a view of its principles and policy, as did many of those gentlemen with whom he usually acted, and for whose judgment, upon most occasions, he entertained a profound respect. Time and reflection had served but to mature his first and hasty impressions into settled conviction; and he had been gratified to perceive, that reflection had led many of his friends to distrust their first impressions, and to vote to lay the resolution on the table. There, he supposed, it would have slept, had it not been deemed less objectionable than the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. POINDEXTER,] and was revived simply as a substitute.

Sir, said Mr. M., why shall we longer palter with this subject? Is this a time for whimsical, capricious, and ingenious evolutions in parliamentary tactics? Is this a time for the ability and patriotism of the United States' Senate to be exhausted in embarrassing moves, or to be attenuated in parliamentary manœuvres? Is the game to be resumed which was played through the last eight months' session, upon the great political chess-board? Were its results so profitable to the country, or so honorable to the national councils? Sir, it is time to have done with this. Is not the grave, the indignant rebuke of the American people still sounding in our ears? Shall we sit here to be amused by witty gentlemen, to taunt a Secretary, or to embarrass each other? Sir, the period for lengthened debate has passed. The Senator from Virginia has well said, we want no homilies on political economy. We have enough of them. It is action—action, we want. Action must be had, to stand still is ruin to ourselves, ruin to our country, and destructive to the brightest and best hopes of the world. The republic is in danger. It is upon the verge of a precipice. The republic must be saved, liberty must be preserved. The Union must be saved. We all have an equal interest in the perpetuity of liberty, in the preservation of the republic. The humble tenant of the humblest log cabin feels the inspirations of liberty and rises into dignity with a consciousness of its possession, as well as he who is clothed in purple and fares sumptuously every day. He feels that this is his country, the freest country under the sun, and that every part of it is his country. This bright and glorious image in his mind must not be marred or broken into fragments; it must be saved; its integrity must be preserved. It is the great solace and pride of his life, as it is the richest, perhaps the only heritage of his children. Sir, it is time to act, to act ourselves. The initiatory process can soon be consummated through the ordinary organs of this body. The committee will do its duty and do it quickly. The great work will remain for ourselves. Let us come to it in a spirit of kindness and conciliation, with a determination to save the republic. It is a great work; we must bring our minds and our hearts up to the great occasion. It is for ourselves, for our children, for posterity. Do our duty and the country will be saved; the arm of the oppressed, the world over, will be nerved; and every heart that throbs for liberty will derive solace and consolation from the noble example. But is it true that we are not equal to the occasion? Is it true that the severe party discipline of the last long session has confirmed in us habits of inaptitude for any other than petty and insignificant party struggles? That we are incapable of lifting all our thoughts, and bringing all our affections to the rescue of our country? Must there be a new shuffle, cut, and deal? Must our old habits, old passions, and our old sentiments, be thrown into the great alembic of the ballot box, and our patriotism be purified, exalted, and quickened, by being passed through the crucible of a new election?

Sir, said Mr. M., the country, the whole country, will be saved—not at the edge of the sword, or the point of the bayonet; that idea is revolting to our people and alien to the genius of our institutions. It cannot be saved by force. The present generation will brand with infamy, and all posterity will execrate him who first sheds a brother's blood in civil strife. A Government based upon the stable foundations of opinion, and the affections of the people, can be saved only by the public opinion and the affections of the people; and the hot burning curses of an outraged and indignant people will pursue and consume him who, in civil strife, shall shed the blood of any of our people, whether upon Sagadahoc or the Balize, upon any other plea than that of inevitable necessity. But the country will be saved. It may not be by the politicians: in them I have but little confidence. It will be saved by the people. I repeat, emphatically, the people, who, in every portion of this great and once happy confederacy are signally distinguished over all other people for moderation, justice, a love of liberty, and love of country. They will awaken to the oppressions which, by party and unprincipled combinations, have been practised upon their brethren of the South. They will rise in their strength in the most distant parts of the confederacy to advocate and defend their brother's cause. They will hurl the oppressor from his bad eminence, and scare the vulture from his prey. Liberty is our common inheritance, and they will guaranty it to every portion of our great political brotherhood. The people's interest every where is best and most permanently secured by equal laws, and a just administration of the Government. They know it, and so ultimately they will have it. In the glorious East, on the extreme verge of the republic, we have friends and allies, firm friends and allies, who are more terrible to the rapacious monopolist than an army with banners. Our people are too just, too generous, and too magnanimous, to suffer oppression to be long practised upon any portion of their brethren, when their attention shall be awakened to its existence.

Sir, said Mr. M., I am opposed, upon principle, to a call upon the Executive, or any head of a department, for a bill embracing such momentous interests. Its tendency would be to an amalgamation of the different departments of the Government, which should always be kept separate and as distinct as practicable. Congress is emphatically the legislative branch of the Government. Upon us the constitution devolves the responsibility, and upon us should fall the labor. If the Secretary of the Treasury can aid our committees, his services, I am sure, will be at their command when requested: they have been heretofore, they will be again, if desired. That officer, said Mr. M., is prepared, with a candor and decision as honorable to himself as he trusted they would be useful to the country, to come up to the great occasion, and to meet any responsibility. But not upon him was he willing to call in the form proposed for a bill. That course, though harmless now, may be drawn into precedent in bad times, and tend to throw upon a popular idol responsibility that ought always to rest upon the representatives of the States and the people. Sir, said Mr. M., I have always admired the noble sentiment thrown out in his place here, by that "beau idéal," of an able and dignified Senator who lately represented with so much honor to himself and usefulness to his country, the ancient and "unfettered" commonwealth of Virginia, [Mr. TAZEWELL,] to wit, that the introducing into this chamber the opinions of the Executive to influence our deliberations, or as a "makeweight" upon any question under consideration, ought to be regarded as a breach of order. The sentiment was uttered in bad times, but it is just at all times. Much stronger would an objection lie to conferring upon the Executive the initiatory process of our peculiar legislative duties. Mr. M. said he objected to the resolution because it contained a call, not for facts, but for opinions. Sir, said he, I object to a call for the opinion of this or any other administration; and in reference to this, judging from a late proclamation which had produced so much sensation, and which had found almost universal acceptance among the bitterest revilers of the President, he was constrained to say he liked their practice much better than their speculations; their works better than their faith. But let that pass.

The Senator from Mississippi, said Mr. M., complains that those who set themselves up to be the exclusive friends of the administration, and who, in consideration thereof, enjoy exclusive privileges in reference to personal intercourse, oppose his resolution. For myself, said Mr. M., I set up for no exclusive loyalty, nor am I conscious of enjoying, in that respect, any exclusive privileges. It is as much as I can do at this perilous crisis—a crisis of universal alarm, and one signally marked with the most flagrant dereliction of principle, to walk forward and steadily upon my own principles—principles which I believe to be conservative of liberty, of the Union, and of harmony and brotherly love throughout our extended and once happy borders. At this perilous crisis I know no man, and will support no man, further than I may believe he may be instrumental in saving the republic, and preserving the liberties of the people. I go for my country, my whole country, and, first of all, for the liberties of the people. In pursuing this course faithfully, I feel the gratifying assurance that I represent truly, as it is my object to do, a State as devoted to union and the great principles of constitutional liberty as any other under the sun. Mr. M. said he opposed the Senator's resolutions upon principle and policy, as he had, in like manner, opposed the resolution now offered as an amendment, some days ago, when brought forward under the auspices of the Finance Committee. But how is it, said Mr. M., that the opposition benches all rally to the support of the resolution? How is it that they evince so much anxiety to learn the details of the Secretary's plan? Wherefore do they call so loudly and earnestly for the light that the Secretary may shed upon the subject? Do they mean to profit by it? Have they any respect for the Secretary's opinions? Do they mean to be guided by the lamp he may carry into the mazes of political science? Have they not denounced, in all the moods and tenses, his annual report? Have they the slightest inclination to lend a willing ear to his counsels, and a cordial support to his plan? Wherefore, then, do they manifest so much anxiety? Do they suppose we are children? Do we not know that b-l-a spells bla? All understand the object. The Secretary's plan is to be embodied; it is then to be averred that it is in total disregard of the prosperity of various branches of industry; an appeal is to be made from his remorseless sacrifice of their interests to the Legislature. The tocsin is to be sounded; old prejudices awakened; old passions to be aroused; a gathering of all the clans, whether from North, South, East, or West—of personal enemies, of political enemies, and all sorts of enemies, with all sorts of passions, to assail the man, and demolish his system. Sir, it would be the first target in the world; it would be assailed by malignity with all sorts of missiles. I saw this game last year. Pardon me, gentlemen, I shall not play at it.

Yet, said Mr. M., it is very strange that our bitterest enemies should be so anxious to take counsel from this administration. The events of the last few months have produced strange changes in this world of ours. Is not a Presidential election, sir, especially if the majority be large, a sort of panacea for chronic political distempers? When the United States' Bank was under consideration last session, the opposite benches averred that it was the right arm, and only efficient arm of the Treasury Department. And, although in the whole of our former history, when that question came up, it was under the auspices or with the advice of the Treasury Department, yet on that occasion they repudiated all such advice. When my honorable friend (Mr. BENTON) moved the reference of the bank bill to the Secretary of the Treasury for his report in regard to its adaptation to the purposes of that Department, what was the vote of the opposite benches? They must well remember, and if they feel any pleasure in the reminiscence when placed in juxtaposition with their present course, they ought to enjoy it. I trust I shall be among the last who would seek to deprive them of an enjoyment so exceedingly peculiar. They will pardon me, I trust, for remembering with pleasure that I then declined, as I now repudiate, any foreign aid in our proper duties. Sir, said Mr. M., it is time to have done with this game upon the great political chessboard. One would think gentlemen would not pursue so bad a run of luck. I trust they will not. But, whatever may come of these embarrassing moves, I have one firm reliance—the people will set these things to rights. It is upon their moderation, their justice and their patriotism, that all my hopes repose.

Mr. TYLER said, that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MANROSE] had represented certain members of the House as being influenced, in their advocacy of the resolution now under consideration, by a desire to hold up a target to be shot at from Maine to Georgia, and that the bill which was called for was designed as that target. Surely, said Mr. T., the Senator could not have designed to embrace me in that remark. [Mr. MANROSE said certainly not, he had no such intention.] Mr. T. said that he did not believe that the gentleman, with whom he had always maintained the most friendly relation, had so designed; but the generality of the expressions which had been used, and which would not be as well understood elsewhere as here, had required the express disclaimer which the Senator had made. He could not permit an imputation to exist against him even by remote inference. He was actuated but by a single motive—a desire to tranquillize the country by a movement on the tariff. He could not concur with the Senator in the objections he had thought proper to urge against the resolution. He saw an obvious propriety in adopting it, and so thought the Committee of Finance who reported it, and why not avail ourselves of the aid of the Executive Department in adjusting existing difficulties? Why not bring the whole power of the President to bear upon this vitally important subject, as well here as with the people. The Senator waived all the advantages of our position; what were they? Heretofore the South had been left alone to its own exertions to get rid of the tariff: we had here but our fifteen or eighteen votes. The administration was represented, as best suited the purposes of the respective disputants on this side and on the other. Gentlemen were evermore guessing at what was meant by a judicious tariff. The explanation was now given; and a judicious tariff was now understood to mean nothing more or less than a tariff for revenue. The President and Secretary recommend a reduction on the protected articles to the extent of $6,000,000. Is not too much asked of us when we are required to waive the advantage of this new condition of affairs, by listening to the suggestions of what he believed to be a false delicacy? He claimed all the benefits and advantages of this situation of things; and he had a right to require all the aid that the Executive could afford to carry out its own suggestion. The country expected every man to do his duty; and he was satisfied that the Secretary of the Treasury would promptly answer a call of the Senate. Shall we, then, be deterred by a mere dispute about forms, now that we stood upon a dangerous precipice; he hoped not.

Mr. BROWN stated that he would be the last to do any thing which would violate the constitution, or would imply a bending to the departments. But he had been wholly unable to see what danger there was of increasing the power of the departments. He was unable to understand the drift of the conflicting arguments he had heard on this subject, when it was contended by one that the power of the departments had been weakened, and by another, that it had been made stronger, and that they were giving them too much power. He asked if this was a new case. Was it the first time that the Secretary had been called on to communicate a bill? Precedents to sustain the practice might be found in the darkest days, and to show that this course had been sanctioned by the most illustrious names of the republican party of our country. He admitted that it ought not to be an act of every day practice, but when it had been universally admitted that the country was on the edge of a precipice; when it was admitted that the exigencies of the moment were such as to render prompt action necessary, it appeared to him that these little matters of etiquette ought not to have any influence on the Senate.

It had been very properly remarked, that the dreadful condition of the country required instant action. The people had re-elected the Chief Magistrate to the station he now holds by a commanding and overwhelming voice, and this circumstance furnished a reason why this administration should be called on to communicate their views at this great crisis. He believed that their requisitions would not be shrunk from, but that the President and his Cabinet were prepared to meet the great crisis. He believed that they would find no qualms, no disposition to shrink from their duty. If they exhibited any such feeling, he would say they were quite unfit for their high and responsible stations. He could not think that the adoption of this course would compromise the dignity of the Senate, or interfere with their right. The Secretary of the Treasury was the mere agent of this body. It was in no spirit of dictation that the information asked for would be given. The project of the Secretary would challenge just so much admiration as its merits may deserve. In the settlement and adjustment of this great question, he cared not what set of men was employed, or from what department the materials were obtained. His object in urging this matter was for what he considered beneficial purposes. He cared not from what department of the Government aid was invoked. If it could be beneficially exerted at this moment, it ought to be done, for there never was a period when the beneficial action of the Government was more imperatively required.

With these considerations, he had ventured to submit this proposition of the Committee on Finance in lieu of the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi. He understood that the resolution had come into this body with the almost unanimous concurrence of the Committee, who were well aware that the Secretary had all the materials before him for the formation of a project of a bill.

Mr. BIBB said that although he had voted in favor of the consideration of the resolution, he should vote both against the amendment and the resolution. It was his intention to give his vote against both the resolutions. The present was truly deemed an awful emergency. The political atmosphere was black with portentous clouds, which threatened to break in civil war. He wanted to meet the emergency with legislation, as speedily and as efficiently as possible, and not, by pouring oil, to add vigor to the flame which already raged. If the bill or project which was called for from the Secretary would have the effect of uniting the votes of that body, or even would bring about the reduction which was proposed, without losing a vote, he would then vote for it, were it not for yet another reason. He was most anxious to avoid a contest at home, which would array brother against brother, but he would not, in times of such difficulty and danger, consent to establish a precedent which might be productive of future evil. Civil war was undoubtedly one of the greatest of evils, and was to be deprecated by every lover of his country; but there was a still greater evil to be feared in the loss of civil liberty by the concentration of all power in the Executive. What was it which the Senate were asked to do? They are asked to send to the Executive Departments for a bill. This was adopting the British principle in effect. It was the practice in England to send the minister to Parliament with projets; but, instead of doing this, it is now proposed to send to the minister for a project. This practice he deprecated, and against it he would enter his solemn protest. Not that he disagreed with the views. He wanted the information asked for, or something like it. But he was willing to take things as they were. If he could command the affections of men, and was gifted with sufficient powers of persuasion, there should then be no differences of opinion here or in the other House. But let the Senate ask for this project, and let it be stamped with the hand of the Secretary or the President, and they will at once enlist all the old feelings and prejudices, at a moment when an awful catastrophe seemed to be about to break upon the country.

He had now explained his views. -Whether he accorded with others or not, he knew not; but he felt that he had performed his duty. In doing this, he had indulged none but the best feelings towards the Secretary. He believed that this officer had faithfully discharged his duty; and was as willing as any Secretary ever had been to give his views up to discussion. For the possession of manly candor and integrity, he was willing to give him all credit. But it was not necessary to call for his opinion on this subject, because the facts were already before the Senate, and because a bill reported by the Finance Committee, which was a portion of their own body, and was equally bound to their constituents as to the Senate, would be better calculated to unite the opinions of the Senate than any thing which could be obtained from the Treasury Department. He should, therefore, vote against both propositions.

Mr. BUCKNER then stated that as the debate seemed to be far from a close, and as he wished to make a motion relative to the adjournment of the Senate, he would move to lay the resolution and amendment on the table.

Having withdrawn the motion,

Mr. POINDEXTER expressed his hope that the Senate would not consent to lay the subject on the table; but that they would take the vote at once, without further debate, as it was important that, if sent at all, the requisition should be addressed to the Secretary immediately.

Mr. BUCKNER replied that he was not, himself, prepared to vote upon the subject. He required more time for reflection before he should feel his mind at freedom. He then moved to lay the resolution and amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.—Yeas 16, nays 11.

The Senate then adjourned to Thursday.

The Senate was occupied to-day altogether on private bills and other matters, eliciting no debate; and then adjourned to Monday.

REDUCTION OF POSTAGE.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. SPRAGUE on Friday, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to prepare and introduce a bill reducing the rates of postage.

Mr. GRUNDY rose and stated that on the face of the resolution, it appeared to be not a mere resolution of inquiry, but one peremptorily directing the committee to bring in a bill to reduce the rates of postage. If the Senator from Maine would consent to modify the resolution, so as to give it the usual form of an inquiry into the expediency of the measure, he would consent to its adoption; and should a reduction of the postage be found practicable, and could be consistently effected without breaking in upon the Treasury Department, he would co-operate with the Senator from Maine in effecting his object. But he could not consent to such reduction, unless the principle should first be settled by the Senate. He thought it would be injudicious and indiscreet to reduce the rates of postage, without a proper inquiry into the expediency of the measure. No reduction of any importance could be made consistently with the financial situation of the department. He would vote for a simple inquiry, but not for a peremptory instruction, unless the Senate should first sanction the principle. He was against breaking down the department; and provoking, perhaps, future charges of mal-administration when the Senate had committed the fault of abridging the means of the department. If the Senate should wish to make the Post Office a charge on the treasury, so let it be; but let it be done openly, and let an annual appropriation of half a million be made for that object. He moved to amend the resolution, by striking out all after the word "instructed," and inserting the words "to inquire into the expediency of reducing the rates of postage." Then, if the committee saw that it could be done, they would make such reduction as would correspond with the ability of the department, and would report a bill to that effect.

If not, they would report against the measure, and there would be an end of the matter, unless the Senate should decide on a reversal of the report.

Mr. SPRAGUE said that he had presented the resolution in this form, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the Senate whether there should be a reduction of the rates of postage or not. He did not offer the resolution in the usual form of instructing the committee to make an inquiry, because, to speak frankly, the subject had been before the committee during the whole of the last session, and he was not aware that any report had been made. If he was in error on this point, he hoped he should be corrected. He had, during the last session, presented several petitions himself, praying for a reduction, and having felt himself bound to pay some attention to these memorials, he had from time to time made inquiries of the committee, as to the progress of their investigation into the subject, and had been informed that they were attending to it; but he had never been apprized of any report which had been made. What, he would ask, were the opinions of the committee on the subject? There had been a report on the reduction of newspaper postage, but it was composed exclusively of that branch. There had certainly been five petitions, at the least, for a reduction of the postage on letters, which had not been acted on. The report on the newspaper postage was discussed at the last session; and he presumed that members might probably be prepared to come at once to a decision on the reduction of the letter postage, and to make it peremptory on the committee to report a bill, the details of which, and the amount and the mode of reduction, might then be the subject of a future discussion.

As to breaking in upon the treasury for the support of the Post Office Department, it was certainly a question of some moment, but he was not aware that the divorce between the treasury and the department had ever been complete. There never had been a period when the treasury had not contributed to the support of the department. For several years an annual amount of about 70,000 dollars had been appropriated out of the treasury for the support of the officers of the post office. It had been formerly said that in an account current, the Government would be found to be indebted to the department. The Government, it was suggested, was indebted to the amount of half a million annually for the postage of the departments, and the privilege of franking all documents and communications. If so, there could be no great evil, if the Government paid for the amount of the services rendered by the department: and if the Government were to be called on for no further aid, it could be considered as only equal justice if they were to pay for these services. How did it stand now? The channels of information for the people were taxed for the benefit of the Government. It appeared to him that the diffusion of knowledge, of information, through the country, which ought to be, and he presumed was, the primary object of the Post Office Department, made it important that the cost of this transmission should be reduced to as low a rate as possible. This was one of the avowed means of diffusing information among the people, against which there existed no constitutional objection. Were other means of communicating knowledge suggested, constitutional objections were at once raised. But here, through the Post Office Department, a mode presented itself which was not liable to such exception. By its agency, knowledge can be transmitted to the extremities of the Union; and it was important that the diffusion of that intelligence which formed the basis upon which all our institutions rested, which was the life-blood of the community, essential alike to the well-being of the people and of the Government, should be at as low a rate as possible.

Reduction of Postage.

[SENATE.]

The Senate had been called on to reduce other taxes, which were said to be oppressive upon the people, and why not this? If the Government were required to pay their quota, it might enable the department to reduce the general rates of postage one-half; for, taking the average annual amount of postage at two millions, and estimating the Government postage at half a million, the general reduction would not be more than 500,000 dollars to bring the aggregate down to one-half. He thought that the Post Office ought to be called on to make a reduction equal to the Government postage.

He would not urge any observations on the subject of the unproductive post offices, but would conclude with expressing his hope that the Senate would make the instruction peremptory.

Mr. GRUNDY said that the difference between the Senator from Maine and himself was, that the former desired a peremptory direction to the committee, while he, (Mr. G.) wished to have a previous inquiry instituted to ascertain the expediency of the measure. It appeared to be yielded, or at least not controverted, that if there were no other funds than those of the Post Office, it would be improper to reduce the rates of postage, and that it should not be done. But it was said that the Post Office accommodated the Government to the amount of half a million. That he believed, and he had so stated in the report which he had presented to the Senate. But there was a great principle to be settled. Would the Senate consent to make this department a charge on the treasury? If the rates of postage were to be reduced half a million for the first year, must not the tariff duties be reserved to an equal amount? But would it then remain at this point? The Post Office Department he regarded as the most unmanageable of any in the Government. If they were to put the whole of the treasury at the disposal of this department, such were the constant and pressing applications for new expenditures, that it would be found impossible for either the department or Congress to resist the frequent appeals for increased facilities. Take away the check which was to be found in limited resources, and there could be no control exercised over the officers of the department. He intended nothing individually; but let any man be placed in power, with inexhaustible means in his possession, and without any responsibility, and there could be no limit to the lengths he would go. A sense of propriety, it was true, would restrain some men, but this would be found too feeble a restraint to prevent prodigal expenditures.

The question was not as to the propriety of a reduction of postage, but as to the permitting of the department to go to the treasury for its subsistence. The expenditures of the department during the last year exceeded the receipts about 7,000 dollars. But there had been an increase of above 100,000 dollars in the profits; and but for this the department would not have got along. Congress had also required that now, on the 1st of January, there should be put in operation 20,000 additional miles of route. These new routes would impose on the department an additional annual cost of above 100,000 dollars. Ought any further reduction then to be made without some inquiry? He believed that the department should not be supported out of the treasury. There could be no question on the point whether the department could reduce the rates of postage one-fourth, in reliance on its own resources; and he could not therefore vote for a peremptory instruction, although he was willing to vote for an inquiry.

Mr. CLAYTON disavowed any desire to embarrass the department. But he wished to obtain the sense of the Senate on the question of reduction. The gentleman from Tennessee had assigned a reason why there ought to be an inquiry, which he considered to bear strongly against giving to the resolution the usual form. He had showed why, in his opinion, there should be no reduction, and had given the grounds on which he had formed that opinion. The Senate could judge, therefore, of what use it would be to refer it to the committee merely to inquire into the expediency of the measure. A report might, after some weeks, perhaps, be expected against the propriety of any reduction. This was a just inference from the course of the committee last year. The gentleman from Tennessee had urged the same argument now which he advanced last session; that the revenue of the Post Office would not sustain the department without aid from the treasury.

Mr. GRUNDY begged leave to say a word in reply to what had been said concerning the petitions on this subject last year. He was one of the committee to which those petitions were referred. It had been said that the committee did not see fit to report upon the subject. They did not make any specific report in relation to these memorials. They considered that the report made concerning the postage on newspapers covered the whole ground.

Mr. CLAYTON resumed, and asked why the same subject should be again sent to the same committee. To give it that direction would be in effect to decide that the rates of postage ought not to be reduced. The gentleman from Tennessee had said that the rates should not be reduced, because, in that case, the department would become a charge upon the treasury. Probably this might be the case, but this was not a good argument against the measure. It was true, as the gentleman from Tennessee had stated, that the expenditures of the last year exceeded the income; and it was also true, as the Senator from Maine had said, that the department had always been a charge on the treasury. Every year there had been an appropriation made from the treasury for the payment of the officers of the department. Last year the amount was $70,000, and the year before $80,000. It had been a charge on the treasury, and he had no doubt it would continue to be a charge, although he was not prepared to decide on the matter. But he did not see that because the department was likely to be, or was, a charge on the treasury, the rates of postage ought not to be reduced. He thought, with the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SPAULDING,] the diffusion of intelligence among the people was an object of such importance as to demand from the Government a reduction of postage; and he was ready, at any moment, to give his vote in favor of it. He presumed every member of the Senate was ready now to give his decision, and he would not delay it. He hoped the opinion of the Senate on the propriety of the reduction would be expressed now, and that it would not be sent for examination to a committee which had already decided against it.

Mr. HOLMES said it was not his intention to discuss the subject of the Post Office Department much more. It had had its full share of his attention. The great difficulty at this moment seemed to be to determine how the public money was to be disposed of. Now if one department had no money to spare, and another had too much, why could they not be good neighbors and help one another? This was a tax upon consumption. It was no part of the protective system. It did not operate like that system which, by protection, produced competition, and by competition reduced the price of the article. This was a tax upon consumption. He had given notice of his intention to-morrow, to ask leave to bring in a bill amendatory of the acts regulating the Post Office Department, but he could say that there was nothing whatever in that bill which was likely to disturb the nerves of the gentleman from Tennessee. He had not then known the intention of his colleague to offer this resolution. The object of the bill which he was about to introduce was to extend the franking privilege during the recess. There was in it nothing of nullification, nothing of the protective system, nothing of internal improvement. These dreadful words were not even to be found in the bill. He was about to retire from the Senate, perhaps the gentleman from Tennessee was also about to leave this body, and probably the gentleman from Maryland. They had had some experience, and it might be as well that they should have the opportunity of imparting the advantage of their experience to those who might desire it, and to those who were to fill their places.

Mr. FOOT expressed his hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee would not prevail, and that the Senate would now come to a decision on the expediency of the reduction of the rates of postage. He referred to a resolution which he had introduced last session, calling on the department to furnish a statement of the extra allowances made to contractors, &c. in the different States, and to which no answer had been given. The petitions presented to the committee had received no answer. The argument on which the gentleman from Tennessee rested his opposition to any reduction was to him, (Mr. F.) a strong argument in its favor. That gentleman had said, and said truly, that there was a danger that any man would abuse power. Were we to set no limits to the power of the Postmaster General? It was high time to impose some check on this power, and the best way was to reduce the rate of postage. This was one of the greatest taxes on the people of this country; and if the Postmaster General was to have all this under his control, without responsibility, there was great danger of abuse. He hoped the resolution would pass without any further delay, and without any attempt to give it the go by.

Mr. BUCKNER made a few remarks in opposition to the resolution in its original form, and in favor of the amendment. He thought that the duty of committees was to collect and communicate knowledge to Congress and the country, to enable them to form correct judgments in matters of great public concern. This knowledge was not to be extracted by positive commands. The gentleman from Tennessee wished so to modify the resolution as to make it a call on the committee to give their opinion, and this he (Mr. BUCKNER,) deemed the proper course. When the whole object of a resolution was to require the committee to prepare and write a bill, the best course would be, instead of offering a resolution, to ask leave and introduce a bill at once. He did not see what good could come from adopting the course of the gentleman from Maine. Were the committee to be cut off from the opportunity of making a report against the measure? Why are they to be thus tied down? His own opinion was opposed to the propriety of reducing the postage. It would be to take the burden of the tax from the reading part of the community, and to put it upon the unreading, and would not be circulating knowledge gratis. It would be compelling the unenlightened to bear a tax for the enlightened, and would be a direct imposition on the unlearned. He wished for the committee fairly and fully to examine the facts, and to present them, with their opinions, to the Senate.

Mr. BENTON said he would prefer that an instruction be addressed to the department to present to the Senate, at their next session, a new scheme of postage, embracing a reduction which might be carried into operation without injury to the department. In the course of his inquiries and investigation, it had frequently occurred to him that such reduction might be made. In double, treble, and quadruple letters, he thought there was much cause to hope for some beneficial arrangement. If a letter contained the smallest slip of paper, or was enclosed in a cover, or contained a bank note, which could add nothing perceptible to its weight, it is charged with a double, treble, or quadruple postage, which is out of all proportion to the additional expense of transportation. There might also be an improvement in another point.

The present rates of postage was fixed when the area of the population was much more limited than at present, and the distances were comparatively small. The rate of postage for all distances beyond three hundred miles was then fixed at twenty-five cents. Since that time the whole of the Western States has been thrown open, and the mail has to traverse an immense region of territory which has only of late years become known. It seemed but just that the cities in the remotest region of the West should be charged in proportion with those which were nearer. There was room then for improvement by making our views more expanded. He merely threw out these opinions, and left it to others to act upon them. He should be in favor of an instruction to the Postmaster General to furnish at the next session of Congress some scheme of the nature to which he had referred. But he would not now make any specific motion on the subject.

Coming to Congress, at the present session, with feelings deeply impressed by the present condition of the country; believing that if the State vessel in which he had embarked, with all his hopes and interests, should go down, he must go down with her; attending no public meetings; making no patriotic speeches, he had come here prepared by his vote to testify the sincerity of his love for the Union. It was his object, it would be his endeavor to give tranquillity to the country. Now, what was the present proposition? It was to pension the department on the custom house. Let this be done, and let the whole means of the treasury be within the reach of the department, and a time may come when the wishes of every man, who can obtain the interposition of a member of Congress to urge his views, will be gratified at the expense of the country. He then proceeded to expatiate on the injustice of burdening the hard and honest laborer for the benefit of cities.

He looked on this as number two of a series of measures intended to prevent the reduction of the revenues of the country. The bill which was to change our whole system in reference to the public lands, he regarded as number one. What was to become of the proposed reduction of the tariff duties, when the expenses of the public lands, and of the Post Office Department, are to be all thrown on the custom house? He was here to aid in the pacification of the country by his votes, and not by his speeches. Being here for that purpose, he should resist all measures which went to prevent the reduction of the revenue. This he considered as number two of measures to prevent the reduction of the tariff duties, and he, for the sake of the country's peace, should oppose it.

Mr. SPRAGUE said, that when he offered this resolution, he did not believe that a subject on which he supposed that all had made up their minds, would have elicited a debate of this length and latitude. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] had argued the question as if it were a proposition to increase the burthens of the people. And he was certain that any one who had heard a portion of the speech of the Senator from Missouri, and had not understood the exact character of the resolution, would have supposed that the proposition before the Senate was to impose additional burthens on the people. Now, what was the proposition? It was to take off, to diminish the burthens of the people; to rid them of one of the most onerous taxes to which they could be subjected; and a tax, too, upon knowledge, a tax on information, upon the diffusion of which the security and permanency of our republic rests. One gentleman had said that it was a tax on the ignorant part of the country. He (Mr. S.) wished to do away with the ignorant part, and if he could not altogether, he would as far as he could. He would banish ignorance, by diffusing light among the community at a cheaper rate, and thus making the ignorant wise. But it seemed that the blessings of light might not be extended, that information was not to be diffused, the burden of an unequal tax was not to be diminished, and knowledge was not to be disseminated. And why? because it must be paid for; and the apprehension was that those who were not in possession of the greatest share of the advantages were to be slightly taxed for what they did enjoy.

The tax on a letter from a distant friend, what was it to the rich man? It was nothing. But when the poor man received a letter from a distance, he found it something. The postage on newspapers was also very considerable, as it was on every branch of the post office. He would legislate emphatically for the poor and ignorant, by spreading all knowledge through this channel at the least possible cost. He derived his ideas on this subject from the place of his birth. It was there that he was early taught that knowledge for all the community should be paid for by all the community. He derived his views, or prejudices, if so it was considered, from the system of free schools in New England, where the rich man who had no children was taxed for the poor man who had a family, in order that the burden should rest on classes. It was the feeling which he had thus imbibed in infancy, and which had become fixed in maturity, which had induced him to offer the resolution.

But it had been said that this was Chapter 2 of a series of measures to prevent the reduction of the tariff. He had consulted no man before he offered his resolution. He did not know that there was a single Senator who even knew of his intention to offer it. His object was single as it was simple. Whenever the subject of the custom house, and the tariff, and the duties should be specifically before the Senate, he should be prepared to express his opinion by his vote, and by his voice also, if he deemed that his duty required it. He had merely intended to bring before the Senate, at this time, a subject on which he thought that all were prepared to act.

He had stated that he thought Government should pay for the expense of postage. He did not wish to go further. It had been argued that the West ought to be against the reduction, because the East benefited most largely by the transmission of letters. This is in amount to say, the East supports the Government, and must be held to it; and the West must not be permitted to be taxed. He did not believe that the Senate could be brought to listen to an argument of this character.

One gentleman had said, if you once allowed the treasury to be called on, there will be no end to draughts on the treasury. He would merely say, that the treasury always had been called upon. What, then, became of this argument? It had also been alleged, that his resolution allowed no latitude to the committee, and that he had thus been deficient in courtesy. When it was known that he had presented petitions to the committee, and that they had held them in their hands several months, it could imply no want of courtesy in him to present a resolution which emphatically called for some action. His object was to produce reduction. It had been said that no latitude was allowed to the committee. Now, he was of opinion that there was great latitude allowed: the mode of reduction and the amount were left to the discretion of the committee, because he believed that their knowledge made them better qualified to fix these points, and that they were most able to prepare the details of a bill. It was his wish that they should mature a scheme of reduction, and present it to the Senate.

The gentleman from Tennessee had produced an argument which he (Mr. S.) must confess, however plausible it might appear, had no weight with him. That Senator had stated, that this was the most unmanageable of all the departments; that there was a want, not in the present incumbent, of responsibility, which, if once a resort to the treasury were allowed, would prevent any limitation of draughts hereafter. He (Mr. S.) believed it was perfectly true that, of all the departments of the Government, there was less responsibility in the post office, and a more unlimited discretion, and a greater latitude in the application of the funds of the department in the making of contracts and extra allowances, at the mere will and pleasure of the Postmaster General, than in any other department. There had been a degree of latitude allowed which was extremely impolitic and dangerous. Why was this? It was the people's money. Why had it never been looked into? Why had one man been permitted to expend thousands and hundreds of thousands among contractors, to liquidate such claims as they might bring forward, and no examination had been instituted? He made no charge against any individual. He merely stated the fact, that all this unlimited discretion had existed, without supervision and without control. Why, he would ask, was this? It had been suffered to exist, because the funds had been furnished by the department. So said the gentleman from Tennessee, who seemed to think it quite sufficient to show that all was paid out of the funds of the department, as much as to say, you have nothing to do with this. He (Mr. S.) observed, that there was not a department of the Government in which there was one-tenth part of the patronage to be found which was now exercised by the head of the Post Office Department.

If the post office were to be subjected to the annual scrutiny with which the appropriation bill is watched, or to the specific action of Congress, the responsibility of the department would be increased two-fold, and there would be an effectual check on its expenditures. He was not afraid, in this view, of the effect of an alliance with the treasury: there would then be more scrutiny and more caution. Nor did he think it an objection, that the Government should pay for the amount of its postage. He did not wish to throw this department on the treasury, but he had no apprehension of it. He had no objection to postpone his resolution for the present, if the Senate were not prepared to act upon it.

Mr. GRUNDY expressed a perfect willingness that the resolution should at once be acted on. Whatever the Senator from Maine might wish, as to the effect of the reduction, every step taken in the business leads indirectly to the result of making the department a charge upon the treasury. The money subtracted from the post office must be made up by the treasury. The department could not apply any where else for it. And the effect of a reduction of postage must be to prevent a reduction of the tariff to precisely an equal amount. Such must be the effect. That the necessary expenditures of the Government must be the limit of its revenue, was a doctrine to which the public mind was rapidly conforming. One of the most ingenious modes which can be adopted for keeping up the tariff at its present level, was that of keeping up the expenditures of the Government to the present amount of its revenue, instead of bringing down the taxes to the limit of the necessary expenditures. He was no advocate of a tariff, especially of a high one; and as the department had heretofore sustained itself, he had no wish to sanction any measure which would make it burdensome hereafter. The department had always sustained itself, with the exception of the annual appropriation of about sixty or seventy thousand dollars for clerks; and as a set-off to this should be taken into consideration the franking privilege given to members. When he saw the first Senator from Maine rise in his place, and then the Senator from Delaware, and then the other gentleman from Maine, he felt a variety of apprehensions from such an apparent concert of action. But now that he understood that each was acting for himself, he felt himself greatly relieved. He was glad to find that each Senator was acting for himself, per se, and that they are not in alliance. He did not know what to think of the proposed bill of the Senator from Maine, (Mr. HOLMES.) He could not tell that any thing was likely to be gained in intelligence from the members who were going out of that body. They would, in all probability, be regarded as politically dead, defunct, and would soon be forgotten. The gentleman from Maine might be considered as gone forever beyond all hope. As for himself, he had yet a glimmering hope remaining; it might, perhaps, like many other of the hopes of that side the House, end in disappointment; but however that might be, he trusted the Senate might be able to get along tolerably well without him. He had frequent business at the Post Office Department, and generally found members of Congress there. It sometimes happened that a contractor took it into his head that it would be more to his interest to carry a mail three times a week, than to take it twice; and he accordingly prevailed on the member of Congress from his district to go to the department and express the expediency of the change. The next year the same contractor may have discovered that he can make still more by having a daily mail. The member of Congress is again called upon, and the contractor being a man of influence must have his wishes gratified. The Postmaster General ought to be armed with some weapon to defend himself against these attacks. He might now say that the resources of the department would not permit this increased expenditure; but let the treasury once be opened to the department and the member of Congress, and the contractor would soon find it out, and there would no longer be a limit to applications and to expenditures. There would, in fact, be no other check than a money limitation; and the navy and army would not cost the country more than the Post Office Department might, and would, if the barrier between it and the treasury were to be removed.

The gentleman from Connecticut was very anxious for a reduction of the postage because Major Barry had not answered before the end of the year the call made by that Senator at the last session. Was there any force in that argument? The object of the resolution was to ascertain the amount of the expenditures on account of the mail in each State. Now, because that call had not been answered, the Senator from Connecticut would reduce the rates of postage. He must confess that he did not quite understand this logic. If that resolution had been answered, and it had been shown that the State of Connecticut paid more of this tax than Kentucky, which had twice her population, here would have been a theme for an argument most grateful to Connecticut, and which the Senator would doubtless have made good use of. But there was another little matter which the Senator would probably not have touched upon. He would have left the subject of the expenditures in Connecticut in ships, and harbors, and light-houses, to have been disclosed by some other Senator. Yet, if all things were taken into view, if all expenditures were balanced, there would appear to be nothing unjust nor unfair. The popular plan was to point out to any particular section something in which they appeared to be oppressed, without making the view general; and thus to excite discontent against the Government. These remarks, however, had no application to the tariff, which, in his opinion, formed a just exception every where to the observation.

Mr. FOOT said, the gentleman from Tennessee seemed to think that there was no relevance between the call which he had made at the last session and the present resolution. That Senator, however, had attached an importance to the call which it had never possessed before, in his estimation. That gentleman knew nothing of Connecticut; it was not a complaining State, although there was perhaps as much intelligence diffused over it as over any other State of the Union. The people there never made complaints, but cheerfully bore their proportion of the public burdens. He believed the Post Office Department would sustain itself, and would at last intrench itself so strongly as to be out of the reach of even the power of Congress itself. Several calls had already been made to which no answers had been returned. As to the tariff, he saw no connexion between that and the present resolution. The resolution might have the effect of checking the department; and to check it, he would go still further, and put an end to the practice of making extra allowances to contractors. There was enough expended in the department to diffuse information through all the country. He was in favor of the resolution, and against the amendment, and he hoped nothing would be done to give the resolution the go by.

Mr. HOLMES said, the Chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads had talked of dissatisfaction. What did he mean by dissatisfaction? The country was in the hey-day of prosperity: all the wishes of the other side of the House had been gratified. Was there any dissatisfaction there? We, said Mr. H., on this side of the House, do not complain, although we have been whipped abominably twice. There is no dissatisfaction on this side. The gentleman from Tennessee has got his President, and his Vice President, and his Cabinet, yet he talks of dissatisfaction.

The gentleman at the head of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads says this is an unmanageable department. Upon my soul, I believe so. Since he and I have been together on the committee, I believe it has been found to be unmanageable. I will insist further, from being unmanageable it may have become a managing department and whenever we find we have a managing department, we should keep it constantly in our view. This department has great power to manage, while it is irresponsible. What is the cause of prodigality in a servant? Irresponsibility. Why does a servant squander the property of his master? Because he is not responsible. The conclusion is inevitable. Whenever you trust a man with untold gold, he will usually tell out a tolerable quantity to himself. I make no charge, but merely point to the conclusion. It is a general maxim, an axiom in Government, that while you hold officers to responsibility, they will be found prudent; but when you relax the responsibility, they will become prodigal. There are, it is true, some men who will be economical without responsibility. The Chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads thinks my case beyond all hope. I think it is so; I have declined. Some say my popularity declined first, and I declined afterwards. Perhaps I and my popularity both declined together. Now the gentleman from Tennessee has not declined. How stands it with his popularity? Have they kept pace together? I have taken no part against his re-election, although it has been said that he is as cunning as a fox. But if we get another in his room, I am afraid it will be getting out of the frying pan into the fire. The gentleman had said, that he would not make the post office a charge on the treasury, lest the opportunity for lavish expenditures should be abused by an improvident extension of the post roads. If the gentleman were to carry that principle through, he would not go far with this administration. The gentleman would not permit the Postmaster General to have unbounded resources, because he would not then have the excuse, when pressed by applicants, that the funds were insufficient. Needs he such an excuse? Are not the men to whom these high offices are entrusted, men so firm that they can refuse when their duty requires it? He would give the Postmaster General power, presuming that he would never want an excuse for the performance of his duty. If a political friend asked him for an increase of compensation, he would not, if a correct and faithful officer, hesitate to refuse. Let the responsibility be increased; and if the officer abuses the means intrusted to him, Congress would have the power to apply a corrective. If the course once suggested here had not been also arrested here, none of these allowances to contractors would have been heard of; but the responsibility would have been found effectual. He would hold every officer to his responsibility.

Mr. GRUNDY asked for the yeas and nays on the passage of his amendment; and a sufficient number sustaining the call, the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BIBB made some remarks in opposition to the resolution; in the course of which he adverted to the fact that a merchant in Kentucky having got for himself the situation of postmaster, had thereby saved to himself in postage two hundred dollars, which was more than the amount of all the other postage in his office, as he kept up a considerable correspondence for the benefit of his business. There the postage tax fell on those who best could bear it. He went on to show that this was generally the case. He considered it a matter of great labor and intricacy, requiring elaborate calculation, to arrange a perfect scheme of reduction of postage, adapted to all distances; and doubted whether the post office itself could furnish the materials for such calculation. He contended that the present tax was not oppressive on any one, but that it operated as every fair tax ought to operate. At the last session he had expressed his opinions on the subject of the reduction of the newspaper postage: those opinions had undergone no change. He then adverted to our rapidly increasing population; settlements were extending themselves; and the voice of justice, in a tone not to be resisted, demanded that the Government should carry into those new settlements the benefits which were already enjoyed in the old. This constantly increases the expenditures of the department; the expenditures must continue to increase, as the ramifications of the system are extended into all parts of the country. It should be the aim of Congress to keep the expenditures of the department, as nearly as possible, within the receipts, avoiding at the same time that minuteness of legislation which entailed more cost upon the country than the subject was worth. The Postmaster General felt himself bound to keep the cost of all his improvements within the means of the department. If this check were taken away, and he was permitted to come to Congress, he would be unable to resist the temptations which would surround him. Experience every where had proved, that the Post Office Department can only be beneficially managed by subjecting it to this check; and the moment it is removed, the advantages of the system are destroyed. Dr. Franklin established the department on a small scale: it had from that time been extending itself to keep pace with the extension of the country; but it had always been kept within this check, and he would not be willing to break in upon it, because we should inevitably have to return to it. Whenever a specific scheme of reduction should be presented for consideration, he would be glad to examine it; but he was not one for rashly uprooting every thing. He was not one who, to obtain a favorite point, would throw every thing into confusion. He would not, to get rid of an imagined wrong, go into a convention of all the States, frame a new constitution, and throw every thing into chaos. So it was in regard to the post office. He would keep it within the checks with which it had always been surrounded, and not, by a rash inundation of means, render it a rank source of corruption, instead of a department useful to the country.

The Senate then adjourned to Wednesday.

WEDNESDAY, JAN. 2, 1833.

SPANISH CLAIMANTS.

Mr. HOLMES offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing the means by which the claimants under the late treaty with France can obtain the evidence of documents relating to their claims, when such evidence and documents have been presented to the commissioners under the late treaty with Spain, and are deposited in the State Department.

Mr. HOLMES introduced the resolution with some remarks, and stated that the commissioners acting under the treaty with Spain had, after the termination of their labors, lodged the papers in the Department of State, as was supposed for the purpose of allowing to the Spanish Government access to these documents, in case of need. He referred to the case of a friend, whose bill had been before the Spanish Commissioners, and had been rejected, on the ground that the capture was made by a French vessel. Through him (Mr. H.) this gentleman had made application to the State Department to procure his papers: but owing to the construction which the Secretary had put upon his duties, it was found impossible to obtain them. The case having been taken out of the hands of the Spanish Commissioners by the rejection of the claim, the papers could be of no future use to the Spanish Government, and ought to be returned to the claimant.

Mr. WEBSTER admitted that cases of individual inconvenience might have occurred, like that which was referred to by the gentleman from Maine, but he had never anticipated that it would be thought necessary to invoke the action of Congress. It was provided by the treaty with Spain, that the documents should be deposited in the Department of State. There would consequently be some delicacy in interfering with this provision. He considered that the whole of the difficulty had arisen from the narrow construction which had been given to the term State Department. There was no precise locality to be attached to the term. It merely meant that the papers should be left in the custody of the Executive. He could not decide whether the doubts of the gentleman at the head of the department were well or ill founded, but there could be no impropriety in making use of the papers, while they were under the control of the department. It might not be correct to give them up to any individual, but an inspection of them under the charge of some officer of the Government, to whom they were intrusted, would be the kind of facility which would not come in conflict with the meaning of the treaty. He was certain that the Secretary of State would be ready to render every accommodation which he regarded as being within the range of his duty.

Mr. HOLMES repeated what he had said concerning the difficulty he had found in obtaining what he wished. His object now was the institution of an inquiry which would lead to some arrangement between the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Secretary. He referred to a correspondence which he had had with the Secretary. He had asked if the claimants could have the papers. The answer was "No." He then asked if the commissioners could obtain them, and received also a negative reply.

Mr. SPRAGUE reminded the Senate, that when the act of Congress was under consideration, he had offered an amendment with a view to meet cases of the precise character of that which had now occurred. It was then stated by those who had the views of the department, that it was unnecessary, and that the fourth section made ample provision. Such was the opinion of the department, and such also was the opinion of the Senate. Now, it was found that there was a difficulty; and it was proper that there should be some inquiry.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Reduction of Postage.

REDUCTION OF POSTAGE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. SPRAGUE'S resolution on the subject of the reduction of postage.

Mr. EWING said, that, when this resolution was offered by his friend from Maine, he did not himself suppose that the opinion of the committee was such as required these special instructions in order to attain the object in view. I was well aware (said Mr. E.) that, at the last session, a majority of the committee was opposed to a reduction of the rates of postage; but, since that time, one of its members has ceased to be a member of this body, and the Senator from Missouri (Mr. BUCKNER) has been placed on the committee in his stead. But, since that gentleman has expressed his opinion here so decidedly adverse to the proposed reduction, it is clear that there is the same majority as formerly against it in the committee; and that, if we have any action on the subject there, it must come to us charged with instructions from the Senate. I, sir, have been, and still am, in favor of some reduction, and some modification in our rates of postage. I am satisfied that justice and sound policy require it; nor do I think that the efficiency of the department, or the fiscal concerns of the country, will be injuriously affected by such a measure, if it be judiciously executed.

The Senator from Missouri furthest to my left (Mr. BENTON) was right in saying that a reduction of impost is not always a reduction of revenue. It would not be so here, to the full extent: for, by lessening the postage on letters, you will increase their number; and packages, also, which, at the present rates of postage, seek other modes of conveyance, would be forwarded by mail, if it could be done at a reasonable cost. I agree, also, with that gentleman, in the opinion that there is an unreasonable discrimination between single and double letters; and, at the last session, I suggested (in committee) a modification which was intended to remove the inequality, but it was not acted on. A letter written upon a large sheet of cap paper pays twenty-five cents postage if carried four hundred miles. If it be written on but half a sheet of paper, no matter how thin and light, and contains a separate scrap of paper, however small, it pays double; if it contains two bank notes, which do not add perceptibly to its weight, it pays treble postage. Now there is no good reason for this, the bandage (to use a term of art) on each letter is the same, the weight of the double or treble letter is often much less than that of the single one, and yet it pays twice or three times as much. This is manifestly unjust, and requires correction.

From this concurrence of opinions as to the premises, I confidently expected that the Senator from Missouri would arrive at the same conclusion with myself; but in this I was mistaken. I will not quarrel with his logic, though I cannot assent to its correctness.

I was not a little struck with the views of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BRIBB.] That gentleman moved a resolution at the last session to abolish the duty on newspapers: he is still in favor of that proposition, but is unwilling to leave the matter, or reduction generally, to the committee: it were, he says, intrusting them with too extensive powers. He therefore goes for the amendment which instructs them to inquire into the expediency of reducing, and thereby leaves their powers wholly unlimited.

The facts communicated by the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads furnish strong reasons for the adoption of this resolution. He tells us, and I rely implicitly on his authority, that the department now not only sustains itself with its own income, but that it performs services for the United States to the value of more than $500,000 yearly in the transmission of official letters and documents free of postage. Now, how is the department enabled to render all this gratuitous service? The answer is obvious. The postage which is received on private letters, over and above the fair cost of their transmission, pays also for the transportation of these official letters and documents; or, in other words, those who write and receive private letters pay a tax for so doing to the amount of $500,000 annually. Now, I do not deny, that, in cases of great national emergency, when all the resources of the country are required to be called forth, that these also ought to contribute what it may to sustain the Government; but surely the transmission of knowledge, the transmission of letters of business or of friendship from one part of the Union to another, should be among the last subjects of taxation to which we should resort. It is not true, in fact, as has been suggested, that it is the rich who read and write, and therefore pay this tax; and if it were true, it forms no substantial argument in its favor. But the fact is distinctly otherwise: it is to the rich, or those who are comparatively so, that letters, papers, and public documents are sent under official franks, and for the transportation of which those who write and receive private letters pay. The man of business pays a large amount of postage, but it is repaid to him by those who employ him; and the merchant charges his postage as a part of the cost of his goods, and his customers pay it; so that at last this burden falls, like most others, upon the mass of the people.

In addition to this, the poorest portion of our community, even the day-laborer who has emigrated from the old to the new States, and who has left parents or friends behind him, pays now a tax to the Government for the privilege of reading or having read to him the news from his native place, or the simple effusions of parental or fraternal love. Justice, it is true, requires that he should pay the reasonable cost of transmission; but in the present state of our finances, there is no reason why he should be charged beyond it. The same rule applies to all, whatever be their condition. The transmission of intelligence, the interchange of opinions and affections between individuals in different sections of the Union, should be countenanced rather than discouraged; and a tax imposed upon these, for any purpose, except in cases of necessity, is injudicious. If I be right in this, and if the chairman be right in his view which he exhibited of the state of the department, the postage ought to be reduced in the aggregate about $500,000—the sum which appears to be levied through the department for the use of the Government.

I cannot concur with gentlemen who think that it would occasion extravagance of expenditures, if the department were permitted to receive through the treasury any portion of its support. The honorable chairman has said, that, of all the departments of the Government, this is the most unmanageable. If, by this, he means the least responsible, I concur with him. Sir, there is more than two millions of dollars annually received there, and disbursed, we know not how. It is true, we are told in the reports of the Postmaster General that this aggregate sum, or near it, is expended in the transmission of the mails; but the precise manner is not at all disclosed to us. We know not how much is sunk in affording those unreasonable facilities which the honorable chairman says are so often asked, and are pressed for with such earnestness that they can be limited only by limiting the means of the department. How much in extra allowances to contractors, and how much in changes of contracts from hand to hand, on terms disadvantageous to the Government! We know nothing of this, nor can we ever know, while the present system remains untouched, and the committee unchanged. As a matter of theory, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which I belong, have a right to inquire into these things; and if there be improvidence and waste, or misapplication of the funds of the department, to disclose it to this body, that it may be exposed to the public. But our excellent chairman, tender of the labor of some of his committee, and prodigal of his own, has been a kind of middle man between us and the department, and has dealt out to us just so much information as he considered salutary and suitable for us to receive. Over and again has it been attempted in this body to look into the affairs of the department, but always has the honorable chairman extended his broad ægis over them, and all beneath has been thus far sheltered by its ample shade. In truth, sir, as long as this department shall be sustained entirely by its own receipts, without resort to the treasury, there will be an indisposition here to scrutinize its disbursements. And it is unsafe, and contrary to the whole theory of our Government, to intrust to any officer the disbursement of large sums of the public money without accountability, and without scrutiny. I bring no charge against the present head of this department. I rest my views on general principles, and hold it most certain that if there be not now waste and mismanagement there, there will be; for it is inherent in the very nature of the system, as it now exists.

But, sir, if the rates of postage were so modified that the department must resort to the treasury annually for a sum about equivalent to the value of the services which it renders, (and I would not consent to go beyond this point,) the amount and the manner of its expenditures would become a subject of investigation before the committees of Congress. We always realize the fact that the money in the treasury is the public money, while the public money in the hands of the Postmaster General is, I know not why, looked upon as the money of the department. There would, therefore, be more restraint and less danger of extravagant expenditures in that, than in the existing state of things.

Mr. KANE then rose to state his objections to the resolution in the form in which it was offered by the Senator from Maine. In that form it gave no discretion to the committee to deviate from the peremptory instructions of the resolution. It did not give the power to inquire into any abuses which might exist; it gave none to equalize the rates of postage. What, in fact, was it? The original resolution directs the committee to bring in a bill volens volens, and without saying why, to reduce the rates of postage. And the Senate were now called on to say, not whether the committee should go into an inquiry on the subject, but whether the rates of postage should be reduced or not. He said that he was not prepared to give his vote on a question of so much importance.

He admitted that there was one point on which all seemed to agree. If the rates of postage could be reduced consistently with the means of the department, and without embarrassing its operations in any degree, all were willing that the reduction should take place. And there was a class of Senators who were willing to make the reductions, even if the operations of the department could be carried on with the assistance of the treasury. He did not belong to the latter class, although he was one of those who agreed that if the rates could be reduced without embarrassing the means of the department, it ought to be done. But unless he was prepared to admit that the administration of the department hitherto had been corrupt, and its expenditures characterized by profligacy, he could not vote for the resolution in its original form. Because the committee at the last session had come to the conclusion that there ought to be no reduction of the rates of postage, it had been contended that there was no way left but to give a peremptory instruction to report a bill. He was not prepared, unless without further investigation, to set up his opinion against those of the committee, whose attention had been long and sedulously addressed to the subject. It was easy for gentlemen to get at their object, and it might be done in one of two ways: in the first place, if the committee should make a report unfavorable to the object, it would be easy to move to refer that report to the Judiciary Committee, where its errors might be revised and corrected. The other mode was to introduce a bill on leave, stating the amount and mode of reduction; that bill would be sent to the committee, and if they reported against it, their report would come up before the Senate, where it would be reversed if wrong, and confirmed if right. He was prepared to vote for the amendment, or he was willing to refer the subject to a select committee, for the purpose of inquiry, but he was not prepared to set up his opinion against that of the committee. If he was in possession of sufficient data, he would have no objection to vote for a peremptory instruction.

Mr. BUCKNER commenced a series of observations by disclaiming all sectional feelings and views, which he declared he had never allowed to influence his opinions and actions, and he hoped he never should. On the contrary, he was in favor of every thing, the tendency of which was to promote the interests of the whole. The hasty remarks which he had made when this subject was before the Senate on a former day, had not been dictated by a spirit of envy or jealousy. In reference to the effect which this resolution would have on the interests of the West, he had spoken of it as unreasonable that the members from that section of country should vote for a proposition which bore injuriously upon their own constituents; but he merely intended by these observations to stand by the interests of those he represented, as other gentlemen from other sections of the country would feel disposed to do. He had stated that he was opposed to a resolution which compelled the West to pay the postage of the East. So far from intending an appeal to the West, it was his object to address himself to the generosity of the East, and to invoke their feelings of magnanimity in aid of his views. He did not desire the West to be influenced by sordid prejudices; but that the East should be actuated by noble views. The Senator from Maine had said that he was desirous to diffuse knowledge and dispel ignorance. He also was willing to diffuse knowledge and dispel ignorance; but he would not put his hand in another man's pocket for the purpose of showing his charity. He would not put his arm, up to the elbow, into the treasury, to display his kindness to any particular part of the Union. How was this proposition to be considered? The gentleman from Maine proposed, not that every man should pay for his own learning, but that the poor and honest yeomanry should be taxed in order to accommodate the rest of the community. Was this the way to diffuse knowledge? Every man ought to pay for what he received; and to tax another for it was unjust. If the East paid the greatest share of the tax, it was because it had the greatest share of advantage. He who received the greatest benefit ought to pay the greatest share of the cost.

He went on to state that where there was most traffic there was the greatest necessity for the information circulated through the post office, and there the greatest amount of postage should be paid. The East had the greatest share of trade, and if it was taxed the most heavily, it was to pay for its own postage, and not the postage of the West. He expressed his regret that any proposition should be introduced at this time; the tendency of which was to increase the agitations which now disturbed the country. While he was one who would not add to the present excitement, he would not be induced to refrain from taking every step necessary for the public interest, but, at the same time, he would not sanction the introduction of new schemes. He was not one of those who imagined that any great danger now beset the Union, or that the moment had arrived when this fair fabric of human wisdom was about to be destroyed; for he looked to the operation of a redeeming principle which existed in it. He relied, in a great measure, on the chief mag-trate, who had sworn to support, and who would maintain the constitution; and most of all, he relied on the patriotism of the people; but he was not disposed to throw an additional firebrand to destroy the harmony of the country. There were two great objects which seemed to be kept in view by one of the great parties, to prevent any reduction of the tariff duties, and to keep up the price of the public lands. One part of the country was opposed to the first measure, and another section to the last. It was not to be expected that members from the South and the West, who believed the salvation of the Union depended on the reduction of the tariff, and the price of public lands, would vote for any of those measures which threw additional burdens on the treasury. Such were his views; and no ingenuity, no argument, no sophistry, would induce him to move from the course which his duty enjoined on him to pursue. His mind was made up. It was unnecessary for him to disguise himself; the time had come when the tariff and the price of public lands must be reduced; and all the schemes to keep them up to their present scale could not succeed. The tariff must and would come down; and they could not consent to put the public lands on the treasury. It was necessary to see where retrenchment could be made, in order that all unnecessary burdens might be abolished.

Returning to the subject of the post office, he said it might be true that the East paid more for the facilities afforded by the post office than the West. But suppose it were so; were there not other points where the East received more than a quid pro quo? was this no consideration? The greater part of the pension money was expended there. True, it was said, there was more patriotism, more industry, in that part of the country, and it might be so. The West made no complaint; but how many citizens of Missouri, or of Indiana, were employed by the Government, or supported by the public treasury? The advantages of the post office to the West were more than compensated by the greater advantages enjoyed by the East.

The gentleman from Ohio had said that the committee held the same opinions on the subject of reduction now, which they held last year. How the gentleman came to this conclusion, he did not know. This was not the same proposition as was before the committee last year. There was a great difference between taking the postage from newspapers and reducing the postage on letters. By the adoption of this resolution, the Senate did not ask the committee if it was necessary to reduce the rates, but they decided that it was necessary, and that they should be reduced. No discretion whatever was allowed to the committee, although they would be enabled to give that information which would satisfy the Senate as to the propriety of reduction. He desired to send the subject to the committee, and, after they had reported, the Senate could dispose of the report as they might decide. He considered the views taken by the Senator from Ohio, of the oppressiveness of this tax upon the poor man, by compelling him to pay a portion of the Government postage, to be a fallacious one. The burden fell very lightly on the poor man, who did not get a letter once in six months; the poor well understood the matter; they had both heads and hearts; they knew when they asked for a fish, and received a stone.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said the resolution of his honorable friend from Maine submitted to the opinion of the Senate the simple proposition, that the rates of postage ought to be reduced. It prescribed neither the mode, amount, nor time of reduction; but in the present condition of the Post Office Department, with all its facilities and receipts, the resolution sought of the Senate an expression favorable to some alleviation of a very onerous and unequal tax upon the business part of the community. Yet, Mr. President, this proposition, so general and peaceful in its character, has been assailed by a most extraordinary course of argument. Its friends have been charged with an almost treasonable conspiracy to keep on the tariff, and to continue the present price of the public lands. We have been directly informed, that the tariff and this price must come down; that we are not to flinch from it, for the people demand it. Sir, does the resolution on your table, when duly considered, touch either of those subjects? or are we justly chargeable with aggravating the excitement of this too much agitated country? Why, Mr. President, so far as honorable gentlemen have given us their views on the proposition, the most of them, and some from the far West too, are friendly to the reduction of the postage, if it can be safely made. Why then should a plain question of practical expediency be distracted in its discussion, by imputations of hostility to the wishes of a part of the country in the matters of the tariff and the public lands? Sir, no Senator will be driven from his duty; no one, it is hoped, means to evade the tariff question, or flinch in the discharge of his official obligations, when it comes up for our deliberation. But, said Mr. F., all we ask is, that it may wait its time; and not that it should embarrass all our legislation, and be raised up, by way of terror, against any and every measure that, by its own distinct merits, claims our distinct consideration.

Then, sir, as it regards the resolution now before us, it is worthy of notice, that the present rates of postage have been established for more than twenty years. The great increase of commercial business, and of the literary, political, and friendly intercourse of our fellow-citizens in that period, have vastly augmented the powers and enlarged the means of this department. I should probably be on this side of the fact, to set down these resources at an increase of tenfold? We are also to take into our reflections another incident: that in the principal commercial routes of the mail, from Boston through to Baltimore for example, the cost of transportation has not advanced a dollar in all the time of the present rates; nay indeed, sir, by the facilities of steamboat carriage, it has sensibly diminished. Then I submit it to the calm discretion of the Senate, whether the occasion has not reached us, when it is fit, and a most appropriate duty, to give attention to the strong claims of those who chiefly endure this burden, and extend some seasonable relief?

But it has been urged in opposition to the measure, that we shall thereby cripple the department, and that the Postmaster General should not be restricted in his operations. This argument, said Mr. F., is pressed too far. When it is seen from the report of the head of this department, that during a single year, and that the last, the travel of the mail has been increased exceeding 8,156,000 miles, while it reflects great credit upon the activity and promptitude of the department, yet Mr. President, do not such numbers as these justify the opinion, in the view of the heavy rates of postage, that some restriction may be not only quite safe but very prudent?

Again: we are told that the post office must not be made a drain upon the treasury, but be left to sustain itself. This plea is fallacious, and the mere magic of phrases may mislead us.

Sir, what is intended by the department sustaining itself? It has no means but those furnished by taxation. It is the people that sustain the department: and therefore, when in our judgment the amount of support afforded becomes greater than the just wants of public convenience, or the fair and equal proportion of burdens that should be assessed upon those who pay—why, if, notwithstanding this, gentlemen mean, by sustaining itself, that it is to use up all the funds that flow into it, be they what they may, sir, all must feel that such an argument is without weight or reason. We must look beyond the post office; to those who contribute its means, and by righteous measures, apportion their burdens.

Moreover, Mr. President, this establishment, immensely enlarged as it has been, does sustain itself and more. We have the statement, on the official authority of the Postmaster General, that for the last year, notwithstanding the multiplication of mail routes, far surpassing any former year, the nett receipts have exceeded those of the year preceding $260,000, and which sum will exceed the additional amount required for transportation by more than a $100,000. With such abundant prosperity, why should we hesitate to consider and act in this matter, when gentlemen who oppose profess entire willingness to reduce the postage, if the department can bear it?

It was insisted in further objection to the resolution, that it left but little discretion to the Post Office Committee; and, indeed, restrained it to a degree almost disrespectful. Why, sir, this is urging difficulties a great way. The proposition is of most general import. The Senate will fix nothing but the propriety of a reduction, and then refer over to the committee the entire subject, with all its details. It will leave them to arrange the rates after juster proportions, to report on what items a reduction should be made, and to ascertain the amount. And if there be a majority of the Senate in favor of the proposition, it is surely desirable, even to the committee, that it should be known; as we now understand, that no bill for a reduction of the postage will be reported from that committee, unless upon such a resolution as is under consideration.

And, in conclusion, to evince the pacific character of the resolution, in defence against the charge of harsh interference with the duties of the department and the committee, take the case of postage on single and double letters. Why, there is no one who doubts the arbitrary disproportion of the assessment. That a letter paying twenty-five cents postage should pay fifty for another leaf, or even any small fragment of it, is an inequality that can be justified on no principle; and so it has been conceded in argument at this time. Then, Mr. President, a reduction of this rate should the committee be unwilling to go further, would meet and justify the whole scope of the resolution. The truth is, there are no serious difficulties whatever in the way of a proper adjustment, and he hoped that the amendment would not prevail, but a distinct instruction be sent to the committee for a bill to reduce the rates of postage.

Mr. POINDEXTER said that in order to prevent any misapprehension as to his vote, he wished to state that in voting against the amendment, and for the original resolution, he did not intend to commit himself to vote for any bill which might be reported. He thought some reductions of the rates of postage necessary. The bill would be of course reported in blank, and it would be for the Senate to fill up the blanks. He should, therefore, without entering into the various topics which had been brought into this discussion, vote for the instruction, leaving it to be determined hereafter how far reduction ought to be carried. The subjects of the tariff and the public lands, which had been mixed up with this debate, he considered as extraneous. Whenever those subjects should come up, he would be prepared to give his vote upon them. For the present, without entering into any of the details of the subject, he should vote for the resolution in its original form.

Mr. GRUNDY said he did not rise to go into this debate again, but merely to express what, in his view, would be the duty of the committee. Should the amendment be rejected, and the resolution be adopted in its original form, the committee, without regard to the means of the department, would of course report a bill making substantial reductions in the rates of postage. They would be compelled to do so, under the mandate of the Senate. But if the amendment was adopted, what then? He thought the committee, if they were of opinion that reductions consistent with the means of the department could be made, would report a bill making such reductions as would leave no funds at the discretion of the department. But if they were ordered in the peremptory terms of the resolution, the committee could not fail to report a substantial reduction, even if it should take half a million or a million out of the treasury.

Mr. BIBB, in rising, said he did not design to take any further part in the general discussion. The argument was now reduced to a single point, and every Senator had to make up his opinion on the alternative, whether the department should be burdened on the treasury, or sustained by its own funds. According to the report of the Postmaster General, there was now a surplus of $100,000 over the expenses of the department, and this calculation was bottomed on the account of the whole postage receipts without diminution, leaving nothing for losses or deficiencies, and it was allowed on the understanding that no new mail routes were to be established. Without looking to contingencies or future extension, we are now to dispose of this $100,000. The whole revenue of the department appeared to be about $2,200,000, and upon this sum a reduction to the amount of $100,000 would be in the proportion of about four and a half per cent. This was all which could be touched. They were now required to take off a cent from every six cents postage, and they would thus be going into fractional reductions which would be productive of great inconvenience, both to the individual and to the department. He would ask if it was proper for the Senate to legislate for the purpose of making a reduction of four and a half per cent. It was too small a subject for legislation. He had last session been in favor of a reduction of the postage on newspapers, but it was a definite reduction, which left it clear what amount would remain in the department. In the present case, no one could tell the effect of the reductions, or how much the reductions were to be. He could not vote for so indefinite a proposition.

Mr. SPRAGUE said that the reasons which he had presented on a former day in favor of the original resolution, had, in his opinion, received no satisfactory answer. He did not now intend to recapitulate them, but merely to notice, very briefly, the remarks which had just been offered in favor of the amendment. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] says that a reduction of four and a half per cent. would be but a very trifling affair, unworthy of attention and inconvenient in its operation. But who has proposed such a reduction? Not my resolution, nor any gentleman who has sustained it; nobody but the honorable member himself has suggested four and a half per cent. as the extent of the diminution. It is his own proposition, then, which the gentleman pronounces to be insignificant and vexatious, and I certainly have no disposition to interpose between him and his offspring. The chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads [Mr. GUNN] has presented, in various forms, and under all its aspects, the objection that a reduction will involve the necessity of calling upon the national treasury. It is repeated and reiterated that the department should sustain itself; that if you once allow the precedent of calling for any aid from the treasury, no bounds or limits will or can be prescribed to its inroad, and horrible pictures of extravagance and ruin are conjured up by the affrighted imagination. One would think that to receive aid from the general funds of the Government was a violation of uniform practice and fixed principles, when, in fact, the Post Office Department has, ever since the organization of the Government required aid, received annual appropriations from the national treasury. For several years last past those demands have averaged nearly seventy thousand dollars. The new precedent, against which the note of alarm is sounded so loudly, is found in truth to have been the uniform practice from the first days of the department to the present moment. This simple fact, I trust, will be sufficient to dispel extravagant apprehensions, and enable us to look calmly at the justice and expediency of the proposed measure.

The original proposition simply and singly declares that there shall be some reduction of the rate of postage. The amount, the mode, the items, and the time, are left to the consideration of the committee and the future determination of the Senate. Now, sir, to the only objection which has been urged, that the department will not be able to sustain itself, there are several satisfactory answers:

First. That a reduction of some of the rates of postage does not necessarily involve a diminution of the receipts of the department; on the contrary, there is good reason to believe that rendering the transportation cheaper, in some particulars would increase the amount. Take, for example, double and treble letters: the smallest piece of paper, a bank bill enclosed, duplicates the tax, without increasing the labor of transportation. If the expense was less, would not the number be increased? Would not thousands of such letters be put into the mail that are now intrusted to a more precarious and procrastinated conveyance by private hand; and by proper restriction as to weight, public convenience, and the revenue of the department, both be advanced? I might also adduce, in further illustration, cases of short distances, and easy communication, where private, to a degree, supplants public conveyance. But the principle that a reduction of the rate of tax may increase the revenue, is too well known and established to need illustration; and yet the assumption that it must and will certainly diminish the receipts, is the foundation of the objection to the resolution.

But suppose that the revenue from postage should be diminished, it would not necessarily require supplies from the treasury; it might be met by greater economy in the disbursements of the department; by a less amount of extra allowances made at the mere discretion and uncontrolled will of the Postmaster General to contractors; by a less liberal or lavish expenditure for unprofitable and unnecessary routes. In these respects there has been, and still is, a wide and almost unlimited scope for the mere discretion of the Postmaster General. No department of this Government has so much patronage, and so little responsibility; and this has arisen from the ideal divorce between this and the other branches of the public service. "The post office sustains itself," is the reply to all complaint, and the shield against all scrutiny. It seems almost to have claimed and enjoyed immunity from investigation, by folding itself in its own robes, and saying it "sustains itself." But how does it sustain itself? Is it not by a tax upon the people? Is it not by the money of our constituents? Shall we not, then, inquire to what extent this burden is necessary, and whether it is levied upon principles of justice? You or I, sir, and other officers of the Government, and the Government itself, enjoy an immunity from this tax. "Free" is subscribed upon our communications, and they are transported to the remotest corners of the Union without charge; but at whose expense? From whom does the department draw the money which pays for this transportation? Is it not from the postage paid by private citizens? They then pay not only the expense of conveying their own letters and newspapers, but those of the Government also. The packages, books, and documents thus diffused, are not for the benefit merely of those who pay the postage, but of the whole country. The benefit is general; should not the burden also be general?

The postage upon Government documents would be half a million of dollars a year. This department, then, not merely "sustains itself," but contributes by its labor half a million of dollars annually to the aid of the Government. It saves that amount to the national treasury. Suppose, then, that this—the worst consequence that has been apprehended or predicted by any one, the payment from the treasury of the Government postage—should ensue from the proposed reduction of rates, would there be any injustice? Nay, sir, is it not necessary, in order to preserve the principles of equal taxation for common benefits?

The present rates of postage are essentially the same as those established forty years ago, in the infancy of the country; when the wants of the Government were urgent, and the experience of the department nothing; when the roads were bad, the difficulties of transportation great, and the business transacted small. Since that time there have been, throughout the whole country which was traversed by the mails when the rates were originally established, a wonderful, an astonishing increase in the facilities of transportation and the amount of business; and yet this tax upon the diffusion of light and knowledge is kept up to its full original amount. And still the department, which originally sustained itself, cannot now, we are told, bear a reduction, because, in that event, it will not be able to stand upon its own revenues. Why will it not be able to stand alone? Because of the continual enlargement of facilities and expenses upon unproductive post routes, and the extension of the franking privilege. If this argument is allowed to be sound, the time can never arrive when the citizens of any portion of the country can anticipate a diminution in the onerous burden upon the circulation of information. No matter what improvements they make, at their own expense, in the construction of highways, railroads, and canals; even if they reduce the expense to the Government to less than half its original amount, while the increase of business may more than quadruple the receipts from postage, still the money thus drawn from them will forever be expended by the Postmaster General. There will always be contractors and agents asking extra allowances; there will always be a desire for an extension of the frank; there will always be new, and unprofitable, and unnecessary routes to absorb the whole funds; and we shall always be told that the head of the department has made arrangements to expend the whole revenue; and, therefore, we must never touch the rates of postage. It has been objected that those who receive the benefit of the mails should pay the expense. If so, the Government, then, should pay for the amount of its accommodation, and the unproductive routes should meet their own expenses. But this is more than I ask. As the matter now stands, the Government transportation, and the unproductive mails are both thrown upon the productive routes, to the subversion of equality and justice.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRAN] has heretofore strongly advocated an abolition of the postage on newspapers; and, as my proposition is simply that there shall be some reduction of the rate of postage, I had confidently anticipated that it would conciliate his support. But although still in favor of a reduction, he is opposed to instructing the committee to reduce, lest they should not make the particular modification which he has at heart. He fears to give the committee so much latitude of discretion, and yet he is in favor of this amendment, which has no other effect than to enlarge that discretion. He will not trust the committee with a limited power as to the particulars in which the reduction shall be made, but prefers a proposition which gives them every latitude, not only as to the items and amount, but whether there shall be any reduction or not. I had hoped, sir, that the original proposition being single, simple, and unencumbered by details, would command the support of every member who is in favor of any diminution; and, notwithstanding his argument, I hope we shall yet have the vote even of the Senator from Kentucky himself.

Mr. SMITH rose to move to lay the subject on the table, in order to follow it with a motion to proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. SPRAGUE hoped that the Senate would now take the question. He would not say another word.

Mr. SMITH then yielded.

Mr. MILLER rose to give, in a word or two, the reasons which would induce him to vote against the resolution. If the Senate gave an instruction to their committees, the instruction ought to be definite. This resolution was so defective in this particular, that the committee might substantially avoid the reductions which were expected. They are directed to do something, or to do nothing. If responsibility was to be taken from the committee, they ought to be plainly instructed what they were to do. He would vote in favor of the amendment, and whenever the committee should make their report, if any gentleman should offer a proposition more agreeable to him than the report, he would vote for it.

The question was then put on the amendment offered by Mr. GRUNDY, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Black, Brown, Buckner, Dallas, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Robinson, Smith, Tipton, White, Wilkins.—20.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Chambers, Clayton, Dickerson, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Holmes, Knight, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tomlinson, Webster.—18.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurring on the resolution as amended, Mr. FOOT moved to amend the same by inserting after the word "reducing," the words "and equalizing." He explained that the object was to do away the inequality and injustice which prevailed under the present system.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMES then moved further to amend the resolution, by adding the words "and particularly of abolishing the postage on newspapers."

After a few words from Mr. GRUNDY and Mr. HOLMES, this amendment was also agreed to.

The resolution and amendment was then agreed to without a division. Adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 3.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

When the doors were opened, the Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. POINDEXTER on the 17th ult.:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate, with as little delay as practicable, a detailed statement of the articles of foreign growth or manufacture on which, in his opinion, the present rate of duties ought to be reduced; specifying particularly the amount of reduction on each article separately, so as to produce the result of an aggregate reduction of the revenue six millions of dollars, on such manufactures as are classed under the general denomination of protected articles; and that he also append to such report an enumeration of articles deemed to be "essential to our national independence in time of war," and which, therefore, ought, in his opinion, to be exempted from the operation of the proposed reduction of duties.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. KING, proposing to strike out the clause of the resolution commencing "and that he also append to such report," &c.

Mr. POINDEXTER repeated, substantially, some of the arguments used by him on a former occasion, against the proposed amendment.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was rejected by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Dudley, Forsyth,

Grundy, Hill, Kane, King, Mangum, Robinson, Smith, Tipton, White.—12.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Dickerson, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Johnston, Knight, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Tomlinson, Webster, Wilkins.—24.

The question then recurred upon the amendment offered by Mr. BROWN, to strike out the whole of the original resolution and insert the proposition reported by the Committee on Finance, to wit:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed, with as little delay as may be, to furnish the Senate with the project of a bill for reducing the duties levied upon imports, in conformity with the suggestions made by him in his annual report."

Mr. POINDEXTER, in a few words, opposed the amendment and supported the original proposition.

Mr. CLAY rose to signify his desire to receive from the Treasury Department some specification of the articles deemed essential to the national defence in time of war. It was made the duty of that department to furnish all necessary information connected with the finances of the country. The knowledge which the department must be supposed to possess of the general course of trade, and the operation of any given reduction upon the finances, rendered the views of the Secretary necessary to a more correct understanding of the subject. Before he recently left the city, he had, in conversation, expressed a wish to see the plan of the Treasury Department in a specific and responsible form for the reduction of the revenue, and particularly a specification of those articles which were considered by the Executive and the Secretary as essential to national defence. As it respected the form in which this information should be embodied, it was not a matter of much consequence, whether in the shape of a bill or in a detailed report. He, however, agreed with those who contended that the Senate should not call on the Executive or the head of a department for the project of a bill. He felt warranted in saying that the practice had never existed for the Senate, as a body, to call in this way for a bill. It was not unusual or improper for committees to do so; but if there were any precedents where either the Senate or House of Representatives had called on the head of a department for a bill, it had escaped his recollection. He should be sorry to see such a practice obtain; because it might be carried in time to such an extent, as to deprive Congress of its legitimate powers, and no bill might be permitted to pass, unless a project was furnished by the Department. He should vote against the amendment, and in favor of the original resolution.

Mr. SMITH considered that there was no great difference between the two propositions. The original resolution asked for the opinions of the Secretary—the latter called for facts. We wanted facts, and not opinions. He was opposed to calling for the opinions of the head of any department. It had been the practice to call upon Mr. Hamilton, when Secretary of the Treasury, for opinions; which opinions had great weight, and were with many equal to law. These calls on Mr. Hamilton were made by his friends, with a view, probably, to influence others; but, in this case, he imagined the opinions of the present Secretary of the Treasury would weigh but little with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. POINDEXTER.] He believed that Congress had called on Mr. Dallas for the project of a bill. The original resolution was indefinite in all respects. The other proposition would answer the purpose which gentlemen desired, as the project of a bill would explain the meaning of the general remarks of the Executive and Secretary on the subject, and would show, by its provisions, what articles were deemed essential to national defence in time of war. As this was a revenue measure, it more properly belonged to the House of Representatives; and, as the committee of that house (who had been aided in their deliberations by the Secretary of the Treasury) had reported a bill, which would be acted on forthwith, he could see no necessity for calling on the Secretary for the repetition of his views to the Senate.

Mr. BROWN said he did not rise to discuss the resolution. He merely wished to controvert the remark of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] that no precedent could be found in the Journals of either House, where the head of a department had been called upon for the project of a bill.

Mr. CLAY explained. He had said that no precedent of the kind had occurred within his recollection.

Mr. BROWN resumed. In the remarks made by him, a few days since, on this subject, he had taken the ground that the proposition was sustained by precedent. [Mr. B. here read from the journal of the Senate, of 1831-'2, a resolution submitted by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and adopted, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and furnish, at the commencement of the next session, a bill regulating the pay of the officers of the customs, &c.] Mr. B. remarked, in conclusion, that he believed the House of Representatives had made a like call, on a different subject, at the last session.

Mr. CLAY said there might be a single case; but he believed there was no instance where a call of this kind had been made, where the subject had been brought to the consideration of the House and controverted.

Mr. FOOT said it was obvious, if the bill which had been reported in the House of Representatives was the Secretary's bill, as intimated by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. SMITH,] the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina was unnecessary. The Secretary of the Treasury has furnished us in his report with his general views on this subject: we now want the reasons upon which these general views are founded.

Mr. HOLMES had met with a document calculated to throw some light on the subject, but which was not then at his command. He would, therefore, move an adjournment; but he withdrew the motion at the instance of

Mr. POINDESTER, who said he would be willing to accommodate the gentleman from Maine, but the subject had been some time before the Senate, fully discussed, and every Senator was prepared to give his vote. He had no doubt the gentleman would be able to bring forward precedents to bear him out in his views; but he hoped the question would be taken, and the subject finally disposed of.

Mr. HOLMES renewed the motion to adjourn, which was carried.

The Senate then adjourned.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 4.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road from Vandalia, in the State of Illinois, to Jefferson City, in the State of Missouri, was then taken up in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend the bill by adding after the word "Missouri," the words "and thence to the western frontier of Missouri, in the direction of the military post on the Missouri river, above the mouth of the Kansas river."

Mr. BENTON advocated his amendment as being rendered necessary by the state of the population, and the condition of the frontier, which required the construction of a military road similar to that of Mars's Hill, in the State of Maine.

Mr. SPRAGUE moved for further time to ascertain the propriety of making this location.

Mr. SMITH complimented the gentleman from Missouri on his adroitness in converting this road into a military road, because it removed it from the danger of the Presidential veto, but objected to the amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS also expressed his apprehension that the amendment would embarrass and weigh down the bill.

After a few words from Mr. BUCKNER,

Mr. SMITH moved to lay the bill on the table—yeas 18.

TARIFF.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. POINDESTER.

The question being on the motion of Mr. BROWN to substitute the resolution offered from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOLMES said, he gave the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MANGUM] full credit for his motive in objecting to this call. He, last session, was opposed to a similar call, and he opposes this to preserve his consistency; although that was made for information concerning a bill, after the debate upon it was almost finished, and a contrary vote here, in this stage of the subject, would by no means impeach his consistency: still, (said Mr. H.) I admit, it is a great affair at this time, if a man can preserve an apparent consistency for so long a time as six months. The Senator from Maryland, [Mr. SMITH,] I believe, would not consider it much of an merit to preserve consistency for any time: for, if I have understood him right, he would rank it, at best, with the minor virtues.

I am in favor of the resolution which asks for a project of a tariff, but opposed to the amendment which asks for it in the form of a bill. The reasoning of the Senator from Maryland seems to me to resist the very conclusion which he seeks. He would have facts, and not opinions. Now, if I were to call for facts, a bill is the last thing I would exact. What is a bill but a project of a law? and whoever heard that this is a statement of facts? Every law is an experiment, an opinion. Facts state things as they are; opinions, what they should be. Now a bill or law proposes something to be done; and, so far from stating facts as they are, it is usually found necessary that each bill presented here should be accompanied by a report detailing the facts as they exist, on which the bill, or opinion, is based. It was, to be sure, once the practice to pass laws with preambles, stating the facts and reasons, but that has been long since exploded. Either the Senator or myself is hallucinated. If he wants facts, he would ask the Secretary for a bill, in which he would be very sure not to get them; and he would not call for a report, the only way in which he could possibly obtain them: that is, he would do the very thing that would defeat his professed purpose. Now, sir, I want both the facts and opinions of the Secretary, the thing as it is, and the thing as, in his opinion, it should be. And why this delicacy? Why attempt to shield a public officer from a responsibility, which the very law creating his office imposes on him? Never, before this administration, did this Senate seek for a panoply to screen a public officer from scrutiny.

The act of September, 1789, establishing the Treasury Department, makes it the duty of the Secretary "to digest and propose plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of public credit;" and further, "to make report, and give information to either branch of the Legislature, in person, or in writing, as he may be required, respecting all matters referred to him by the Senate or House of Representatives, or which shall appertain to his office."

Special calls were the usual way information was obtained from this department, until the act of the 10th May, 1800, made it the duty of the Secretary to make the reports, required by the act of 1789, at the commencement of each session of Congress.

Now, sir, I would inquire of the Senator from Maryland how he is to distinguish these reports from opinions! The act of 1800 requires of the Secretary annual estimates of revenue and expenditures; and pray, sir, is not an estimate an opinion, a judgment, the result of a process of reasoning? Really, sir, can the Senator be serious? Had he not looked very grave, I should have thought he was disposed to be playful on this subject.

These calls upon the department for opinions, as well as facts, have been the constant practice of both Houses, ever since the adoption of the constitution.

In answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives the 15th January, 1790, Mr. Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, made his report on manufactures.

"The embarrassments which have obstructed the progress of our external trade have led to serious reflections on the necessity of enlarging the sphere of our domestic commerce."

Speaking of the productiveness of manufactures and agriculture, he says:

"The maintenance of two citizens, instead of one, is going on, and the State has two members instead of one, and they, together, consume twice the value of what is produced from the land."

"The division of labor and its effects, greater skill and dexterity, economy of time, and an extension of the use of machinery."

"Additional employment of classes of the community not particularly or necessarily engaged, women and children."

"Emigration from foreign countries, greater scope for the diversity of talents, and a more ample field for enterprise."

"The uncertainty of the foreign demand for the products of agriculture should induce us to substitute a home market."

"The arguments against the encouragement of manufactures would have great force, if perfect liberty to industry and commerce were the prevailing system of nations. But the regulations of several countries with which we have the most extensive intercourse, throw serious obstructions in the way of the principal staples of the United States."

It is no small consolation that the measures which restricted our trade have accelerated internal improvements.

Against the hypothesis that manufactures unprotected will grow up as fast as the interests of the community require, he replies:

"The strong influence of habit, the spirit of imitation, the fear of success in untried enterprises, intrinsic difficulties incident to first essays against foreign competitors, with their skill, and the protection which they experience."

He was called on by the House of Representatives for his opinion, for a plan, and he gave at length, and in detail, his plan and his reasons, and in a masterly manner. It is foreign from my design to discuss the merits of this State paper, my object being only to convince, even the Senator from Maryland himself, how palpably he errs in the position he takes; but I may be allowed to say the wisdom of the maxims he there laid down have been found, by experience, to be those of the profoundest wisdom. It is possible it may be objected that those were the maxims of federal times, and of an ultra federalist. I think, however, the present Secretary will not object to them on that account. I believe he never disguised his ultra federalism, nor shrunk from a defence of the doctrines of his party. I have here a speech of his delivered in the House of Representatives, in 1824, from which I will give the following extract:

"When up before (Mr. McLane said) he had referred to the precedent of 1801, as bearing upon the present case. In answer to the argument drawn from it, the gentleman from South Carolina had denied any weight to the precedent, because it was derived from the administration of the Government by the federal party. Mr. McL. expressed his regret that any thing should have fallen from that gentleman which might have a tendency to revive animosities which, for the happiness of the country, ought never to be disturbed. But, he said, if this subject was to be introduced, he was willing to meet the gentleman from South Carolina. The precedent he had referred to, was a precedent set in party times, and of the federal party. But, said Mr. McL., it does not, because it is a precedent of the federal party, come to me with less title to respect. Is this the only precedent of that party? It is the precedent of a party, says the gentleman, capable of enacting the alien and sedition laws. True, it is, and it is the precedent of a party which organized this Government, which put it in motion, after building it up, and established the policy which, wisely cherished, had made this nation, at this day, prosperous at home and respected abroad. It is the precedent of that administration, to the wisdom of which, time, which tries all things, was fixing its seat. It is a precedent of the same party that established the judiciary, built up the navy, created an army, and laid the foundations of the system of national defence, which has afforded to us security at home, and protection abroad. After copying from that party all these measures of national glory and prosperity, why will not the honorable gentleman receive from it also this precedent, which has the same motives, and the same great objects in view? In all other cases, the federal party consulted the true interests of the country; and their measures were calculated to subserve them, or it has been fully to adopt them. In the case now brought into precedent, they had the same objects in view, and, the gentleman will find, if he adopt their policy in this respect also, he will reap the fruits of this, as he has done of the other precedents set by them."

After this, sir, I trust that it will not be doubted, that Mr. Hamilton would be good authority with the Secretary. But lest I should be mistaken in this, I will give you an authority from the great apostle of democracy, which will no doubt have its due weight with this very democratic administration. The Secretary of State, (Mr. Jefferson,) to whom was referred the report of the Committee of the House of Representatives, on the written message of the President, of 14th February, 1791, with instructions to report his opinion on commercial restrictions, made 23d February, 1793, observes:—

"Where a nation imposes high duties on our productions, or prohibits them altogether, it may be proper for us to do the same by theirs, first burdening or excluding those productions which they bring here in competition with our own of the same kind, imposing on those duties lighter at first, but heavier and heavier afterwards, as other channels of supply open."

"When a nation refuses to receive in our vessels any production but our own, we may refuse to receive in theirs any but their productions."

"Where a nation refuses to our vessels the carriage even of our own productions to certain countries under their domination, we might refuse to theirs of every description the carriage of the same productions to the same countries."

I have the journals before me, in which I might find cases so numerous as to prove a constant uninterrupted practice. I have one more under Mr. Madison's, and another under Mr. Monroe's administration, on this same subject of a tariff, to which I will merely refer the Senate; but will not delay them by reading the cases. I believe I can find several where the call was made on the motion of the Senator from Maryland himself; but as he does not affect to think much of consistency, it may be as well to pass them by.

I repeat, sir, it seems exceedingly strange that there should be such sensation at this call upon the Treasury Department. Why not obtain the information so much needed? Who is in danger? Is there, indeed, any danger? If there is any thing obscure or equivocal in the Secretary's report, why should he not explain?

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MANGUM] has taken very strong ground, and seems almost to arraign the motives which prompt us to the call. It seems to me that a Senator who would invoke us to come to the subject of the tariff in a spirit of kindness and conciliation, should not set an example so very wide from his precepts. The Senator sounds an alarm, the Union is in danger, and he presents the alternative of immediate action or ruin. I was, and am still disposed to act in a spirit of conciliation, but with a spirit of prudence and discretion I have witnessed a crisis so often that they cease to alarm me. If by immediate action is meant that we must abandon the protecting policy before the 1st of February, then there is no such alternative as the Senator proposes, for it is ruin at any rate; once surrender to a State, under her threat of a dissolution of the Union, and the Union is not worth preserving, it is virtually dissolved. Every refractory State would catch and rely upon the example, and whenever a mere and ephemeral majority in a State becomes refractory, she may set you at defiance, compel you to renounce the principle of which she complains, or the Union is dissolved.

Your tariff, the supposed source of supposed grievances, was last year modified, as was thought, to adapt itself to the conflicting interests of all parts of the country. It has not yet gone into operation; and before we can even conjecture the effects of this modification, we are called upon to change again, and immediately, and under the influence of a threat. Sir, I would act with no resentment under these circumstances, and if prudence and policy would permit, I would do the same justice every where, as if no rebellion was threatened. But I should much fear that, in so doing, our motives would be misunderstood, and we should establish the dangerous precedent of surrendering a principle under the influence of the threat of a State to dissolve the Union. A State throws herself on her "sovereignty," her "reserved rights," and there she is to remain until you render her what, in her own judgment, is right. And if you refuse, or even delay, your laws are annulled within her limits. This is "nullification"—this is the "peaceable remedy;" peaceable to be sure, so long as you cease to resist her will, or attempt to enforce your own. Suppose our buxom sister New York should take it into her head to set herself down upon her sovereignty. Sir, as strong as she is, I would get a rod, whip her up, tell her to leave off crying, wipe her eyes, make a pretty courtesy, and promise never to do so again; and after that I would inquire into the grounds of her complaints, and do her justice.

The Senator from North Carolina, in his impatience, inquires, if "this is a time for the ability and patriotism of the Senate to be exhausted in embarrassing moves, or to be attenuated in parliamentary manoeuvre." Now, what does he mean? Who are the manoeuvring Senators, and who the able and patriotic? Do his new associates, the nullifiers, constitute all the ability and patriotism which are arrayed by embarrassing moves and parliamentary manoeuvre? It appears to me, Sir, it is to those who would shut out the light, and screen a public officer from the explanation of an equivocal report, that parliamentary manoeuvre is to be ascribed. It is again inquired, if "this is a time for whimsical, capricious, and injurious violations in parliamentary tactics." To say nothing of the figure of whimsical and capricious violations in tactics, I must think that the question is much more "whimsical and capricious" than it is "ingenious," and more ingenious than ingenuous. I have witnessed no whim nor caprice in the little debate but what springs from the impatience and fretfulness of the Senator himself. His own whims and caprice have so affected him, that he imagines he sees them in others.

Again: "Is the game to be resumed which was played through the last eight months on the great political chess-board?" Now, as I am no gamester, he will pardon me if I should not readily understand this figure: If there was any gambling concern in the last Presidential election, it was the double game played by the friends and foes of the protecting system to inculcate the belief, that President Jackson was on the side of each; and though the election is finished, the game seems to be kept up. Indeed, the opposition to this call seems to be upon the principle of this game, and from an apprehension lest the administration should be obliged to show its hand.

"Shall we sit here," it is inquired, "to be amused by witty gentlemen, to taunt a Secretary, or embarrass each other?" Surely here the Senator does not mean me. I have no pretensions to wit; and if calling on a Secretary to explain an equivocation, and for information on a most important subject, which he is bound by law to give, is "taunting" and "embarrassing," I, for one, shall continue to taunt and embarrass.

The Senator has more than once referred to the "opposition benches;" and I confess I find it difficult to understand him. It is probably designed as a figure of speech. A chair is a bench, and a man is a chair; therefore, by one figure riding on the back of another, a man is a bench: so, by opposition benches are probably intended opposition members of the Senate. But still we are left in the fog. Where are your opposition benches? opposition to what, and on what subject? To the administration? If you mean to every measure, there is no opposition bench here; if to some particular measure, every one, perhaps, is an opposition bench. This last definition, I am very sure, would include the Senator himself, if we take for our rule his strictures on the late proclamation. In these times we find we have strange bed-fellows. This nullification seems to have scattered us all abroad. On the subject now under discussion we are strangely mixed up. The mover of the resolution, [Mr. POINDEXTER], the Senators from Maryland, North Carolina and Virginia, [Mr. SMITH, Mr. BROWN, and Mr. TYLER], all originally administration men, are for the resolution in some shape; as well as the Senators from New Jersey and Maine, [Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN and Mr. HOLMES] who, I suppose, the gentleman would denominate "opposition benches;" and the Senators from Alabama, North Carolina, and Kentucky, [Mr. KING, MANGUM, and BIBB], supporters, and the Senator from Maine, [Mr. SPRAGUE] not, I believe, considered as a very ardent supporter of the administration in all things, against the resolution. It does seem to me, that the Senator will find it extremely difficult to make this a party discussion, unless he should be a little more fortunate in marking his line.

The Senator recurs again to his favorite figure of a game of chance, and asks if he would "not shuffle and deal again." Doubtful whether I would. We have been so badly beaten, twice in succession, a short rubber I believe you call it, (don't you, Mr. President?) that I should calculate a little before I sat down. And I don't see the reason why he and his friends should wish it, unless it is this—The friends of the administration and the nullifiers were partners, and won the bet, and the administration folks took the whole, and refused to divide. But this is a common case, and, if this falling out shall tend to put things back where they should be, good may come out of evil, and the resolution may not turn out quite so great a calamity as we anticipated. And I confess that the symptoms are a little propitious. This proclamation is, with some exceptions, about what it should be. The Senator is not satisfied that it is so acceptable to the opposition. The President's "bitterest revilers speak well of it." I am not so sure of that. I have lately seen some "revilings" from a different source quite as "bitter" as any I ever heard against him or any other President. As to my own opposition, it has been to the measures, not to the man. The proclamation contains doctrines and precepts which are mine, and always have been. The right of a State to take justice into her own hands, and resist or secede from the Union, I have always opposed. And if this administration will carry out these principles, it will cover a multitude of sins, and I must take the liberty to approve its principles, and aid its action even at the expense of the displeasure of that Senator and his party, whoever they may be. Now do, sir, permit me, just about to retire, to approve of one single act of the President's. There has been very little before of which I could approve, and there may not be another chance. I have never, under this administration, sought for occasion to find fault. It was my determination to condemn where I must, but approve where I could. The Senator, in reference to the proclamation, prefers the works of the administration to their faith, alluding, probably to their doings in Georgia, and their declarations as to South Carolina. Now, sir, I like their faith best, their words better than their deeds. And the only fear I have is, that they will not carry their principles out, and prove their faith by their works. Then their proclamations and all that will do no good, but their faith without works will be dead, being alone. There is, I confess, some ground to apprehend, from what has happened heretofore, that in this case principle and practice may disagree. Hitherto there has been a most woful conflict between profession and action.

The Senator inquires if we will lend a willing ear to the answer to this call upon the Secretary. No, sir; I lend a willing ear to the answer of no officer of this or any other administration. I will, for it is my duty, look upon his report with a scrutiny bordering on jealousy, and if I should perceive an evasion or equivocation, I would, if I could, call again, or send for the Secretary, and subject him to a personal examination. No, sir, I repel the suggestion that we are seeking occasion to censure that officer, or wish to make him "a target," and why it should be supposed I know not, unless his friends apprehend that he is indeed censurable, and cannot endure scrutiny. The inquiry proposed is a very simple one, and one from which no faithful officer ought to shrink. No, sir, the remark that the design to hold the Secretary up as a target is in my view illiberal, if not disorderly. I sustain this call because the law authorizes it, and requires and makes it his duty to answer it. I make no promises beforehand to confide in the answer. I shall neither approve nor disapprove in advance. I will first see and then judge. I shall leave to others the honor of that system of political ethics which determines the matter before it has been heard. The President and his Secretary have said that a protective system is not only constitutional but expedient, of all articles indispensable to national defence, without any specification. Now what are they? Let the Secretary define, or at least specify some of them. Let us have the President's indispensables, or, if he cannot spare them, let the Secretary send us his. We would like to know what they are, how they are cut and made, in what fashion, whether British or American, and whether the material is of foreign or domestic production. If protection of articles essential to national defence is admitted to be constitutional, then nullification must go to the wall, for the constitutionality of all protection rests precisely upon the same ground. You cannot discriminate between what is and what is not essential to national defence, and if you could, the distinction would avail you nothing. Now, sir, since the Senator has brought into discussion these nullifying doctrines, however irrelevant, and even if out of order, I must be allowed to depart from the ordinary rules of debate to meet him. I protest, sir, against all the doctrines of the nullifiers as destructive of the Union. The Federal Government is no Government, if they are right. The very design of forming this constitution has failed us, if there is no coercive power in this Government to execute its own purposes, which an individual State may not effectually resist, and we are back again into the old confederation, nothing but a league which any member may at its discretion break.

Sir, the principles of these nullifiers, as I understand them, are, that a State may throw herself on her reserved rights, determine a law of Congress unconstitutional, and resist its execution. Then she may call on Congress or the States for a convention, and unless three-fourths of the States declare the law to be constitutional, it is unconstitutional and void. Seven of the twenty-four States then, being more than one-fourth, may annul any law that we pass, although it may have been determined to be constitutional by the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial authorities of the United States. Allowing this doctrine to be sound, we are still "a rope of sand," and if I were to determine whether I would preserve or abandon such a Union, I would "not admit a doubt to cloud my choice." Pardon me, sir, if I give you an illustration or two of this extraordinary doctrine of nullification. Suppose Ohio should sit down upon her "reserved rights," and determine that all our public lands within her limits became hers, as an attribute of her sovereignty, by the very act of her admission into the Union, and should forbid all sales by the United States, or declare them void. And this is a supposable case, for such doctrine has been urged serialim in this Senate. Suppose further, that we should indulge her by a call of a convention, and that six other States, Indiana, Illinois, Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi, and Missouri, all the States where we have public lands, should decide that Ohio was right, and our claim to these lands was unconstitutional, this decision is final and conclusive, and our lands are gone.

Again: Suppose Pennsylvania should undertake to expound that clause of the constitution which provides that persons held to service or labor in one State fleeing into another, shall be delivered up, and should determine that it could extend only to voluntary servitude. That by the laws of nature and of God there could be no such thing as involuntary servitude or slavery, and that nothing conventional could abrogate those laws. And this, too, is a supposable case, for it has been urged in this Senate by a highly distinguished Senator from a highly respectable State.

Now, would you give her a convention also? If you did, and the six New England States should decide for her, then slavery is abolished, at least in all the free States. And, quere, how much does it fall short of emancipation in all the States? Mind, I contend for no such effect. I only show to what conclusions your premises would lead; and let the South beware how it inculcates doctrines so dangerous to its safety, peace, and even existence. The slaves there would soon learn how to nullify, and would turn these principles to suit their own case. God forbid they should ever make the application! No man would deprecate such a state of things more than I should. But I forewarn gentlemen, that this doctrine of "reserved right," when applied to the relation of master and slave, may produce a state of things too terrific for description. I will only add, that so long as the Union holds together, we are bound to maintain this relation with our treasure and our blood. But so soon as it shall be dissolved, be the conflict between master and slave what it may, the free States would then repose upon their sovereignty. They would not interpose if they could, and they could not if they would.

Tariff Duties.

Let it not be again repeated, that "an unprincipled combination has been practised upon the South." On the subject to which I have now alluded, I know that no one will charge me as a party to any such combination. The truth is, the South, though a minority, has always ruled the North, and always will. When our nullifiers in the last war threatened resistance to the United States laws, as unconstitutional, they were to be hanged under the second or some other section. But now, if the South does all that, and more, it is "a crisis." What was then "moral treason" is now dignified by the name of "a crisis."

Sir, I regret that I have travelled so wide of the immediate question. I should not have done it, but that the Senator from North Carolina wandered, and I, to answer him, was compelled to do the same thing.

Mr. SMITH observed, that he did not deem it necessary to reply to many parts of the speech of the Senator from Maine, particularly the latter part, as they were wholly irrelevant to the subject before the Senate. Some parts of it, however, he would notice. Mr. S. then went on to show, and quoting from the public documents to substantiate his positions, that it had been the practice of the Government, since its formation, to call on the department for projects of bills. At the time spoken of by the Senator from Maine, no parties were formed in this country; both the Senator from Maine and himself were then federalists. In 1794, when the two great parties that then divided the country were formed, it was inconvenient to us (said Mr. S.) of the democratic party to call on the heads of departments for opinions, because our opponents were strengthened by arguments embraced in them. We, then, said he, protested against the practice, defeated our opponents, and always demanded facts, and not opinions. Mr. S. then took a review of the course of the party then in power, and the views entertained by them of the law. The honorable Senator from Maine might have seen in the speeches of the federal members of that period the doctrines now advanced in his, and which were so successfully opposed by the ablest men in the nation; such as Giles, Madison, and Gallatin. Mr. S. quoted from the documents several cases in which facts had been called for by Congress from the Secretary of the Treasury; particularly a resolution adopted on motion of Mr. Eppes, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for the plan of a tariff, which was adopted, and resulted in the tariff of 1816.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Dallas, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King, Mangum, Miller, Rives, Robinson, Smith, Tipton, White, Wilkins.—17.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Buckner, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Webster.—25.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING then observed, that he did not rise for the purpose of entering into any discussion on the merits of the resolution, but to express a wish that it might be made to speak the truth. He called the attention of the Senate to this fact, that the annual report of the Secretary did not say that a reduction of duties to the amount of six millions could be made on the protected articles; and moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words "as expressed in his (the Secretary's) annual report."

Mr. POINDEXTER rose and read from the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that part which says that a reduction of duties to the amount of six millions could advantageously be made for the most part on articles commonly denominated the protected articles. Mr. P. said that the words objected to by the Senator from Alabama were inserted for the purpose of calling the attention of the Secretary to the language of his report, and should, therefore, most properly be retained.

Mr. FOOT said, that the very words objected to by the Senator from Alabama should be retained, in order to convey to the Secretary a correct idea of the meaning of the Senate in passing the resolution.

Mr. BIBB suggested to the Senator from Mississippi, the propriety of inserting in the resolution the words "for the most part," so as to use more exactly the language of the Secretary in his annual report.

Mr. POINDEXTER would simply remark that, in adopting the resolution as it then stood, the Senate would refer the Secretary to his own language in general terms. This, he thought, was all that was necessary.

The question was then taken on Mr. KING'S motion to strike out, and it was lost by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Dallas, Dudley, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King, Mangum, Rives, Robinson, Smith, Tipton, White, Wilkins.—18.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Buckner, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Dickerson, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tomlinson, Webster.—26.

Mr. BIBB then moved to amend the resolution, by inserting the words "for the most part," using the language of the Secretary of the Treasury; which motion was adopted, Mr. POINDEXTER asserting and remarking that their insertion would not at all vary the meaning of the resolution.

The question then recurring on the resolution as amended.

Mr. MANGUM, in order to give time for absent Senators to be here, moved to lay the resolution on the table, which question was then taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Black, Brown, Buckner, Calhoun, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Holmes, Kane, King, Mangum, Miller, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith, Tipton, White, Wilkins.—27.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Foot, Johnston, Knight, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Webster.—18.

So the resolution was, for the present, laid on the table.

Adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, JANUARY 7.

TARIFF DUTIES.

Mr. POINDEXTER moved the Senate to take up his resolution, calling for information as to the amount of duties; and asked for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. HENDRICKS said he should vote against the motion, as he thought the subject had already consumed sufficient time.

Mr. DICKERSON said he should vote against the consideration, because the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Tyler] had not yet returned.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Clay, Clayton, Foot, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Moore, Poindexter, Robbins, Seymour, Silsbee, Tomlinson, Waggaman.—13.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Benton, Black, Brown, Buckner, Calhoun, Chambers, Dallas, Dudley, Dickerson, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King, Mangum, Miller, Naudain, Prentiss, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith, Sprague, Tipton, Webster, White, Wilkins.—31.

So the motion to take up the said resolution was negatived.

Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate then proceeded to the special order of the day, being Mr. CLAY's bill for appropriating the proceeds of the public lands for a limited term, &c.

The question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands, which substitutes a new bill, reducing the price of public lands,

Mr. KANE, of Illinois, rose and said, that the principles and details of this bill had been so fully examined and developed at a previous session, that he could not consent to waste time by repeating the various arguments which had been urged with a perspicuity and force which he could not imitate. With other gentlemen from the new States, said Mr. K., I feel the great difficulties under which we labor in our attempts to oppose the passage of the bill. They are, indeed, of the most discouraging kind. The bill has once received the sanction of this body; a majority, after long and patient examination, have approved it. The opinion has not only been formed, but expressed, that it is a measure demanded by the general interest. Added to this, its provisions are of the most fascinating character. It appeals to the pride and interests of the States separately; to the avarice and self-love of the individuals composing those States. The report of the Committee on Manufactures accompanying the bill, concludes with the most imposing display which the experience of man could suggest: a statement in figures easily read, and readily comprehended, showing to each of the States the sum, in dollars, to be received under the beneficent purposes of the bill. How are such appeals to be resisted? Persons in the older states are told by the report, that if the land in the new States is reduced in price, their own possessions must fall in value. The cismontane States are warned of dangers to be apprehended from emigrations, and a frightful picture is presented to them of the decay of their relative strength and consequence in the Union.

Yet, Mr. President, the representatives from the new States, against such fearful odds, feel it their duty to try once again to avert the calamities which they sincerely believe this bill calculated to visit upon their constituents—once again to show the injustice of fixing the future condition of the younger portion of the confederacy with an exclusive view to the interests of the older.

Sir, we have heard much upon this floor with regard to a claim of right on the part of the new States to the land within their limits. This claim has been denounced in no measured terms, as grasping, with a sacrilegious hand, at property acquired for the common benefit, by the common blood and treasure of the nation. "Fearful alarms" have been sounded in the ears of our fellow-citizens, and strong prejudices have been infused into their bosoms on account of a claim so monstrous and daring. One would have supposed that a claim resting solely upon conventional and constitutional ground, could be asserted without reproach, discussed without alarm, and decided without bloodshed. It is a matter which refers itself only to the decision of a peaceful constitutional tribunal, where the scales of justice are influenced only by pure intentions and enlightened reason.

But it is no part of my intention to discuss this mooted abstract question. I wish neither to subject myself, unnecessarily, to the anathemas which have been so profusely heaped upon other gentlemen, nor to place myself in a condition to feel compelled to revisit these anathemas upon the motives or conduct of others. I go for the fact, and shall appeal to the candor of all who admit its truth, that the new States are not upon an "equal footing" with the old, with regard to their rights and liberties.

The old States are under no control except such as they have imposed upon themselves by their own constitutions of State Government, and except so far as they have delegated powers to the Federal Government, and amongst these delegated powers, is not one authorizing Congress to enter into compacts with them, by which State authority can be restricted, or by which federal power or influence can be increased. In such States, (as distinguished from other States) the Federal Government claims no right, nor does it possess the means of influencing, in the slightest degree, the progress of agriculture, or the growth of population: but such States, and the people thereof, themselves enjoy, and extend to others, the opportunity of enjoying all their natural advantages of soil and climate, without control on the part of any other people or government.

Any portion of the lands of proprietors in such States is liable to be taken for public uses in such modes as such States may prescribe. In such States Congress cannot regulate the price of real estate, nor can its value be regulated with any view to the interests or wishes of proprietors of lands in other States.

Now, sir, on the other hand, look at the comparative condition of the new States in these respects. The federal authorities, under the forms of compacts, have imposed upon them, at a time when their population was small, and when that population was subjected to all the disabilities of a Territorial Government, conditions depriving them of the most essential powers of useful and prosperous States. The proprietors of nineteen-twentieths of our soil cannot be taxed for any purpose of public convenience whatever; and let the public necessities be ever so urgent, not one foot of it can be appropriated for public use, at any equivalent designated by State authority. Not even a road can be opened through these vast extents of territory without subjecting our citizens to prosecution. If such things have been done, and no prosecutions instituted, our citizens are indebted to the mercy and forbearance of our overshadowing landlord; for we are bound not to interfere with the primary disposition of the soil.

The effect of this ownership of so large a portion of our territory under the restrictions imposed upon us, is still more serious in another point of view. Our destiny is in the hands of those whose interests are in essential points adverse to ours. This fact cannot be more satisfactorily established than by a reference to the report of the Committee on Manufactures.

This report declares: "The influence of the reduction of the price of public lands would probably be felt throughout the Union—certainly in all the Western States, and most in those which contain, or are nearest to, the public lands." Again: "There ought to be the most cogent and conclusive reasons for adopting a measure which might seriously impair the value of the property of the yeomanry of the country." And again: "The greatest emigration that is believed now to take place from any of the States, is from Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee. The effects of a material reduction in the price of the public lands would be, 1st, to lessen the value of real estate in those three States; 2d, to diminish their interest in the public domain as a common fund for the benefit of all the States; and, 3dly, to offer what would operate as a bounty to further emigration from those States, occasioning more and more lands, situated within them, to be thrown into market; thereby not only lessening the value of their lands, but draining them both of their population and currency." The plain English of this language is, that the price of lands within the new States ought not to be reduced, because the value of lands in other and older States will be thereby diminished, and because the people of the older States may find it their interest to remove from the old to the new States. And as the older States have the power in their hands, they should so use it as to advance themselves; and that our interests and prosperity are not only subordinate considerations, but that they are to be checked, if necessary, in order to preserve the ascendency of wealth and population in the older States. Under such circumstances, can the new States be upon an equal footing with that of the old? Our delightful and healthy climate is not to be visited, nor are our fertile lands to be cultivated, except upon terms which may accord with the pride and avarice of other States. The poor and the enterprising of the older States are to be chained to a sterile soil, to serve the ends of avarice, or the purposes of an ambition not chastened by a spirit of philanthropy. The designs of a beneficent Providence must be frustrated to keep up the price of the real estate of individuals, and the numerical consequence of the older States.

Shall we be told, in answer to these statements, that Congress have, and will continue, to act justly and liberally towards us. Gentlemen who repose themselves upon such an answer should consider that their opinions may not be impartially formed; that their sentiments and actions, in common with the rest of the human race, may be influenced by State pride, self-love, and personal interest. But our complaint is, Mr. President, that any Government or people whose interests are adverse to ours, should exercise the right of judging for us in these particulars, and not do the same thing with respect to the older States. As long as this state of things shall continue, the new are not upon a footing of equality with the older States.

Should any further excuse be demanded for renewing again this discussion, I refer to the message of the President of the United States at the commencement of the present session, which, upon a comprehensive view of the general substantial interests of the confederacy, has, for the first time on the part of any Executive Magistrate of this country, declared "It cannot be doubted that the speedy settlement of these lands constitutes the true interest of the republic. The wealth and strength of a country are its population, and the best part of that population are the cultivators of the soil. Independent farmers are every where the basis of society and the true friends of liberty." "It seems to me (says the President) to be our true policy that the public lands shall cease, as soon as practicable, to be a source of revenue, and that they should be sold to settlers in limited parcels, at a price barely sufficient to reimburse the United States the expense of the present system, and the cost arising under our Indian compacts." A respectful regard for the opinions of the Chief Magistrate, presenting new views upon this interesting subject, should induce us to review our own, and to re-examine the foundations upon which our minds have been brought to different conclusions. Now, sir, what are the grounds upon which contrary doctrines are held? The report of the Committee on Manufactures, of the last session, will serve as the text book for this development. The document takes up the subject of the lands from the commencement of the revolutionary war, exhibiting the right of this Government thereto, as derived from the cession of the several States of this Union, and from treaties concluded with foreign Powers, and, with regard to the first description, declares, "Thus, by the clear and positive terms of these acts of cession, was a great public national trust created and assumed by the General Government. It became solemnly bound to hold and administer the land ceded as a common fund, for the use and benefit of all the States, and for no other use or purpose whatever. To waste or misapply this fund, or to divert it from the common benefit for which it was conveyed, would be a violation of the trust. The General Government has no more power rightfully to cede the land thus acquired to one of the new States, without a fair equivalent, than it could retrocede them to the State or States from which they were originally obtained." This report, especially when taken in connexion with explanations furnished by its author, [Mr. CLAY,] urges that this fund is to be converted into money, after a mode which shall secure to it a perpetuity of at least five hundred years to come, and that it ought to be distributed amongst the several States. This course is, moreover, supposed to be just, because the revolutionary war "was waged with united means, with equal sacrifices, and at the common expense."

It is to be remarked, Mr. President, that there is no proposition before the Senate to cede any of the public lands to the State in which they lie. The bill introduced by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] proposes to adhere to the present system of sales, keep the lands at the present price, and to distribute the proceeds amongst the several States, to be by them respectively applied, at their discretion, to education, internal improvement, or colonization of free persons of color. The amendment submitted by the Committee on the Public Lands proposes simply to reduce the price of lands, discriminating in favor of actual settlers; without at all disturbing the existing system of sales, but requiring the money arising therefrom to be paid into the federal treasury to be applied by Congress to the general interests of the whole country. Notwithstanding, sir, there is no such proposition before us for making cessions to the new States either presently or hereafter, yet I have looked into the history of the cessions from the old States for the purpose of ascertaining what were the real motives and inducements of the ceding States; whether it was any part of their intention to create this perpetual money fund for the purpose of distribution, and especially to discover whether it was possible that any of the old States demanded these cessions from any other motives than such as sprung from a patriotic determination to secure the independence of the country, and the consolidation of the Union.

During the revolution, and about the time of the adoption of the articles of confederation, some uneasiness was discovered on the part of some of the States, on account of the extensive claims of other States to waste and uncultivated lands, and as early as October, 1777, it was moved in Congress, "That in order to render the present Union and Confederacy firm and perpetual, it is essential that the limits of each respective territorial jurisdiction should be ascertained by the articles of confederation." It was also on the same day moved, "That the United States in Congress assembled, shall have the sole and exclusive right and power to ascertain and fix the Western boundary of such States as claim to the South Sea, and to dispose of all land beyond the boundary so ascertained for the benefit of the United States." Again: It was at the same time further proposed, "That the United States in Congress assembled, shall have the sole and exclusive right and power to ascertain and fix the Western boundary of such States as claim to the Mississippi, or South Sea, and lay out the land beyond the boundary so ascertained, into separate and independent States; from time to time, as the numbers and the circumstances of the people thereof may require." These several propositions were voted down in the old Congress by decided majorities. The articles of confederation were agreed upon by the Congress, containing a proviso, "That no State shall be deprived of territory for the benefit of the United States," and were submitted to the several States for ratification, and were eventually ratified by all the States. Four of these States, however, did endeavor to procure some modification of the provision I have just cited. Maryland proposed to insert after the provision these words: "The United States, in Congress assembled, shall have the power to appoint commissioners, who shall be fully authorized and empowered to ascertain and restrict the boundaries of such of the confederated States which claim to extend to the river Mississippi, or South Sea."—In explanation of this proposition it was urged by Maryland, that States with "overgrown" possessions might be incited, by a superiority of wealth and strength, to oppress, by open force, their less wealthy and less powerful neighbors: that the relative importance of Maryland would be small, and that "its wealth and consequence in the scale of confederated States would sink of course." That State insisted "that a country unsettled at the commencement of the war, claimed by the British Crown, and ceded to it by the treaty of Paris, if wrested from the common enemy by the blood and treasure of the thirteen States, should be considered as a common property, subject to be parcelled out by Congress into free, convenient, and independent Governments." The State of New Jersey expressed her disappointment in finding no provision made in the confederation for empowering the Congress to dispose of the vacant and impatented lands, commonly called crown lands, for "defraying the expenses of the war," and complained that she would "be left to sink under an enormous debt," whilst others would be enabled, in a short time, to replace their expenditures from the hard earnings of the whole confederacy. Two other States, Rhode Island and Delaware, were also dissatisfied with the provision in the articles of confederation, with regard to vacant territory claimed by some of the States. The objections of all, however, were overruled, and the articles were ratified, without amendment, by the objecting States.

From all the examination I have been enabled to make into this branch of the subject, I have come to the conclusion that no one of the original States ever claimed to interfere with these lands, except upon the grounds that its own security and consequence required that its sister States should not be so extensive in their territory, as to be overshadowing, and that "crown lands" should form a fund to be appropriated towards the expenses of the war. I find it no where intimated that this fund should be perpetual, reaching through after ages, for the purpose of enriching the treasuries of the several States. I am sustained in this view of the subject by some positive testimony. The Legislature of the State of New York was the first, in point of time, to move in an attempt to reconcile the difficulties which had grown up on this subject. That Legislature must have understood, in their fullest extent, the objects and claims of the several States; and in the preamble to their act of cession, they say, "And whereas, the articles of confederation and perpetual union, recommended by the honorable Congress of the United States of America, have not proved acceptable to all the States, it having been conceived that a portion of the waste and uncultivated territory, within the limits or claims of certain States, ought to be appropriated as a common fund for the expenses of the war." Again, sir, Congress, with a view of removing the embarrassments respecting the Western country, recommended to the States a liberal surrender of a portion of their territorial claims, "since they cannot be preserved entire without endangering the stability of the general confederacy." Other States, in making cessions, use more general language, but to none does the idea seem to have been present, that these lands were to be used as a perpetual fund. The first great purpose was, to destroy the jealousy of the smaller States, on account of the extended territory of the larger, and a second object was to make some provision for aiding in defraying the expenses of the war. If I am correct in my interpretation of the objects of these cessions, and of the spirit of the compacts, it would seem that these lands, after the debt of the revolution was discharged, should have been permitted to follow the sovereignty of the States in which they are situated.

But, Sir, admitting, for the sake of argument, that an additional motive for these cessions was the formation of a money fund, to reach down through all time, for the "common benefit" of all the States; upon what principle is the right claimed to distribute the fund amongst the several States, for the purposes of education, internal improvement, or colonization? The report of the Committee on Manufactures repeatedly declares, that these lands are a common fund, for the common benefit of all the States. And yet the bill before you proposes to distribute it for the separate benefit of each of the States. If the acts of cession have made the fund a common one, it is common yet: for the constitution declares, that "all debts contracted and engagements entered into before the adoption of this constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this constitution as under the confederation."

Where, then, is the authority for this distribution to be found? shall we find it in the constitution? If these lands are an object of such magnitude to the interests of the nation as is represented, and it was intended to raise therefrom a perpetual revenue, it is singular that some more special provision is not found in the constitution with regard to them. The power of Congress over them is not found in that general list of powers conferred upon that body by that instrument: but we find the only clause in reference to the lands attached to the third section, upon the subject of the admission of new States into the Union; that clause is: "The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States." Is it pretended that, by this language, an authority is conferred upon Congress to apply the money accruing from such disposition in any mode not specially pointed out by the constitution, or that this money is not as much a part of the general revenue as that derived from imposts? Where, then, I ask again, do you find the right of dividing the money amongst the States, for their separate benefit? This bill not only proposes to divide the money amongst the States, but authorizes the States, at their election and at their discretion, to apply it to any object which can be classified under the general heads of education, internal improvement, or colonization. I have always understood, Mr. President, the received opinion to be, that the people and States of this Union selected their members of Congress requiring of them the exercise of their best judgments in carrying into effect the powers conferred upon them by the constitution. But now it seems, sir, that Congress are to select twenty-four deputies, or agents, whose business it will be to relieve that body from the trouble of thinking and acting upon the subject of expending the public money. The bill does not even confine these agents in selecting objects of expenditure to such as are for the general benefit. I have been always in favor of a well-regulated system of internal improvements, but never felt justified in expending public money upon any object which was not, in my judgment, of general importance to the whole country; but in voting for this bill, I am not required to be satisfied of the general importance of the object; indeed, I am not required to know any thing about the object, for I am to transfer my discretion to an agent, who will take all such trouble off my hands. Can it be possible, Mr. President, that Congress can constitutionally delegate the high power of appropriating money from the national treasury, and of applying it to constitutional purposes, to any agent whatever?

The States, if they choose, may, under this bill, apply their share of this money to the colonization of free persons of color. As to the condition of this class of our population, I trust I feel as an individual citizen possessing ordinary feelings of humanity should feel; but surely, the State I represent, as a community, can have little interest in this matter; and under what particular clause of the constitution this application of the common funds can be justified, I leave for those who support the bill to point out. Surely the compacts between this Government and the ceding States contemplated no such proceeding. Is it believed that either Virginia, North or South Carolina, or Georgia, had colonization in view, when they made the cessions? Nay, sir; is it not known, as far as such a thing can be known, that if either of those States had understood that the lands ceded were to be thus appropriated by the Federal Government, the cessions would not have been made by them? There is one feature in this bill so objectionable, that it is difficult to account for its introduction. I speak of that part of it which authorizes the States to apply this money to the redemption of any existing debt contracted for internal improvements. In the first place, let me inquire whether any Senator claims to know the kind of improvements made in each of the States, and the debts thereby created? Are we prepared to say that no State has improved injudiciously, or at an extravagant cost? If works of improvement have been commenced or completed by the States, which have proved worthless, is the "common benefit" consulted by paying for them? It appears to me, that Congress should at least so dispose of a fund termed sacred by the Committee on Manufactures, as not to throw it away in paying debts for works which have not benefited any body. This "national trust" is not in good faith discharged by throwing the money into the ocean, nor by applying it to objects of the character of which we are profoundly ignorant.

Upon the whole, Mr. President, I am opposed to the bill, as hostile to the interests of the new States, as calculated to perpetuate a feeling in the other States adverse to our advancement in population, and our progress in agriculture, as in effect partitioning three-fourths of our territory amongst other sovereign States, giving to each a separate and immediate interest in the proceeds of the lands, and thereby forever precluding the hope of lessening the price of lands to actual settlers. I object to its passage, because it violates the obligations of solemn compact, and the constitution of the United States.

A few words, sir, upon the amendment reported by the Committee on the Public Lands.

This amendment proposes to reduce the price of lands which have already been offered for sale, and which remain unsold, from one dollar and a quarter to one dollar. It further proposes to permit any person, from any part of the United States, or from any part of the world, who is disposed to settle and cultivate land, to purchase a quarter section, and no more, by paying down half a dollar in cash per acre, provided that he shall reside on and cultivate the same for five consecutive years.

I will not detain you by repeating what I have heretofore said upon the expediency of this proposition. The bill, sir, of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] preserves the present system of sales and lands at their present price, and requires the proceeds to be paid into the treasury for the purpose of after distribution. The amendment adheres to the existing system, reducing the price, and requires the proceeds to be paid into the general treasury, to be applied by Congress to the general good, under the solemn obligations imposed upon that body by the constitution. The single alternative presented by the bill and the proposed amendment is, will you have distribution amongst the States, or a reduction in price of a portion of the public lands?

I cannot conclude without pressing upon your attention one further consideration. The new States are not now represented in Congress according to their present population. Is it requiring too much to ask a delay in the decision of this all-important question, until our augmented representation under the late census can be heard? If this bill must pass, let it at least be done with this appearance of justice.

MR. CLAY rose and said, that he had a few observations from with the Senate before the question was taken. report, especially Illinois had, in the commencement of the session furnished by its Senate that it was not necessary to fund it to be converted into and he (Mr. C.) concurred in a similar declaration on his part. The bill had undergone an ample discussion at the last session; there had been but a slight change since that time in the construction of this body; and it would be unnecessary again to go over the whole ground of argument which had once and so recently been employed. The bill which he had introduced at the present session, and which had been sent to the Committee on Public Lands, was identically the bill which had already once passed this body; and the grounds being the same, it would not be necessary to consume much time in the observations he felt himself called upon to make. He would, however, avail himself of the opportunity to offer a few general observations, with a view to a comparison of the bill which he had introduced, with the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands.

In the first place, he would describe the bill which he had brought forward.

By this bill it was proposed to set apart, for the benefit of the new States, twelve and a half per cent. out of the aggregate proceeds, in addition to the five per cent. which was now allowed to them by compact, before any division took place among the States generally. It was thus proposed to assign, in the first place, seventeen and a half per cent. to the new States, and then to divide the whole of the residue among the twenty-four States. And, in order to do away any inequality among the new States, grants are specifically made by the bill to those which had not received, heretofore, as much land as the rest of the new States, from the General Government, so as to put all the new States on an equal footing. This twelve and a half per cent. to the new States, to be at their disposal, for either education or internal improvement, and the residue to be at the disposition of the States, subject to no other limitation than this, that it shall be at their option to apply the amount received either to the purposes of education, or the colonization of free people of color, or for internal improvements, or in debts which may have been contracted for internal improvements. And with respect to the duration of this scheme of distribution proposed by the bill, it is limited to five years, unless hostilities shall occur between the United States and any foreign Power; in which event the proceeds are to be applied to the carrying on such war with vigor and effect against any common enemy with whom we may be brought in contact. After the conclusion of peace, and after the discharge of the debt created by any such war, the aggregate funds to return to that peaceful destination to which it was the intention of the bill that they should now be directed, that is, to the improvement of the moral and physical condition of the country, and the promotion of the public happiness and prosperity.

Such are the general features of the bill which was reported by the Committee on Manufactures, under circumstances to which he would not now advert, at the last session, and was passed; and which was introduced by him again at the present session, had been referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and reported by that committee, with the amendment now under consideration.

The first remark which seemed to him to be called for in reference to this subject, was as to the expediency, he would say the necessity, of its immediate settlement. On this point he was happy to believe that there was a unanimous concurrence of opinion in that body. However they might differ as to the terms on which the distribution of these lands should be made, they all agreed that it was a question which ought to be promptly and finally, he hoped amicably, adjusted. No time more favorable than the present moment could be selected for the settlement of this question. The last session was much less favorable for the accomplishment of this object; and the reasons were sufficiently obvious, without any waste of time in their specification. If the question were not now settled, but if it were to be made the subject of an annual discussion, mixing itself up with all the measures of legislation, it would be felt in its influence upon all, would produce great dissensions both in and out of the House, and affect extensively all the great and important objects which might be before that body. They had had in the several States some experience on that subject; and, without going into any details on the subject, he would merely state, that it was known that for a long period the small amount of the public domain possessed by some of the States, in comparison with the quantity possessed by the General Government, had been a cause of great agitation in the public mind, and had greatly influenced the course of legislation. Persons coming from the quarter of the State in which the public land was situated, united in sympathy and interest, constituted always a body who acted together, to promote their common object, either by donations to settlers, or reduction in the price of the public lands, or the relief of those who are debtors for the public domain; and were always ready, as men always will be, to second all those measures which look towards the accomplishment of the main object which they have in view. So, if this question were not now settled, it would be a source of inexpressible difficulty hereafter, influencing all the great interests of the country in Congress, affecting great events without, and perhaps adding another to those unhappy causes of division which unfortunately exist at this moment.

Public Lands.

He was very happy to find, in the message of the President, some reference made to the subject of the public lands; and especially an expression of the opinion that it was time this question should be put to rest. He was also glad to see it asserted, from the same high authority, that Congress had a full and uncontrolled power over the subject, to dispose of these lands or their proceeds, for the common benefit of the whole country, according to its sound discretion.

Next to the settlement of this great question, it was undoubtedly of the first importance that it should be equitably settled, so as to comprehend the interests of all, and to show that those interests have not been lost sight of by the General Government. And, he would ask, could any mode of settling the question, so as to consult and protect the interests of all, be offered, which would be more worthy of the acceptance of Congress than that which was proposed by the bill of the last session, which had been sent to the Committee on Public Lands? In determining upon the merits of that bill, it would be necessary, in the course of the few remarks which he should feel himself called upon to make, to contrast it with the bill which had been reported by the Committee on Public Lands, and to make some observations on the argument in which the Senator from Illinois had advocated that plan, in order to induce the Senate to take it in preference to the bill which had already once received their sanction.

In the first place, the gentleman from Illinois contended that the whole of the public lands were ceded to the General Government for the purpose of paying the debt incurred in the prosecution of the revolutionary war; that this debt had now been paid; and that, as the land had performed its office, it ought to be set free from further claim on the part of the General Government, and to follow the sovereignty of the different States in which they are located. And the gentleman from Illinois, in order to enforce his argument to the Senate, appealed to the message of the President to show that such also was the view taken of the subject by the Executive. Now he (Mr. CLAY) felt himself constrained to say that both the President and the gentleman from Illinois had taken much too limited a view of the subject. All that portion of the public lands which lies beyond the river Mississippi, and below the State of Mississippi, and all Florida—were they thus conditionally ceded? Were they ceded to the General Government for the purpose of paying the revolutionary debt? No; they were purchased by the common treasure of the whole United States. But, supposing that the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois were conceded; that the debt being paid, the mortgage lifted, these lands ought to be applied to promote the interests of the new States alone in which they are located. Was this a true history? Did the lands which were ceded by the several States pay the debt of the revolution? What was the debt of the revolution? That debt amounted, principal and interest, to not less than four hundred or four hundred and fifty millions of dollars; and the whole of the public lands which had been sold had only produced about forty millions. The lands, then, had not paid the debt of the revolution. They had not performed their office. The debt had been paid by the pockets of the people, and not by the public lands; and, to perform their office, the lands must repay that debt to the people. He (Mr. C.) would have no objection to adopt the principle of the gentleman from Illinois, that the lands should be applied to the payment of that debt, so long as any of it remained unpaid; and, afterwards, to the reimbursement of the pockets of the people of the money drawn from them, by taxes, to make up the deficiency of the public lands. If the honorable gentleman would apply his own principle, he (Mr. C.) would be satisfied. If he had mortgaged his estate, and the mortgage was lifted by a friend, he was bound to reimburse that friend. So, if the debt of the revolution, which the public lands are pledged to pay, was paid by the people, they ought to receive back from the lands both the principal and interest. If the gentleman would bring forward a proposition to pay all the revolutionary debt out of the public lands situated on this side of the Mississippi, and to reimburse the people to the amount which had been taken from their pockets, he (Mr. C.) would vote for the proposition; but that was substantially the object of the bill which he had introduced. The only difference was, that, instead of keeping an account which would be complex in its character, and almost impracticable, a simple form was adopted in the bill, by providing for the division of the funds among the people of the United States, upon the most equitable of all principles—that of federal representation. With respect to that largest portion of the public domain which was acquired by treaties, it could not be contended that it was incumbent on the Government to appropriate any part of that to the payment of the debt of the revolution.

The gentleman from Illinois had said that the scheme which he (Mr. C.) had presented was extremely fascinating, addressing itself powerfully to the States, and to every individual in the States. And was not the scheme of the honorable Senator also fascinating? Did it not address itself powerfully to those who occupy the public domain in the new States? The difference between us is this: He would, from that which was made by the deeds of cession, and the treaties of acquisition, the common property of all, take what remains, and appropriate it for the exclusive benefit of a few; he would take the property of the twenty-four States, and appropriate it for the benefit of the seven new States, and of such as may hereafter become members of the Union. This, said Mr. C., is a plan of broad, liberal, and comprehensive justice; while his is a narrow, partial, and unjust scheme of appropriation, looking to the interests only of a part, and that, although a highly respectable, an inconsiderable part of the whole.

But it was said by the gentleman, that the new States were not on an equality with the old States; that they could exercise no authority over the public domain; that they could not take it for state purposes; that they had not the power of taxing it; and, in short, enjoyed no benefit from it whatever. Now he (Mr. C.) took it, that the property of the United States, every where, was beyond the control of the States in which it was situated.

SENATE.]

Public Lands.

[JANUARY 7, 1833.]

Had Pennsylvania any control over the mint or the arsenal, over any part of her territory which she had ceded to the United States, over the public ships, or over public property of any description within her limits? Had any State any control over the property of the United States? The difference, every where, was merely one of extent of national property, and this difference existed among the new States, as well as between them and the old. Ohio had only five millions of acres, for example, of public lands within her limits; while Missouri had thirty-eight millions. According to the doctrine of the gentleman, they ought to have the right of control over this property, in order to place them on an equality. The inequality of Ohio and Missouri, as to the extent of lands, was as five to thirty-eight; while, as to population, the inequality stood as one million to one hundred and fifty thousand, for Ohio, and against Missouri; the smaller number having, under this principle, the control over the greater extent of the public domain. That which belongs to the General Government is not subject to State legislation. There were some States in which the United States held no property. In Kentucky there was no United States' property; while in the maritime States there is much of this property, which is beyond the control of the States. The gentleman from Illinois, therefore, could derive no strength to his argument from his ground as to the extent of the public domain. It should be recollected that the time was coming, as it had almost already come in the State of Ohio, when the public domain will be disposed of, and then there will be a perfect equality, as indeed there is now, between the States, in their rights and powers over whatever may be in their respective limits.

The gentleman from Illinois had asked, but without dwelling much upon the point, where was the power to make this division? He (Mr. C.) would refer him to an authority which, he believed, the honorable Senator would be the last member on that floor to controvert or depreciate—the authority of the President. He would also refer him to the deeds of cession; to the acts of Congress; to the understanding of all men; but especially he would refer him to his own amendment, and the report of the Committee on the Public Lands. What! had they a right to give away the public lands by a partial and unjust distribution, and none to establish a broad and comprehensive scale of appropriation, doing justice to all portions of the United States? But he would not dwell on this part of the subject, which had been fully discussed during the last session.

He would now beg leave to call the attention of Senators to what was the present condition of the new States, what would be the effect of the operation of this bill upon them, and what would be the subsequent advantages which they would derive from its passage.

What was the complaint of the new States at present? It was that a vast amount of their money was drawn from their limits, to be expended in other portions of the Union, to their impoverishment and ruin. Continue the present system, and the evil is perpetuated. The money of the West will still flow into the Eastern States, and still be expended there. But what would be the condition of the new States, if the bill which had been stricken out by the committee were to pass? They would, in the first place, receive $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the amount of the proceeds of the sales of the lands, This $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. was probably equal to the amount annually paid by the resident population of the new States themselves, exclusive of what is paid by emigrants going into the new States. He derived this inference from a letter which was laid before the Senate at the last session, from which it appeared that the thirteen States of the Union, in which there are no public lands, had increased only $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. within the ten years from 1820 to 1830. If you give $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. to the new States, before you divide the proceeds, it would be a proportion quite as great as the increase of their population, if it were not augmented by emigration. Or, if there was no tide of emigration to the new States, and migrations from them similar to those which take place in other States, the amount which the people of the new States would expend in the purchase of the public lands would not probably be equal to more than the $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. If, therefore, you give them $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. before you give any thing to the other States, all complaints on the score of the drain of money on public account must be put an end to.

But this is not all. You not only give this $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., but after assigning this particular amount to their exclusive benefit, you then divide the residue of the proceeds among the whole of the twenty-four States, including those which have already received the $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. This additional dividend is about 16 or 17 per cent. more. Thus there would be a total amount payable to the new States equal to near one-third of the entire aggregate derived from all the public lands of the United States, wherever situated. About one-sixth of the population of the United States, which the new States contain, would receive near one-third of the whole amount of the proceeds of the public lands. Now, if this was done, would not the condition of these new States be greatly bettered?

If the bill should pass, and the new States should thus acquire the amount to which they would be entitled according to its provisions, they would not merely obtain the $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and, by a participation in the residue of the fund, some indemnity for pecuniary contributions made by them to the General Government, but they would still enjoy their present proportion of the expenditures of the General Government within their limits. There would still be large expenditures in the event of war, as was the case during the last year; and there would still be the annual disbursements to Indian agents, and on Indian annuities, &c. All these would continue.

The gentleman from Illinois spoke of the new States as if he expressed the sentiments of all of them, and as if their wants and wishes were only known to him, and his construction of them was the only one deserving of respect. Now, at the last session, when this bill was passed, the Senators from the seven new States were equally divided on this subject. There were, if he mistook not, two from Ohio, two from Indiana, two from Louisiana, making six, and one from Mississippi, making exactly half of the representation in that body of the seven new States. Regarding the subject in the light in which he did, that there would be, if things remained as they now are, no reflux of the money of the West drawn from it by the Federal Government, and that large and liberal grants of money were made to the new States by the provisions of this bill, it ought to be satisfactory to the most ambitious Western heart. The Senate would recollect that, according to a table presented at the last session, the new States had increased at the rate of 85 per cent. during the ten years from 1820 to 1830, and that the State of Illinois, during the same period, had increased at the rate of 185 per cent.; while many of the old States had increased only at the rate of 25 per cent. The average increase of 13, having no public lands, was only about $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; while some had scarcely any increase at all. The settlement of the new States is already sufficiently rapid, and any fresh impetus given to it would only be productive of mischief.

A struggle always takes place at first among the new settlers as to preponderance, and this struggle is in proportion to numbers, and the variety of the places of their origin. It requires some time before the new settlers can become acquainted with each other, the laws, customs, and habits, religious and political, of the respective States and countries from which they emigrated. It sometimes happens that the most opprobrious epithets are interchanged, until they become well acquainted with each other, perceive the good which each bring to the general stock, and, becoming reconciled to their condition, proceed harmoniously in advancing their new settlements in the wilderness. If emigration were more rapid, there would be still more of this spirit of discord; and all must agree that an increase in the ratio of 85 per cent. ought to be sufficient to satisfy the wishes and ambition of any man. All that is wanted is money, assistance, aid from some quarter or other, in making roads, providing for education, promoting the general improvements, and turning to advantage all those blessings which abound in those States, and which are designed for the prosperity of society. He must repeat, that a comparison of the condition of those States, under the operation of this bill, and without its advantages, ought to enlist in favor of the bill every mind which was not prejudiced by other objects, and which was not looking too intently at the possibility of grasping, in some form or other, all the public domain.

It must be clear to every unbiassed and impartial mind, that it was better to accede to the arrangements of this bill, than to remain in their present condition, with the mere possibility of getting something more at a future day. If the views of gentlemen who supported the amendment could even be admitted, was it likely that future harmony would be the result? Other new States would spring up beyond the Mississippi; and as they successively arose, following the example of the new States of this period, would lay claim to all the public lands within their limits.

This consideration should induce the new States to feel as interest in the passing of this bill. Those new States beyond the Mississippi never would, never ought, never could, agree to an exclusive appropriation of these lands. They constitute a common fund, purchased by the common blood and treasure, and are the common property of all. It was the duty of Congress so to regard it. It resulted from the treaties of acquisition, and was declared by the deeds of cession to be for the common benefit of all; and he would venture to say that the day will never come when Congress, for the sake of partial benefits to a comparatively small and inconsiderable portion of the people, will abandon this exhaustless source of public income. Kentucky included no part of the public domain, and enjoyed very few of those advantages which flow from the disbursements of the General Government. Her benefit in the common concern was chiefly indirect, consisting in beholding the prosperity of the whole, and the security of all from the Union. But, if this bill passed, she would participate in the more direct advantages of the common Government.

As an original part of that State which made such a vast cession to the Federal Government, he, in her behalf, entered his solemn protest against any violation of the terms of that munificent grant, by which Kentucky shall be stripped of what belongs to her in common with Virginia and the other members of the confederacy.

As it respects the new States themselves, he could not but think that, if they would dispassionately examine the project under consideration, they would find that it possessed the strongest recommendation to their acceptance. And he would repeat the assurance to them of his settled conviction, that, if they deceived themselves by the hope of obtaining the whole of the public domain, and refuse what was now offered, they would have just occasion hereafter to reproach themselves; or, if not, they would be reproached by their posterity, for throwing away the practical blessings within their reach, in order to obtain an object which he solemnly believed would never be accomplished. He would now call the attention of the Senate to the provisions of this bill, and their equitable character, as it respects the whole of the common Union. Having already shown that the fund itself was derived from the common blood and common treasure of the country, he would ask if it ought not still to be held for the common benefit? The country enjoys, he was willing to admit, unexampled prosperity. But did we hope that we should exist as a nation for centuries to come? Did we hope that our Union would last as long as the republics of antiquity, if not much longer? And are we, on the strength of such expectations, to make a wasteful disposition of the rich patrimony which has been bequeathed to us? Are we always to be free from wars, and troubles, and difficulties? What nation had always been exempt from them? Look at Europe, from which we sprang. It had enjoyed, he believed, at this time, one of the longest intervals of peace which had been experienced for several centuries. It was only seventeen years and a half since the battle of Waterloo was fought, which terminated the wars of the French revolution, and we now see the whole of Europe apparently on the eve of a general war. And do we expect to be forever at peace? never to want money again? never to be in debt? but to be free from all embarrassments and debts hereafter? No thinking man could indulge these chimerical ideas, these vain speculations. What, then, was it our duty to do? Now was the time, above all others, when we should nurse and take care of our resources. What nation of antiquity, what nation of modern times, has ever possessed such vast resources as the immense public domain, the capacious womb of unborn republics? He had had occasion to remark, either in his observations last session, or in the report of the Committee on Manufactures, that five hundred years hence, if we discharged our duty, and took care of this important interest, they who will come after us may be legislating in this very Hall, which he hoped would then be standing, as it would stand, upon this great and absorbing subject of the public domain. He recollected, during the late war, when the distress of the country was at its height, when we wanted money, wanted credit, when our arms were paralyzed for want of the necessary means for sustaining the war—he recollected how it then gladdened every patriotic heart, when the exhaustless nature of this immense national resource was eloquently depicted by a member of the other House; enough, not only for that, but for fifty or a hundred other wars, should we unfortunately become involved in them. But now we are out of debt, and it would seem that we are never again to be in debt; that we are out of difficulty, and never again to be in difficulty: and a hundred schemes are suggested to dispose of these lands, because of our unbounded prosperity; as if we could not too soon get rid of the fund. Happier would it be for us, and happier too for posterity, should we be wise enough to husband well this resource. He trusted the Senate would not be deceived by these vain projects. It was said that there is some discontent in the West; and how was it proposed to allay this discontent?

He denied the fact, however; there never had been any general discontent on the subject of the public lands; there was nothing like discontent there. It was true, that some gentlemen, in various States of the West, had held out to the people of that quarter of the Union alluring projects of the aggrandizement of their own States, by setting up a claim to the lands within their limits; and it was very likely that some of the people may have indulged a dream that something like these projects might one day be realized: but there was nothing like discontent with the great body of the people on the subject of the public lands. But if there were discontent, what would be the proper course to pursue? We ought to examine calmly into the causes, to endeavor in a parental manner to investigate the extent of the disaffection. Should it appear to be well founded, it would be our duty to endeavor to alleviate it as far as possible. But if there was no foundation for it, if you discovered that it was merely one portion of the Union demanding that which belonged to the whole; if there was no just ground for complaint, would you, to gratify this murmuring portion of the Union, give to it that which was the property of all? Would you behave like the weak and foolish parent, who, seeing one child crying for the bauble which another possessed, would unjustly take it away from the possessor, and, by giving it to the other, set the one who had been bereaved crying also? Would you allay discontent, if discontent existed in a new State, by raising a more formidable and greater discontent in the other States? And would you not do this, if you adopted the partial, narrow scheme of distribution which was proposed by the substitute of the Committee on Public Lands? Beware, Mr. President, on this, as on other great subjects of contention, that you do not shift the theatre of discontent.

It becomes us to take care that we do not raise a storm full of menace, not only to the integrity of the Union, but to every great interest of the country. He could not conceive a more happy disposition of the proceeds of the public lands, than that which was provided by this bill. It was supposed that five years would be neither too long nor too short a period for a fair experiment. In case a war should break out, we may withdraw from its peaceful destination a sum of from two and a half to three and a half millions of dollars per annum, and apply it to a vigorous prosecution of the war—a sum which would pay the interest on sixty millions of dollars, which might be required to sustain the war, and a sum which is constantly and progressively increasing. It proposes, now that the General Government has no use for the money, now that the surplus treasure is really a source of vexatious embarrassment to us, and gives rise to a succession of projects; to supply for a short time a fund to the States which want our assistance, to advance to them that which we do not want, and which they will apply to great beneficial national purposes; and, should war take place, to divert it to the vigorous support of the war; and, when it ceases, to apply it again to its peaceful purposes. And thus we may grow, from time to time, with a fund which will endure for centuries, and which will augment with the growth of the nation aiding the States in seasons of peace, and sustaining the General Government in periods of war.

The bill proposes to nurse and preserve this fund, to apply it when wanted to the purposes of the General Government; and when its application is made to the States, what are the objects? The honorable Senator complains about colonization; and asks what interest Illinois has in it? He (Mr. C.) was somewhat surprised at the question. He supposed every part of the Union was interested in the humane object of colonizing the free blacks. He supposed that if any part were exempt from the evils of a mixed population, it would still not be indifferent to the prosperity of less favored portions. The darkest spot in the map of our country is undoubtedly the condition of the African race. And every benevolent and patriotic mind must hope that at some distant day it will be effaced. Colonization has opened the only practicable scheme which, by draining first the country of free blacks, and then, either by the authority of the States, or by individual emancipation of those now held in slavery, holds out a hope of the ultimate deliverance of our country from this great evil. Suppose that, fifty or a hundred years hence, the country could be entirely rid of this African race; would the gentleman from Illinois—would any gentleman—say that he should be indifferent to such an auspicious result? In his judgment, if the people of the United States were ready to unite heartily in any practical scheme, if there could be one devised, by which this country could be delivered from all portions of the African race amongst us, both free and bond, it would be the happiest of all events for the Union. But why did the gentleman from Illinois restrict his view to this single point? The bill did not confine the States to colonization. What was the bill? It presented three great objects for the consideration of the States, out of which they were at liberty freely to select. It proposed colonization, education, and internal improvement, in the reimbursement of such debts as may have been incurred for internal improvements in the States. The gentleman objects to this latter clause. But, Mr. C. would ask, why those States which have gone ahead in the cause of internal improvement, Pennsylvania, New York, and Ohio, should not be allowed to rid themselves of the debts which they may have contracted? If they had outstripped the other States, why should they be required to remain under burdensome debts, and engage in new objects, perhaps not wanted.

With regard to education and internal improvement, these are objects in which all parts of the Union are interested. Education and internal improvement in any part of the Union are objects which affect, more or less, the interests of all other parts of the Union. There was a restriction upon the States. They were not left without limitation. The fund was directed according to the views of Congress, and the States were not left unrestricted as to its application. They were required to apply it to one of three great objects, in which all parties were interested, as objects of national importance.

Thus it had been shown that, according to the plan of the bill, the fund was to be applied, in times of peace, for the benefit of the States which may stand in instant need of the means which the General Government does not want, for the improvement of their moral and physical condition; and in war, the fund was to be resumed, and applied to the general objects of the war. Thus, it was to be applied, in peace or war, and, according to the provision in the various acts of cession, the great object of the common benefit of all the States would be kept in view. This ample resource would be preserved for all the vicissitudes to which this nation may be exposed; and we should be enabled, if free from war for twenty or thirty years, to accomplish most of the great objects of internal improvement, in the completion of which the country feels an interest, should the States determine so to apply it.

But there was another and the greatest object of all connected with the passage of this bill, to which, in conclusion of this part of the subject, he was desirous to refer. He alluded to the effect of this measure on the durability of our Union. He hoped he should not be mistaken when he made the suggestion, that, above all former periods in this country, this was the moment when it was most imperative upon every American statesman to bend all the efforts of his mind to the infusion of new vigor into the Union. It was a melancholy fact, that in all parts of the country the sentiment of union appeared to have been greatly weakened. It was a melancholy fact that there was every where springing up, daily and hourly, an apprehension of insecurity, a fear that our republic cannot last, that it is destined to premature dissolution. He did not speak of one part of the Union, but of all parts. This was a policy which unhappily prevailed. Whatever course could restore confidence, produce harmony, create a new attachment to the Union in all its parts, and which could prevent the greatest calamity that could befall this people, ought to receive the favorable attention of the Legislature. He would ask if there was any project conceivable by man which was better calculated to strengthen the Union than the bill which was now on the table? What was it? It proposed that a sum amounting to about three millions of dollars, and annually increasing, which, twenty years hence may be six millions, and forty years hence twelve millions, the source from which the fund is drawn being specifically ceded or acquired for the benefit of the whole Union, shall be annually and parentally distributed by this Government through the whole confederacy, amongst all parts of it, for the purpose of improving the moral and physical condition of the whole. Let this project go into operation: let all the States be satisfied that it will last as long as the fund from which it is to be distributed, as long as the almost exhaustless public domain shall continue, and we shall cement this Union by the strongest of ties for five hundred years to come. What State will then be disposed to go out of the confederacy, and sacrifice the great advantages administered by this Government? What State in the Union will be disposed to give up the advantage of this annual dividend, with all the rich fruits which are to result from the improved moral and physical condition of its people, and go forth in its forlorn, weak, and destitute condition, an outcast without hope, the scorn of its neighbors, an object of contempt with foreign powers, and exposed to the insults of the meanest of them, and even to the aggressions of lawless pirates? Pass this bill, and satisfy the States of this confederacy that this fund, which is constantly increasing, is to be applied forever, in time of peace, to them, for the great objects which are specified, and, in time of war, to free them from that taxation which would be incident to a state of war—my life (said Mr. C.) on the sufficiency of the security which this would present for the continuance of the Union. No section, no State, will be found so lost to its own interest, as to be induced to cut itself loose, and to abandon its participation forever in this rich and growing resource.

One or two words on the question immediately before the Senate, and he would conclude. That question was to substitute a new proposition, by adopting the amendment proposed by the Committee on the Public Lands, in lieu of the other bill. And what was this new project? It was at one stroke to cut down three-fifths of the revenue derived from the public lands. The minimum price of these lands is now $1 25 per acre, and it is proposed to reduce it to fifty cents per acre, on all the lands which remain unsold at public auction. It thus proposes, by a single provision, to take three-fifths from this fund; and what does it propose to do afterwards?

[Here Mr. C. read a clause from the bill of the committee.]

Now this was not a project for the poor. No such thing. Any man, without any regard to the amount of his wealth, or his condition, may settle down on the lands, and acquire a right to them by five years' cultivation; but he has to settle upon the lands. By the proclamation issued by the King of Great Britain in the year 1763, and afterwards by the Royal Colonial Governments, and by several of the States which subsequently became independent, this condition of cultivation has been required to perfect the title to waste land; and yet, invariably, as far as his knowledge went, this provision had been dispensed with, or been considered a mere nullity. There were various kinds of settlements formerly required by Virginia.

[Here Mr. C. specified the various conditions, but was not distinctly heard.]

He required that the individual should settle on the land. Now, what did they do? They went on the lands, and put up a small cabin, somewhat resembling those which are set up in Kentucky as traps to catch wild turkeys, and this was considered an improvement! Well, with regard to the cultivation of the soil, sometimes they turned up the earth and planted a few hills of corn; and this was considered cultivation. The settlers gained their object, and there was no attempt to exact a too rigid observance of the conditions. No one sat down upon his property with a view to make it his permanent residence. Now, at this moment, old James Masterton, who lives near Lexington, and is eighty years old, excepted, he did not recollect a single individual, or the descendants of any individual, who had remained on the lands which they had originally settled. The settlers acquired their lands, made their entries, and then disposed of them for bear skins, rifles, or any other marketable commodity.

With regard to the settlement and the cultivation of the soil, in the project of the committee, there is no specification of any improvement required; there is no condition for the cultivation of any specific quantity, nor in any defined mode. What does the amendment propose? It allows any man, whether rich or poor, to acquire the right of settling the land, by paying fifty cents an acre. Here is a man who will send one son, or substitute, to set up a cabin and cultivate half an acre on one side of his farm; another, who may set out his potatoes, or plant some corn, and raise a few pumpkins on the other side, and so on, to acquire their patents; and they will afterwards find their way into the market, and be sold as cheap as military patents have been sold at the brokers' on Pennsylvania Avenue.

How many of the soldiers, during the late war, are now to be found residing on their lands? All their patents were disposed of for a mere song, and go into the hands of speculators in our great cities. He had heard of a single individual in New York, holding at this moment a principality in Illinois, and who is retarding the settlement of that part of the country by holding up the lands at an extravagant price. Land is not the only want of man; he must have money to meet his necessities, and gratify his pleasures; and many have less inclination to the occupations of agriculture than to other pursuits. He regretted that every man did not appreciate farming as he did. But it is impossible to change the characters of men. Many who are eager for land desire it not for the purpose of cultivation, but will part with it as soon as they have nominally complied with the conditions which the laws prescribe. He objected to the amendment, because its benefits were not confined to the poor settlers, and on account of its inequality. What chance would the people of Virginia, Kentucky, New York, or Pennsylvania, stand with the people of Illinois, who were well acquainted with the vacant land around them?

We had been told by the President, as well as by the gentleman from Illinois, that population is more important to the country than land; and the sentiment is undoubtedly true. It should be recollected, however, that the mere transfer of population from one section of the country, or from one part of a State to another, adds nothing to the sum total. If it be so important to augment and not to shift the population of the United States, the privilege of settlement should be held out to foreigners, to induce them to come here and increase our numbers. When Georgia distributed her lands by a lottery, although one man might obtain more lands than he possessed before, it produced no increase in the population of the State. It was not a shifting, but an increasing population which was desirable. He wished that our country was densely populated, from the shores of the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean, and that all were endowed with our principles and love of liberty, and our devotion to human rights. But he could not, because he felt this sentiment, consent to be caught by a project which, altogether delusive, whilst its tendency is to sacrifice the public domain, leaves the total amount of our population identically the same.

Pass the amendment of the committee, and the lands will be swept by those who are on the spot; but the population will remain precisely as it is now. The scheme, while it would destroy the public domain, would engender speculation, and lead to numerous frauds and evasions; and, while fraught with palpable injustice to the people in all other parts of the Union, would be found to be far less conducive to the prosperity of the new States than the proposed distribution of the proceeds of the lands.

He had not intended, when he came into the Senate, to make more than a very few observations; and regretted that he had been induced to take up so much time. He hoped, however, that the Senate would excuse the length into which he had been betrayed by the deep feeling which he entertained of the vast importance of the subject which was now under consideration, resulting from a thorough conviction that no measure which does not embrace the interests of all the people of the United States ought to receive the favorable consideration of Congress. He trusted that the Senate would reject the amendment, and settle forever, on the basis of comprehensive equity proposed by this bill, this important question, which, if not speedily and permanently settled, was more likely to produce dissension throughout the country than any other subject which at this time pressed itself upon the consideration of Congress.

In conclusion, he should only invoke the Senate to extend to his bill the same favor which it had received at the last session.

The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 8.

The sitting to-day was occupied principally in acting on sundry appropriation bills, and on executive business.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 9.

After disposing of various private bills, the Senate resumed the subject of the

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. BIBB addressed the Senate about an hour and a half on the subject, when he yielded to a motion for adjournment.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 10.

DOCUMENTS IN THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

The following resolution offered yesterday, by Mr. FORSYTH, was taken up:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to provide, by appropriation, for the employment of temporary clerks in the Department of State, to furnish, during the continuance of the commission under the treaty of indemnity with France, authenticated copies of such of the documents and vouchers deposited in that department, according to the stipulations of the treaty of 1819, with Spain, as may be required by individuals, or by the commission for the elucidation of claims under the said treaty with France.

Mr. FORSYTH briefly explained that this subject had been sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations by a resolution which was offered by the Senator from Maine (Mr. HOLMES.) The committee had considered the subject, and in a conversation with the head of the State Department, he had received the assurance from the Secretary, that the department had every disposition to render such facilities to the individuals interested, as would be within its sphere of duty and its means; but that it had not the power to permit the original documents to be taken from the department, or the dispensable labor which would be necessary to make the requisite copies. The committee, on consideration, had deemed that they could not, consistently with the contract made with Spain, authorize the removal of the documents. They therefore directed their attention to the best mode of obtaining authenticated copies, which would be sufficient for the purposes of the claimants. The clerks in the department were too fully occupied to permit their labor to be transferred to this object; and it was deemed unjust to throw on the claimants themselves the expense of making or obtaining copies of their own papers. It was therefore considered right to cause the expense of making authenticated copies to be paid by the Government.

Mr. HOLMES expressed regret that the committee had come to this conclusion, and that they could not reconcile it to their sense of duty to intrust these papers into the hands of a commissioner. He would inquire of the chairman of the committee whether any trouble had been taken to ascertain if authenticated copies of the documents could be received as evidence by the commissioners under the French treaty, while the originals were in existence? He thought it doubtful whether such copies would be received as sufficient, while the originals were to be had. He believed that such also was the opinion of the clerk of this commission, with whom he had had some conversation on the subject. He wished to know if there had been a discussion of this point in the committee.

Mr. FORSYTH replied that this point had not been discussed. It had, he presumed, been taken for granted that authenticated copies of the documents, made under the authority of an act of Congress, would be taken as sufficient evidence before any tribunal. The removal of the documents from the State Department could not take place without a violation of the existing treaty with Spain; and if they were removed, whenever a new treaty was made, they might be found travelling throughout the country, from hand to hand, and might, not without difficulty, be replaced in the department.

The resolution was then agreed to.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate then proceeded to the special order of the day, being the bill to appropriate for a limited time the proceeds of the public lands, &c.

The question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Public Lands—

Mr. BIBB resumed the remarks which he commenced yesterday, and concluded them.

The question was then about to be taken, when

Mr. KANE suggested that a gentleman who wished to address the Senate was now absent, and he would, to give him an opportunity to be present, move to lay the bill on the table for the present.

The motion was subsequently withdrawn, and, after some conversation, a motion, submitted by Mr. BIBB, to postpone the further consideration of the bill and amendment, and to make it the special order for to-morrow, was agreed to.

After executive business—adjourned.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 11.

SOUTH CAROLINA RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. MILLER presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of South Carolina, in reply to the proclamation of the President, viz:

Resolved, That the power vested by the constitution and laws in the President of the United States to issue his proclamation, does not authorize him in that mode to interfere, whenever he may think fit, in the affairs of the respective States, or that he should use it as a means of promulgating Executive exposition of the constitution, with the sanction of force; thus superseding the action of the other departments of the General Government.

Resolved, That it is not competent to the President of the United States to order, by proclamation, the constituted authorities of a State to repeal their legislation; and that the late attempt of the President to do so is unconstitutional, and manifests a disposition to arrogate and exercise a power utterly destructive of liberty.

Resolved, That the opinions of the President in regard to the rights of the States are erroneous and dangerous, leading not only to the establishment of a consolidated Government in the stead of our free confederacy, but the concentration of all power in the chief Executive.

Resolved, That each State of this Union has the right, whenever it may deem such course necessary for the preservation of its liberty, or vital interest, to secede peaceably from the Union; and that there is no constitutional power in the General Government, much less in the Executive Department of that Government, to retain by force such State in the Union.

Resolved, That the primary and paramount allegiance of the citizens of this State, native or adopted, is of right due to this State.

Resolved, That the declaration of the President of the United States, in his said proclamation, of his personal feelings and retaliations towards the State of South Carolina, is rather an appeal to the loyalty of subjects than to the patriotism of citizens; and is a blending of official and individual character heretofore unknown in our state papers, and revolting to our conceptions of political propriety.

Resolved, That the undisguised indulgence of personal hostility in the said proclamation would be unworthy the animadversions of this Legislature, but for the solemn and official form of the instrument which is made its vehicle.

Resolved, That the principal doctrines and purposes contained in the said proclamation are inconsistent with any just idea of a limited Government, and subversive of the rights of the States and the liberties of the people; and, if submitted to in silence, would lay a broad foundation for the establishment of monarchy.

Resolved, That while this Legislature has witnessed with sorrow such a relaxation of the spirit of our institutions, that a President of the United States dares venture upon this high-handed measure, it regards with indignation the menaces which are directed against it, and the concentration of a standing army on our borders; that the State will repel force by force, and, relying on the blessing of God, will maintain its liberty at all hazards.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to our Members of Congress, to be laid before that body.

The resolutions were read and laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the public lands, &c.

Mr. BUCKNER, who was entitled to the floor, assigned indisposition as a reason for asking further indulgence, and moved to postpone the bill and amendment, and make it the special order for to-morrow.

Mr. CLAY objected to the postponement, as there would be other opportunities for the gentleman from Missouri to be heard before the final disposition of the bill. If the gentleman would permit it to be engrossed, he would himself consent to put off the question on its passage, until the gentleman should have had an opportunity to make his observations.

Mr. BUCKNER stated that his object would be defeated by that course, as he wished to be heard against the engrossment.

After a few remarks from Mr. POINDEXTER and Mr. FORSYTH, the question was put on the motion to postpone, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Black, Brown, Buckner, Calhoun, Dallas, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith, Tipton, Tyler, White, Williams—24.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Webster—21.

So the motion to postpone was agreed to.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 12.

A bill granting a township of land to each of the States of Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Alabama, for the promotion of female education, was taken up in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EWING moved to amend the bill, by inserting the State of Ohio before the State of Indiana, which was agreed to.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. CLAY moved to lay the bill on the table for the present, which was agreed to.—Yeas 19, nays 12.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate then passed to the consideration of the special order of the day, being the bill to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, &c. The question being on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Public Lands, substituting a bill to reduce the price of the public lands:

Mr. BUCKNER rose and remarked, that he was thankful to the Senate for the kindness shown him in having postponed this subject on his account, and, though he felt his health somewhat improved, yet he felt both unwilling and unprepared, from bodily debility, to engage in this discussion; nor would he do so, was he not impelled by a deep sense of duty to his constituents. He had waited for others, abler than himself to do justice to the subject, to lead in the debate. The subject had been so ably and so frequently debated heretofore, that he apprehended Senators had generally formed their opinions upon it. He was not so vain as to believe he could shed much new light on the question, whereby to convince any one, or to change the opinion of any one already formed. He would, therefore, endeavor to avoid fatiguing the Senate, by travelling over the ground heretofore occupied by those who had preceded him. He did not speak for the paltry purpose of being heard either, or of making a display, but because he considered it a question of great interest to his immediate constituents, to all the new States, and the whole American people: and he knew his constituents to be alive to this interest. His object was faithfully to represent them, and to convince the whole American people that, though we may fail in our wishes, yet that we are not ignorant of our rights, and that the fear of failure shall not dismay us from the attempt to assert and maintain them, and to assure those who oppose us that we shall continue to press them until justice be done us. He considered the bill, as reported by the Committee on Manufactures, which is the bill now introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, to contain principles not only hostile to the interest of the new States, but deleterious to the welfare and prosperity of the whole nation. He proposed,

1. To consider the bill.

2. To review some of the arguments urged in support of it.

3. To consider the proposed amendment.

4. To notice the argument of the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) against the amendment, and also his argument in support of the bill.

I am opposed (said Mr. B.) to the bill, because I consider it unequal, unjust, and unconstitutional; unequal, and consequently unjust, because the sums of money heretofore appropriated and applied to the use of the old States are much greater than those sums applied to the use of the new States. See, sir, what has been appropriated for the erection of light-houses, breakwater improvements of the ports and harbors, for fortifications, for the benefit of those old States, and likewise for the internal improvement of those same States. Then see, sir, what sums, I may say from the date of this Government, have, from time to time, not only been laid out and expended for the benefit of the old States, but see how the citizens of those States have been benefited by circulating those vast sums among them. Now, also, look to the great sums that are paid to the people of those States as officers of the General Government; not less than five hundred thousand dollars yearly are paid from the treasury in this way to the State of New York, and seventy thousand to the State of Maine, and all the other old States in like proportion. Now, see how much has been paid in this way to the new States—how much has been paid to Missouri. I invite gentlemen just to turn over their documents, and they will see all this. Before this distribution is made, this thing ought to be equalized; if it is a matter of contract, if we consider this as a settlement of partnership account, (and, indeed, so it has been treated by its friends,) the account ought to be fairly stated from the commencement of the firm. Then we ought to go back to the date of the Government, and see what was put in stock, who has drawn out, and then make a fair dividend of the stock on hand. This bill does not do this, but, without any just rule, arbitrarily says, each shall have so much. This bill makes no allowance for the future increase of the population of the new States; this it should do. Our population is increasing every day, whilst that of the old States is stationary. Our territory is much greater than that of the old States; and in this the provision of the bill bears no just proportion. It is the territory, it is the face of the country, that we ought to improve; and where there is greatest need for improvement, there ought the greatest sums to be applied. But this is not the case under this bill. Little Delaware gets within one share of the same amount that Missouri gets, when many of the counties in Missouri are larger than all Delaware, and need as much improvement; and every other State, though most of them are much smaller in district, gets as much and more than Missouri, under the provisions of this bill. It is clear, from this view of the subject, that there is no system of equality and justice in the bill. This bill contemplates the establishment of a great system of internal improvements, to be carried on by the proceeds of the public lands; and the new States furnish the whole sum, (the lands being in those States.) And yet those who have the most land, and will contribute most to this great scheme, will get less. The people of the new States will never be content with this; for, talk as you may, you never can make them believe they have no superior claim, much less will you make them believe they have less claim than the old States, as this bill clearly asserts. Apart from all other considerations, the location of these lands amongst us (protected as they are by the different acts of Congress forced upon the new States) embarrasses these States, and operates greatly to their disadvantage; and besides, the constant improvement of the country in which they lie, by the citizens of these States, enhances the value of the public domain thus proposed to be parcelled out by the bill. And are we to have nothing in consideration of all this? But the Senator says, we get seventeen and one-half per cent. more than the old States. Was there ever a greater delusion (to use no stronger word) than this? Sir, let us examine this bounty, and its virtue fades before the power of truth and justice.

Public Lands.

Now, sir, five per cent., which is part of this seventeen and one-half, is actually the right of the new States now, under former compacts palmed, I will say, on us, when we were minors, before we were allowed to come into the Union; although, by treaty and compact, we had a right to come in without conditions. And what were the conditions extorted from us? Sir, we were compelled to surrender the right of the State to tax the land sold to individuals for five years after the sale; and we were required never to assert the right of the States to the lands within their limits. It required that those new States should never interfere with the primary right of these United States to dispose of the soil. Thus, you see, we paid dear enough for the five per cent. But, sir, we get, say the friends to this bill, an additional advantage of twelve and a half per cent. Now, sir, look at the provisions of the bill, and the favor it confers on other States, and the losses and inconveniences the new States sustain; and this great boon sinks into contempt—its inequality and injustice are manifest.

This bill contains another principle which is excessively odious to me. It asserts the doctrine that the General Government have a right, and ought, to direct and control the funds of the States. In this it is disrespectful to the sovereignty of the States. If we grant this, let the States dispose of them to their minds, and let not Congress dictate to them; it corrupts and demoralizes the habits of the people, by tempting them to idleness, and begetting the habit of looking to the treasury for money, and the means of living—creating the habit, on the part of candidates for seats in the Legislatures and Congress, of making vain, corrupt, and improper moneyed promises to the people; thus destroying the freedom and purity of elections, and substituting a hope of pecuniary reward for correct principle and patriotism; thus polluting the pure streams of legislation, by producing a scramble, first, here for the money, and then in the State Legislature for its appropriation. Every neighborhood will want it, and that which can give the most votes to a candidate will get it: thus the strongest neighborhood, and not the most destitute and needy, will get the appropriation of the money; and not the poor but the rich will be aided by this fund, for all objects of schools and internal improvements; this must inevitably be the case; and the most influential leaders of religious societies will get the colonial amount. But, Mr. President, any or all of this amount can be applied to any or all of the three objects specified. Does not every one see that these three interests will eternally be warring with each other for the whole amount? The fanatics will want all for the colony of Liberia; the friends to internal improvement will want it all applied to objects of internal improvement, whilst others will say, let us have schools; and thus you will see, in all sections, a bitter war between them for the money. Can it be good policy to create such a source of strife in society, which must pervade all neighborhoods, and destroy all social harmony? Sir, the bill is delusive—is well calculated to deceive and to captivate the people. Whilst it presents the cup of hope, yet within is contained the gilded pill of bitterness and death: it is deceptive, and offers favor and benefits that are not real, whilst it professes to bestow moneyed favors on the people. Yet, the truth is, that the people are actually paying a tax to make the sum thus pretended to be bestowed. I am opposed to this mode of legislating; we ought not to do an act which may mislead and deceive the people; all our acts should be open, so that the people, who have a right to review our work, may see and understand what we have done.

Sir, there is another principle in the bill very mischievous in its consequences, which is this: it is well calculated to disturb the quiet and peaceable enjoyment of a certain description of property in the slave-holding States. Does not every one in those States know, that the more those unfortunate beings are tantalized with a hope of emancipation, the more ungovernable they are, and, consequently, the more wretched they are? If we then furnish the means, do we not invite the intermeddling by fanatics with those people? and will this not be an evil greatly to be dreaded? and wherever there are many free blacks, there always the slave is less manageable, and his condition will be embittered by harsher treatment.

Is not a free black population the worst of all others in our country? Suppose, then, you by this bill furnish the means; will not many be purchased and emancipated? and after they are, who has the power to say they shall go out of the country? If they choose to stay among us, how can we get rid of them? Look, sir, only at what we see every day in this city for a proof of what I say. Sir, this bill is unconstitutional, because in no part of the constitution of the United States is the power expressly given or impliedly given to Congress to use the revenue of the nation for the support of an African colony, or for the benefit of any foreign power, or for any other purpose than the general welfare of the American people.

Sir, what will your constituents and mine say, when they come to understand that they are paying a heavy tax to support a parcel of free negroes and adventurous clergymen in Liberia? If we are exonerated from the payment of a tax here at home within our own limits for the support of a church, why shall we be compelled to do it without our own limits? (at Liberia, in Africa.) Is this the liberty of conscience secured to the people under the constitution of these United States? Where, I repeat, is the power to be found within that instrument, sanctified and consecrated to liberty by the blood and sufferings of our illustrious ancestors? Shall we so soon disregard the obligations of the constitution, and view with indifference the high value of that rich inheritance, when we, and we alone, can boast of having descended from those mighty men whom God had chosen as his peculiar instruments, with whom to demonstrate his power, before the children of men? Sir, it was a peculiar demonstration of power and goodness, such as age or country never witnessed before. I am aware, sir, that it will be said I mistake the object of the colony; that it is not to establish a church there, but only to afford an asylum to those unhappy people (the free blacks.) I understand all that, sir, and I also understand what description of people are engaged in this project; and I ask whether there is not a strict religious discipline kept up there, and whether the liberty of conscience is enjoyed there? Sir, I will not dwell upon this part of the subject. I am not opposed to this colony; I am only unwilling to see an unconstitutional appropriation of money for its benefit; and I would have this same objection to any other object, if I thought the step to be unconstitutional. I know, sir, I will be answered with the assertion that the States will do this: that it is the act of the States, and not the United States; but sir, this is not true; the principle is qui facit per alium se.

So, if the United States order it, then it is the act of the United States. Now, sir, how does this matter stand? The States are enjoined to do this thing by an act of Congress, and they are furnished with the funds; the States are only the instruments to execute the wish of Congress. Then it is not the act of the States, but the United States; and if we lack the power to do this ourselves, we cannot give it to the States.

Sir, we cannot convey a right which we do not possess. All the right and ability which the States have, are derived from the General Government. But if the States have this right already, why shall we attempt to give what they do not need? If, then, the right in the General Government is imperfect, the grant from her to the States of that imperfect right must be unavoidably imperfect. The Senator from Kentucky, who sits furthest from me, [Mr. CLAY,] said, in reply to a call from my honorable friend and neighbor, the Senator from Illinois, who sits nearest on my right, [Mr. KANE,] that the power to make this distribution is to be found in the deed of cession, and in the opinion of the President. I know of no such opinion ever expressed by the President, and, judging from the course that Senator [Mr. CLAY] takes, I should suppose the President had not expressed such an opinion. But, he says, the power is in the deed of cession: this is a broad answer, and amounts to none at all; he has fired at the whole world, and missed it too. Will the Senator quote that part, if any, of the deed of cession, which gives this power? can he put his finger on the page or place where I could find it? I confess I never saw it, often as I have looked for it. Its inequality makes it unconstitutional; this system contemplates to continue that inequality which now exists between the old and the new States, though it is the duty of Congress to remove this injustice, and put all on an equal footing, expressly made so by the terms of the treaties and deeds of cession under which these lands are held. The constitution declares that the constitution of the United States, and treaties made under it, &c. shall be the paramount law of the land. Then any law against a treaty made by virtue of the constitution is void and unconstitutional. In the land laws of the United States, page 43, we have this provision in the treaty with the republic of France, which ceded Louisiana to the United States:

"The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the federal constitution, to the full enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States."

The words in this paragraph are pregnant with much meaning and force. Mark you, sir, the inhabitants of Louisiana (the territory ceded by that treaty, and the people, to whom its protection extends) were to be incorporated into the Union; they were to be made an equal part of the body of the Union of the United States, in the full enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and this was to be done as soon as possible. Now, sir, what is the duty of the Government under these terms of the treaty? The word possible is an expression of great import. As soon as possible these people were to be put into the full enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States. Had we under this treaty any power to delay or refuse to do this? Have we any right to take any step, which necessarily produces delay? Is this a true interpretation to the admission as soon as possible of these people into the full enjoyment of all these rights, on equal terms with citizens of other States, as guaranteed to them by the terms of the treaty? They have, it is true, been admitted into the Union; but are there not other rights which the old States enjoy, which those new States do not? If there be such rights in the old States, then they are not equal with the old States, and the terms of the treaty are not yet complied with; and, I ask, are we not bound to remedy this inequality? If we are, how can we pass this law, which disregards this obligation by postponing the rightful enjoyment of those equal privileges? Sir, there are rights which other States have, and important ones too, which the new States have not. All the old States have jurisdiction over all their citizens, and all the property, real and personal, and tax it for the support of the Government of the State; but we in the new States have not this right, nor have we the right fully to legislate over all the property in the State, for public purposes; the public land being exempt from taxation, and from the legislative action of the State. This bill being calculated, not to remove these embarrassments, but to continue them continues an inequality among the States, and is therefore unconstitutional. But how, it will be asked, are we to remove this inequality? I answer, reduce the price of lands to a fair value; let them pass into the hands of the citizens, subject to taxation; and then, and then only, will the States be equal. By the bill, and the report which accompanied this bill last session, it is admitted that the money is not needed by the Government for revenue purposes; for by both the money is proposed to be given away. Why not then reduce the price of lands? But no; rather than do this, or reduce the tariff, we will squander the whole proceeds of the public lands. Sir, does not every body see that this is a tariff measure in disguise? Do we not see that whatever of revenue is raised by the sales of the public lands, that amount will be taken off the protected articles? Then to throw away these three millions, raised from the public lands, will be to add that amount to the protected articles, and thus keep up the tariff and the lands too; and an attempt to do so is a strong argument against the tariff.

Public Lands.

I am not opposed to the tariff, nor do I object to this measure because it will benefit the tariff; but I will not do an indirect thing; I will not consent to see every interest in the country sucked into the vortex of the tariff, and made subservient to it; nor will I consent to see any one interest control every other in the land. Sir, when the tariff comes up, I will act on that as becomes a member of this body; I will then vote as my judgment directs, and stand openly before my constituents, and the whole American people, subject to that great accountability which I owe them: As we have an excess of revenue, why not reduce the amount gathered off the people? Perhaps it would be sufficient to reduce the price of the lands; if not, then take part off the tariff. I submit it to the friends of the tariff, whether it be prudent and wise to stir up every other interest against the tariff; will they not, by such a movement, unite a force which will put down the whole system? Gentlemen ought to beware how they rouse the slumbering lion. I know this reduction of the public lands is thought to operate against the interest of the manufacturers; but the tariff, it is said, operates against the Southern States, and the present price of public lands against the new States. Now, will it be desirable to see the interest of the South and West united against the tariff? Is the small amount which may be lost to the manufacturer by the proposed reduction of the price of the public lands equal to that which must take place if the tariff is destroyed, (which I hope may not be?) I ask Senators who act with me on this great tariff interest, to pause and see where their movements will take them. Will Southern gentlemen see this waste of fifteen millions of revenue in five years, and still say the tariff oppresses them? Will members from new States, knowing it to be the interest of those States to reduce the price of land now, aid in the passage of this bill, which must forever cut off all hope of any reduction? Will Southern men, whose interest it is to keep up the tariff and reduce the price of the public lands both, vote for this bill? Will gentlemen in slave States vote for this bill, and thus hire the meddler to instigate their slaves to rebellion? Sir, the time is at hand when something must be done with these lands or the tariff—perhaps both. The Senator from Kentucky says he is willing to do all in his power to remove the discontents of the people. I was rejoiced to hear him say so, for I know he can do much; his very name is of itself a host. I fully reciprocate that sentiment, and declare that I will stand by his side, and do all in my power to restore harmony, peace, love, and contentment to our beloved, unhappy, and distracted country. Sir, at such a time as this, when gloom has mantled the manly face of many a patriot, and the whole country appears shrouded in the crimson robes of civil war, and the loved bosom of America, it may be said, is smoking with the blood of her slaughtered sons, will the son of Kentucky again stand forth the pacificator of his country's discontent? No man can reap a richer reward than is within his reach: this act of conciliation will be the brightest diamond in the crown of his immortal fame.

The Senator says this bill will produce harmony; this bill is to bind up all the wounds and heal the discontent of the whole land. Sir, how easy it is to be mistaken; he once thought so of his old friend the American system, and so did I; but where is that now? Its binding efficacy has gone, and it is with great difficulty that, with the support of many of the ablest men in the nation, it is kept alive. I hope it may survive: I will give it my hearty assistance. But, sir, how is it expected that this bill, which is the rickety, ill-bred stripling and descendant of this aged, sickly, sinking sire, can do more than the parent could in its meridian strength? Sir, this bill cannot give content, but must widen the breach among the people; we ought not to legislate thus against the will and interest of the people, though that will and interest be a minority. The majority ought to rule, it is true; yet they should always exercise their power and right respectfully, and with a due regard to the interests of the minority; otherwise we act not as freemen, passing laws for the government of freemen, but as so many tyrants, regardless of the rights of those we govern. Virtuous monarchs respect the feelings and interests of those they govern; and shall that majority which governs a free people do less?

How, sir, can this bill give contentment to those opposed to the tariff? It settles no principle they are contending for; on the contrary, it adds to their misfortunes. But, sir, can any one believe that the wretched pittance distributed to the States will buy off South Carolina from that stand which she thinks necessary to maintain on great and important principles, or any other State opposed to the tariff? Sir, is not this bill adding insult to injury, and fanning the flame of madness throughout the whole country? Ought we to do this? Shall we goad an angry brother to his destruction, though he may be in the wrong; but shall we not rather turn him from the cause of his uneasiness, that he may cool? Sir, in all climes, and in all ages, the best and wisest have erred. Is it best to cast away an erring brother, or is it not our duty to reclaim him? Why, in the moment of his exasperation, add new causes of excitement? If we cannot relieve, do not let us insult and mock the complaints of our own household—those whom we are bound to cherish and defend. Let us do all that is right, and all that we can, to restore confidence and contentment among the people and the States, and leave no man any excuse for wrong doing. And if (which may God in his boundless Providence avert!) this fair land is to follow the fate of other republics, and to be covered with disgrace, sorrow, and wretchedness—if, indeed, the ghosts of the mighty heroes and statesmen who founded this republic are to be made wretched, by the baseness of their degenerate sons, let the world bear proof that we who administer the affairs of this people are innocent. It is not fear, but the love of country I feel, that dictates these remarks. This course, recommended by the Senator, [Mr. CLAY,] as a means to reconcile the discontent, cannot have that effect, but the contrary. Let us, then, not do any thing that may exasperate public excitement, nor leave undone any thing that may properly be done, that may have the same effect. Let us be temperate, prudent, and discreet, and do justice to all. Yield nothing from timidity, nor press any thing to gratify an unbridled ambition in any one. Sir, the destinies of this nation are in our hands. The eyes of the American people, and indeed the whole world, are upon us. The all-seeing eye of Heaven is upon us; and we must not only be judged by those that now are, and by generations to come after us, but by that Power which, sooner or later, we must all feel and account to. How awful is the responsibility we are under, and how great is the necessity of duly weighing the bearing of all our acts at this momentous crisis! Shall the blood of our citizens fall on our heads, or will we not so shape our course, that should blood and carnage cover the fair fields of our country, heaven and earth will witness that we are innocent?

I am the advocate of the tariff, and, on proper terms, mean to maintain it. I surrender my opinions to no man, nor am I to be alarmed by the present excitement. But,

JAN. 12, 1833.]

Public Lands.

sir, I ask the friends of that measure, whether the course recommended is not calculated to injure the tariff? In the first instance, the disguise of this bill is not sufficient to conceal its real object from the people. Then does not the attempt to do this beget, by that indirect movement, a distrust among the people? And shall we not forfeit public confidence in the measure? Again: this bill brings the interest of all those who wish to reduce the lands against the tariff, which, added to the opposition now existing, will, I fear, be highly prejudicial to the tariff. Can this step be wise on the part of the friends of the tariff? I tell gentlemen more liberality towards other great interests must be practised, or the consequences will be more serious than they apprehend. Shall we thus disregard the high value of that rich inheritance of which we, and we alone, can boast having descended, from those mighty men, whom God seems to have taken as his chosen and peculiar instruments wherewith to demonstrate his power on earth?

What, Mr. President, is the argument to sustain this bill? The sordid love of gold, sir, is the argument; money is to be given the States; they are to be bought out; they are asked to surrender their sovereignty for a sum of gold. Who, sir, will take this bribe? What State will, for that paltry trash, surrender her independence, and throw herself in the lap, to be dandled by the General Government, or spurned when she may please? Will those who adhere to the doctrine of State rights do this?

I for one will touch not, handle not, the unclean thing. The sovereignty of these States is now bid for; and we are told, in a spirit of haughty menace, that we had better take what is offered, or we may never have such a chance for a good bargain again, and we will have to reproach ourselves with having let slip so great an offer. Let it go, sir, and in God's name I ask that it may never again be seen within these sacred walls.

I will not purchase a field with the reward of inequality. We are likewise told that our constituents will reproach us; that is, indeed, a matter of great delicacy, and very desirable to be avoided by every man, who has a proper sense of his representative duty. He would be pained to give a just cause of discontent to his constituents. But, sir, we have a duty to perform, and it ought to be done in good faith for the benefit of the country; and when that duty is honestly discharged, though it may give offence to some, whose good will we desire, and whose judgment we respect, yet we have an approving conscience within, which is of itself a treasure, that buoys an honest man above the wrangling waves of persecution and deadly hate; and in this vote, I can say before God and my country, that an approving conscience is mine. But should the chastising lash of our constituents come, (which may Heaven avert,) yet then beneath its tortures we will not call on the honorable Senator to interpose his kindness, or heave a single sigh of sympathy for us. I know my constituents, and they know me, and we will settle the account without troubling the Senator from Kentucky with our differences.

Sir, no man feels the force of those remarks more than myself. I know what it is to meet the black ingratitude of those with whom I have acted, and who by my labors have been profited, and I know what it is to put all such things at defiance.

I am, Mr. President, fully sensible of the exposed situation I occupy: standing on my own principles, bound to no party, I am often shot at by all; but, sir, I shall now, as I have always heretofore done, act on this question as befits an American Senator, and maintain such a course as in my judgment best comports with the interests of my country and my constituents. Sir, I will not crouch beneath any imprecations. I have drunk deep of the bitter cup of unkindness; I have often known what it was to meet the cold ingratitude of those I have served and with whom I have acted; but, thank God, I have also known the healing comfort of kindness; and though clouds at present hover over me, yet when I shall return to the bosom of that State at whose hands I have received so much kindness, I still expect to grasp the hand of kindness there.

The Senator [Mr. CLAY] says these lands were pledged for the payment of the public debt, and, as that debt has been paid by the people with other funds, that now the lands stand chargeable, and therefore ought to be distributed to the States for the use of the people. Has the Senator reflected on the force of this argument? If his principles be true, it would seem that the impost duties have paid the debt instead of the land paying it; that now the land ought to make that sum good to the impost, by taking that amount off the impost and putting it on the lands, or applying the amount of the sales of the land to the reduction of the tariff. Will he consent to this? and yet this is the force of his argument. No, he will not do this, but proposes to give away the lands, not to the people, as the bill delusively pretends, but to Liberia and other things, and all the while the people are still taxed to keep up this very amount thus wasted. But pray, what part of the public debt did Liberia pay, that she must come in for a part of this public treasure? There is no symmetry in the gentleman's plan; but, sir, the truth is, that this view of that pledge of the lands is erroneous. These lands were never pledged to pay that debt, as he views it; it was never stipulated that the lands, and they alone, should pay that debt. They were pledged, but that was only as collateral security, intended to create faith on the part of the public creditor in the ability of the Government to pay the debt, just as if a man should mortgage a tract of land to secure a debt due some other person; but as soon as the debt is paid, the mortgage is discharged. So, here, as soon as the public debt is paid off, the lands are discharged; and they are not, therefore, to be distributed among the States, but they are to be applied to the common benefit of the whole nation. How is this to be done? Why, sir, by selling them, and putting the proceeds into the treasury of the nation, and applying that revenue to the general welfare of the nation. Thus the people will be saved from the payment of so much taxes, and they will likewise be benefited by a proper and just use of the revenue applied to the common good and general welfare of the nation.

The Senator [Mr. CLAY] alludes to the discontent, and says, take care we do not shift the theatre of discontent. I return him that same good advice, with this addition, that the very step now recommended by himself is not only calculated to continue the discontent, but to enlarge its theatre. What does he mean by shifting the theatre of discontent? Does he mean to say that, unless we keep up the tariff, and keep up the price of the public lands too, and then give away the proceeds, a certain part of the Union will rise on us, far more formidable than all the rest? Sir, we are not to be intimidated by such threats, and drawn from the support of just rights; we court no differences with any part of this Union; but we will fearlessly maintain our rights; we censure none for doing likewise; but we say, let us act like brothers, be liberal and just; it is all one family, and we will not quarrel about fractions.

Sir, what objection is there to the adoption of the amendment? What does the amendment propose? It is not necessary that it should destroy the bill. If the amendment succeed, the bill will be improved, and give more satisfaction. The amendment proposes to reduce the price to fifty cents per acre, in favor of the Western settler. If the money should thus be left in the pockets of the land purchasers, it would be more valuable than if appropriated to the object of the bill. The design of the bill is to keep up the price of the public lands. If the bill passes, it will be strong and conclusive evidence that the prophecies of its opposers will be verified. The amendment embraces a principle which I have advocated for years. I rejoice that it does so. The true interest of the West is to reduce the price of the public lands. It is of the utmost importance to the West that their vacant lands be occupied, and their population augmented. It is not necessary to go over former grounds, but I will say a few things on this point. Whenever the public lands shall be sold out at a fair price, the population will be more dense, and readier and able to aid in promoting the object of the Government; society will be improved; the interests of religion, education, good morals, and manners will be better promoted; and the people will be better able to extend the facilities and blessings attendant upon them. They will be able, in all respects, to provide better for their families. The Senator from Kentucky said, people want something else besides land. But if the land is thrown away, there is nothing left. The people do want something else besides land; and by reducing the price of land you enable them to get that something else. You will ameliorate their condition, and remove the hardships to which they are now subjected. They now suffer every hardship imaginable. Remote from mills and other similar conveniences, it is only with great trouble that they procure those advantages. Remote from medical aid, their lives and health are in constant danger. Distant from schools, their children grow up without education. Destitute, in want of churches, they are left without the means of religious instruction. Still, under all these disadvantages, they press onward. They possess a spirit of enterprise and industry, which keeps them above water. It is this, in a higher degree than in any other part of the country, that keeps them from sinking. Is it not as well to promote the interests of these defenders and citizens of the country, as of the free blacks? Why should not the price of lands come down? The price of private lands is lowered; why should not the price of the public lands undergo a corresponding reduction? There is no good reason, no other than the one I suggested—to continue and increase the expenses of the Government, for the purpose of maintaining the tariff. Where is the hope of contentment under such a result? Then let us adhere to the amendment; if the bill must pass, let the amendment go with it; but I had much rather it had been the amendment alone. Our constituents expect us to maintain, and never surrender, the principle embraced in the amendment. They expect us, on this subject, to do our duty. They have honored us, and we ought not to desert them. The people of the West have laid out much for their lands, and have trusted to Providence to afford them the means of getting free from their embarrassment. Nothing but their industry and the fertility of the soil has sustained them. If it had not been for industry and enterprise, unequalled, except in these States alone, they must have sunk beneath their burdens. The Senator says, that at the end of five years the bill may be altered, if found desirable. Sir, so may the price of the public lands be altered at any time.

Reduce that price now, and next year, if you think best, you can raise it. Shall we, notwithstanding, rivet this bill upon us for five years? The Senator said he would not surrender the lands. There is no proposition in the amendment to give away the lands, or to surrender them.

The Senator has argued this amendment as he did the bill to open a commercial canal through the Big Swamp. He assumes facts, and provisions, and principles, not to be found in either. Perhaps he had not read the canal bill. He treated that as an arduous attempt to drain swamps, all the swamps on the Mississippi, &c., when there was no such provision or principle in that bill. So now he assumes the ground that the proposed amendment is to cede all those lands to the States, or to give them away. Now, sir, there is none of this in the amendment; no such principle there. All his argument on that subject, every one will see, is foreign to the question under consideration, and need not, therefore, be answered. I can see no force in it, unless it is intended to raise the impression that we are about to lay violent hands on these lands, and convert them to our use; and, therefore, they are justifiable in doing so first.

But, sir, the people will see and understand this matter in its true light, and apply to it its appropriate merit.

The Senator says, speculators will engross the lands. This, sir, is an old song—too long sung—it has lost its merit and charms; no one believes in it now! The rage for land speculation is over. Can any one be so blind as to believe, that at the price and rate fixed by this amendment, any one will attempt to speculate? The price is too great to induce speculation, and five years' settlement and occupancy is too long for a speculator; besides, the occupant cannot sell his possession. If, sir, in Ohio and Kentucky, where the price of lands was, in early times, much lower than under this amendment, the speculators in land could not stand up, how can they do it under the price proposed by the amendment? Sir, the taxes on the lands, added to the price, will forever check the attempt to speculation. But why, if this provision is favorable to speculation, is it that speculators are opposed to it? These men were never known to go against their interest. I know many land speculators, and in the whole scope of my acquaintance there is not one in favor of reducing the price of lands, nor do I know many moneyed men for it, who use their money in trade. The argument of the Senator proves that all this supposed danger about speculation is a delusion, and that it is their interest to support the present price of lands; for he assumes the ground that we ought to keep up the price for the benefit of speculators. Did he not tell us that, if the price of the public lands was reduced, it would put down the price of private lands; and insisted that we were bound to sustain the former purchasers in that value? Who is it that is interested in this value? Not the farmer, but the speculators, who buy and sell land. Thus, sir, if this position be true, how are the speculators benefited by the reduction? Not so; those who now hold large tracts of land will be compelled to sell for a less price instead of acquiring more; and thus, not the speculator, but the tiller of the soil, will be benefited, by getting his land for a fair and moderate price, and the country settled and improved, according to the rights of the people secured to them under the treaties and deeds of cession, and the constitution of the United States, which put all the States and citizens on an equal footing; (see 1st volume Laws United States, page 480, and page 8 Constitution United States;) until which is done the terms of those instruments are not complied with. Five hundred years from this time, our descendants will, in this chamber, be legislating on this land, says the Senator, [Mr. CLAY.] This is monstrous. Then, by passing this bill, are the new States to understand such a system of oppression is to be adopted, in direct violation of our secured rights? For five hundred years these States are to lose the right of taxing their real estates like other States! Does the Senator thus propose to embarrass the new States? Is this a fulfilment of the treaties and deeds of cession, and the object for which those lands were granted? On the contrary, is it not a direct violation of it?

This, sir, is making colonies of the new States, and not sovereign, equal, and independent States, as you are bound to do. If you have the right thus to disregard the object of the grant, and terms of the treaty, you had a right at the beginning never to settle those States, and thus perpetuate the Territorial Government. To keep them back by not selling those lands for five hundred years, and to perpetuate a Territorial Government, would be a direct violation of the treaty. And is not this the same principle? Will gentlemen representing new States, contending for the equality of States, vote for this bill, and thus surrender their own views, and seal their fate? Does it not tie our hands hereafter? Shall we return to our constituents, and tell them we made a good trade, and sold them for the best price we could get? Were we sent here to trade, or to maintain great and important principles? Shall the pecuniary considerations of this bill dazzle our judgments, and lead us from our own principles? Shall we give up the contest for the pittance allotted to us in the bill? Were I to do this, I would stand justly condemned beneath the burning censure of my constituents.

Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

By the constitution of the United States it is expressly declared, that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

Did it ever enter into the minds of those great and good men who recommended the acquisition of those lands, that the districts were to be made colonies? or was it not their object that they should speedily be settled, and admitted into the Union as sovereign States, equal in all respects to the other States? and was it not to strengthen and enlarge the Union? I pray gentlemen to look into the history of this matter.

Did that great apostle of liberty and equality, the ever memorable republican reformer, under whose wise advice Louisiana was acquired, expect to see her colonized thus? Look to the treaty, and, sir, you see the reverse. She is to be an equal and sovereign member of the Union! Is she so, whilst other States enjoy rights she does not? Is Louisiana now again, at this late hour, to be revisited with that same spirit which resisted the purchase and settlement of the province, and that, too, coming from a quarter, of all others, she least expected it—from Kentucky?

The Senator says, that the plan recommended by the President is contracted, unjust, and partial. This he recommends is broad, equal, and just. In general, I have great respect for the opinions of that Senator, but cannot agree in this with him.

I beg gentlemen to contrast the two schemes—we have them both before us.

This is the plan recommended by the President: "It seems to me to be our true policy that the public lands shall cease, as soon as practicable, to be a source of revenue; and that they be sold to settlers in limited parcels, at a price barely sufficient to reimburse to the United States the expense of the present system, and the cost arising under our Indian compacts. The advantages of accurate surveys and undoubted titles, now secured to purchasers, seem to forbid the abolition of the present system, because none can be substituted which will more perfectly accomplish these important ends. It is desirable, however, that, in convenient time, this machinery be withdrawn from the States, and that the right of soil, and the future disposition of it, be surrendered to the States respectively in which it lies.

"The adventurous and hardy population of the West, besides contributing their equal share of taxation under our impost system, have, in the progress of our Government, for the land they occupy, paid into the treasury a large proportion of forty millions of dollars; and of the revenue received therefrom, but a small part has been expended among them. When, to the disadvantage of their situation in this respect, we add the consideration that it is their labor alone which gives real value to the lands, and that the proceeds arising from their sales are distributed among States which had not originally any claim to them, and which have enjoyed the undivided employment arising from the sale of their own lands, it cannot be expected that the new States will remain longer contented with the present policy, after the payment of the public debt. To avert the consequences which may be apprehended from this cause, to put an end forever to all partial and interested legislation on the subject, and to afford to every American citizen of enterprise the opportunity of securing an independent freehold, it seems to me, therefore, best to abandon the idea of raising a future revenue out of the public lands."

And we have seen that reported by the Committee on Manufactures. That is a departure from the object of these grants, whilst that recommended by the President is a fulfilment of the objects.

Sir, in this opinion the President sustains the power of the constitution, the plighted faith of the Government, and the rights of the States and people; and, sir, the people will sustain him, however he may be denounced by particular individuals. Sir, I do not stand here to eulogize the President, or any man, nor to denounce any one. But, sir, I have given my public support to that individual, and it is due to myself, and the course I have taken in the political affairs of the country to say, that whatever may be his errors and his faults, I believe there lives not on earth a purer patriot and more honest man, or one more wholly devoted to the interest and happiness of his country; and that the plan just alluded to, however it may be taunted and denounced by certain men, will live in the grateful breasts of his countrymen, and be hailed as a monument of wisdom, patriotism, and justice, when that which is proposed as a substitute will sink beneath the anathemas of those whom it is destined to injure. Sir, this excitement of the age will pass away, and the calm of sober reflection succeed the tempest of irritation and revenge, and then justice will be measured out to all men. The Senator says there is no general discontent in the West. Thus he speaks for the whole West. I will only say, the Senator is not sufficiently informed, or he would not use this language. It is not reasonable to suppose he could be well informed on this subject; for, although he represents one of the Western States, yet there are many beyond him, among which he would not be considered the best authority. It is long since his was a frontier State; great changes are every day going on, too; some men have gone from the North and East, to the West, beyond him, and, strange as it may appear, yet it is true, that some men who were once devoted to the West have gone to the East. The glory of the setting sun is lost to us, and he now wastes his golden rays in the cold and heartless regions of the North.

I live in the West, I represent a part of the West, and I assure gentlemen there is great discontent there, and that it will increase until the cause is removed. Gentlemen delude themselves, and mislead their friends, by entertaining and sending out such notions. He says we bought Louisiana, and therefore can exercise our discretion on the subject of her lands. By this it is meant that there is no limitation of power, and that Congress can do as they please over her lands and her citizens. This is not so; she is protected by the treaty. (See Land Laws, page 43, as before referred to.) I ask, could the Government sell or retrocede Louisiana, or could Congress have refused to admit her into the Union, without violating the treaty? If the purchase implied the right to sell, as in ordinary cases, all this might be done. What, then, prevents it? The constitution; the articles of compact, which make all the States equal; and the treaty with France, which says she shall be admitted into the Union, to the full enjoyment of all the rights and privileges and immunities with the other States. And, remember, France was a republic then, and did not intend to sell her citizens as slaves. Where is our power, then, to restrict any of those rights? And, sir, are we not by the terms of that treaty to remove all embarrassments to those rights? Can we refuse to legislate, with a view to continue those embarrassments? Could we have kept her out of the Union by not allowing the lands to be sold and disposed of, and thus forever make her a colony? Could we have done so for five hundred years, as is now proposed by this bill, by continuing her embarrassment? Can we do all this, and yet maintain our faith under the treaty?

I ask gentlemen to reflect and see where this distribution is about to carry them. Away with the notion of State rights and equality, if this can be done. The Senator often alludes to Ohio as an example for the new States. I envy not the prosperity of Ohio, but am proud of it. But that State is differently situated from the other new States. They never suffered the same privations that the other new States do, because much of their lands were taken up on private grants, such as military warrants, and they were soon taxable in the hands of private owners. These large landholders greatly control public sentiment, and by that keep up the price of the lands for their benefit. That is not the case with the other new States. In many of those States the number of private grants are few, and, by losing the right to tax lands, the taxes must fall heavy on all other kinds of property; and, sir, if now Ohio could tax all the land within her limits, she would soon be relieved of the great canal debt, which hangs over and harrasses that State. But when those lands cannot be taxed, the citizens are compelled to pay enormous taxes to make up the deficit, to the great injury of the laboring class of men; and this is the case in all the new States, and in all to a greater degree than Ohio. It is against this oppression we object; to this inequality we object; and this bill is not calculated to remove these objections, but it is admitted will rivet this injustice on us for five hundred years to come. How vain is such a hope! In less than one-twentieth part of that time, the voice of the mighty West, in this chamber, will do herself justice, and dispense it to those who now oppress her; and may she be more just to them than they have been to us. But why push this measure at this time? why not wait until the next Congress, when the West will be fully represented by her twenty-one additional members? Why now strive to saddle us for five years irrevocably with a matter to which we are opposed? It is but a few months before those who are knocking at your door will enter to defend the West; then let us see what will be the voice of the full West on this subject. Sir, after all, the Government cannot enforce this measure against the will of the West. Why adopt measures calculated to disgust the people with the Government? The strength of a republic is the devotion of the people to the Government; and devotion cannot exist without confidence in the administration of the affairs of the Government. The people are now willing to buy those lands, whilst the proceeds go into the treasury, and thereby diminish so much the amount of their taxes. But if this bill passes, and the money is applied to the Liberia colony, or thrown away, the people will examine into this matter; and, sir, I would not be surprised to see them just sit down on the land without purchase. How would you get them off? Public sentiment would forever prevent the execution of your laws. Who would inform of the occupant? Who, sir, would go round the lines to see if he was on the alleged tract, when he saw a few brawny buckskin lads, with their rifles, hunting game? Let us not incense the people by our laws. Sir, another strange argument against this amendment is, that to reduce the lands will draw off the population from the old States. Can we, sir, pass laws to prevent emigration? Have not the people of the United States a natural right to prosecute their happiness and fortune wherever they choose? See Declaration of Independence—there this right is asserted. If we have no right to pass such laws, is it a good reason to refuse to pass a law, because it will allow the free enjoyment of this natural right? This very principle was one of the causes that led to the revolution. Our fathers complained that George III., King of England, had obstructed the population of the colonies by refusing to pass laws for the encouragement of migration hither. (See laws of the United States, 1st volume, page 8.) And are the Congress of the United States going to do this very same thing against the new States? And yet do gentlemen say the States are equal. Strange equality! The people may move from one old State to another, but are not to be allowed to go to a new one; that is, they may go from one manufacturing State to another, but not to a planting or farming State. This is the pith of the argument. And does a Senator, called a republican, too, advocate such doctrines before the American people? Are these doctrines republican? Are they such as freemen ought to maintain? I ask the whole American people to open their eyes and judge for themselves.

The Senator says, the people of the old States will not have an equal chance with Illinois and the other new States to enjoy the benefit of this law. Why will they not? Cannot the people of the old States now purchase lands at the present price of $1 25, as well as those of the new States? And are not large quantities of lands now owned in the States by non residents? And should the reduction take place, cannot they still enjoy the same right to purchase at $1 per acre? In this respect, the amendment makes no change in the right of all to purchase. And, I ask, why will not a citizen, coming from an old State, have the same right to settle as those now in the new States? There is nothing in the amendment to prevent it. To me, sir, there is no force in the whole argument. Again he says, this only shifts the population from one State to another; but, sir, the amendment does not meddle with the people. In that respect it only leaves them free to act for themselves; and this is what it should do. He says we ought to invite the people from Europe, not from the old States. Sir, the amendment invites no one. It only regulates the price of public lands, and the people are left to exercise their own will. But why is he more anxious for Europe than for his own country? Why is he more willing to provide for Europeans than he is to provide for his own fellow-citizens?

Sir, let Europe mind her own affairs, and let us attend to our own. In this argument the Senator admits his desire to check the migration to the new States. Would the Senator have preached this doctrine twenty years ago to the people of Kentucky? Sir, Decius was once the friend of Cato; but other views changed his mind, and bound him fast to Cæsar.

The Senator contended that these lands were obtained by the common blood and treasure of all the States. Now, sir, how did Virgin'a get the great Northwestern territory? Did the other States aid her in obtaining it, or did she not claim it under the charter from the King of Great Britain? And who captured that country? Was it not the State of Virginia? Was it not that gallant son of the Old Dominion, George Rogers Clark, who conquered that country? and did not Virginia, in the true spirit of her chivalry, graciously and generously surrender the whole of those lands to the United States? Now, sir, what common blood and treasure were expended in all this? Who, sir, has since defended those lands? Has not that been done in two wars by the gallant sons of the West? Look, sir, at the movements of the troops last summer. Look at the names of those noble sons of the West. What common claim has any but the West to the fame of the heroic Dodge, of whom it may be said he was born, trained, and seasoned in all the hardships, all the privations and dangers of the West, and is justly entitled to a share in all her glories? Tell me not about your claim being founded on the expenditure of common blood and treasure. Do not the labors and improvements made and laid out by people of the West enhance the value of the common domain? I should not have drawn this distinction, but they were elicited by the argument of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY.] The Senator says, this law will be evaded like the settlement rights of Kentucky. He has impeached the honesty of the West, and said they will join together to defraud the Government—the people will swear for each other. He taunts their poverty, too; calls their houses wigwags, huts, lodges, and, indeed, has compared them to turkey pens. Sir, if we are poor and rough, we are honest, and loyal to the Government; we will neither cheat nor desert our country. Sir, has the gentleman wholly forgotten that he was himself once a Western man? and that this same voice which now derides, once gloriously and triumphantly defended them? And, sir, those were the proudest days of his whole life, to which, I have no doubt, he often looked with mingled feelings of pleasure and regret. Sir, how will the lofty spirits of the West meet this cold rebuke from one who once was their idol, and who yet commands the affections of thousands there? I could, sir, myself have desired the omission of that part of the Senator's argument; but, sir, the Rubicon is past. He would have it so. Let us look a little at this argument. He says the law will be evaded by fraud. How, sir, can this be? Has not the General Government land offices posted over the whole country? Will it not be their duty to see that the provisions of the law are complied with? And if any one is base enough to attempt, by forgery or otherwise, to defraud the Government, it will be very easy to detect all such. This was not the case in Kentucky when those settlement rights were taken up. The settlements in the country were sparse, and none were appointed to take care of the lands. But, sir, I did not think even then the people deserved the broad denunciation we have heard. However, the Senator is from Kentucky; and he best knows the character of his constituents. But all I will say is, that Kentucky is my native State, and I hoped better of her. I have often been proud to say that I am the grandson of the Old Dominion, and the son of Kentucky.

Mr. President: this amendment, I repeat, presents the true interest of the new States; and whilst there is hope, let us not despair. The principle is gaining ground; we have now an open expression of the Executive in support of it. I would say to the new States and their friend, not to substitute any project which may delude and lead us from our interest and duty. Let us, then, adhere to the amendment, and reject the bill; and if the amendment does not yet do us justice, we may still improve the principle. But, sir, how can we expect to obtain a reduction, if now the principle of reduction is rejected by rejecting the amendment? We commit ourselves, against our own future, to reduce; one of the very objects of the bill is to prevent a reduction; and shall we swallow the hook in the bait that is set for us? Or if the original bill must pass, I pray gentlemen friendly to the principle of reduction, to retain the amendment with the bill, and thus save the principle of reduction; but if we now take the bill without the amendment, there is an end to all hope forever: this very vote is an expression against us, and the inevitable operation of the bill will forever close the door against us. Let us reduce the price of those lands to a fair price. What objection can there possibly be to putting public lands on a fair footing with private lands that lie in the same State or neighborhood? All other property within the last fifteen years has come down; and why not these lands? Sir, seventy-five cents per acre is a better price now, than one dollar and twenty-five cents twenty years past. Sir, private lands are now, improved, with improvements, selling for a lower relation than the public lands; yet, gentlemen say, if we reduce these lands, speculators will be benefited, where the consequence of the high price of those public lands is, private lands are sold by the speculator, on better terms for the purchaser, than the public lands are sold. The Senator from Kentucky says, the reason why those second-rate lands do not sell in Missouri is, because the emigration does not go there as it has in others; that people will not buy lands until they are ready to go on them. In this he is entirely wrong, and shows that he does not understand the subject. Sir, let any one look at the manner in which the country is settled, and the quality of the land sold and that unsold, and the location of those lands, and he will see that he is entirely misinformed, and, besides, does not at all know that people do not wait to settle on lands before they buy, or even to remove to the country. Do not many purchase lands that never settle on them, or migrate to the country at all? Sir, what quantities of land are owned by non-residents in all the new States!

Mr. President, I have done with the argument; I come to a close. I have attempted to explain my views on this subject, and now leave it to be decided by others.

MONDAY, JANUARY 14.

ENDLESS LIFE.

Mr. CLAY presented the petition of Leonard Jones and Henry Banta, of Kentucky, representing themselves subjects of endless life, who had made important discoveries connected with the morals, religion, and eternal existence of man, and asking a grant of land for the purpose of enabling them to extend and propagate their discovery.

Mr. C. remarked that he felt some doubts as to the propriety of presenting this petition; but as it was couched in respectful language, he had concluded to submit it, lest, by neglecting to do so, he might incur the endless enmity of the petitioners. The memorial asked for a grant of public lands, upon terms which were very modestly left entirely to the discretion of Congress. They would accept of them even in perpetuity; but if, as they intimated, they had discovered the secret of living forever, he would suggest to the Committee on Public Lands the propriety of scrutinizing the subject before they complied with the prayer of the memorialists. Mr. C. moved to refer the petition to the Committee on Public Lands, which was agreed to.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. WEBSTER, pursuant to notice previously given; moved that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill to indemnify certain citizens of the United States for spoliations committed on their commerce by the French prior to 1800.

Mr. CLAY expressed his regret that the motion should be made at this time, when the discussion of the bill relative to the public lands was unfinished. That subject had been before the Senate for some days, and might be speedily disposed of. But if the French spoliations were to be taken up and discussed, it would occupy several days, and probably the whole week. As to the importance of the two subjects, without intending to undervalue the bill which was the subject of the present motion, he must be allowed to give precedence to the former.

Mr. BUCKNER expressed his willingness, in consequence of indisposition, to waive his right to the floor, in order to conclude his remarks. [Mr. B. had delivered, the day before, only a part of the speech which is given above, and was to-day entitled to the floor.] He preferred that the Spoliation Bill be taken up to-day, and the subject of the public lands should be allowed to lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. CHAMBERS expressed a hope that the Senator from Kentucky would withdraw his objection, as the gentleman from Missouri had expressed his desire to delay the residue of his remarks until to-morrow.

French Spoiliations.—Proclamation.—Public Lands.—S. Carolina.

[JAN. 14, 15, 16, 1833.]

Mr. CLAY persisted in his opposition, and stated that he should consider a decision not to take up the Land Bill as equivalent to a decision to leave it unacted on for the rest of the session. He thought the gentleman from Missouri looked remarkably well, and quite competent to continue the debate. He then asked for the yeas and nays on the motion, which were accordingly ordered.

After a few remarks from Messrs. WEBSTER, SPRAGUE, and FORSYTH, the question was taken on the motion of Mr. WEBSTER, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Black, Brown, Buckner, Chambers, Dallas, Dudley, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Holmes, Kane, King, Miller, Moore, Robinson, Silsbee, Smith, Tipton, Webster, Wilkins, White—24.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Clay, Clayton, Dickerson, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Knight, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Seymour, Sprague—14.

So the Senate agreed to consider the bill; and the bill being then before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole:

Mr. WEBSTER, in a speech of about two hours, developed the principles of the bill, and the grounds on which it was reported by the committee, and on which he should advocate its passage.

Mr. TYLER then explained the difficulty he felt in bringing his mind to embrace this important subject, after so long an interval had transpired since he had looked into the subject; and moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. WEBSTER acquiesced in the motion, which was carried.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the Senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

After the doors were re-opened,

Mr. CALHOUN laid on the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to lay before the Senate a copy of his proclamation of the 10th of December last; and also the authenticated copies of the ordinance of the people of the State of South Carolina, with the documents, accompanying the same; and of the proclamation of the Governor of the State of South Carolina of the 20th of December last, which was transmitted to him by the Executive of that State, with the request that he should lay them before Congress.

The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 15.

PROCLAMATION.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. CALHOUN was then taken up for consideration.

Mr. KING rose, not, as he said, for the purpose of entering into a discussion of the resolution; but his object in rising was merely to state, for the information of the Senator from South Carolina, the reason why he might perhaps think it not expedient to press the consideration of his resolution at this time. It might lead to a discussion which would be found not to be necessary. A message from the President would be received, perhaps, to-day or to-morrow, which would communicate the documents called for by this resolution. They would have been communicated to the Senate before this time, but that a delay had taken place in endeavoring to obtain an authenticated copy of some of the documents from South Carolina. He thought, therefore, that the proper course would be to lay the resolution, for the present, on the table.

Mr. GRUNDY then rose, and stated that he was authorized to say that the Senator from South Carolina would, on Thursday next, or perhaps earlier, receive all the documents called for by this resolution, and much more, in a communication from the President. And the reason why the papers had not been communicated at an earlier period was, that a copy of the act of Assembly could not be procured in an authentic form; but the documents would be communicated, whether such copy should be obtained or not. He hoped the Senator would not, under this assurance, insist on the present action of the Senate upon his resolution, but would suffer it to lie on the table.

Mr. CALHOUN said he certainly should not object, under the circumstances, to the laying of his resolution, for the present, on the table. His object had been merely to obtain these documents, to be laid before the Senate. And he thought it proper to say that he did not expect any such discussion on the subject as gentlemen seemed to have anticipated. It had not been his object to cast censure any where, but only to bring the documents into the possession of the Senate. They were, in his opinion, connected with a most important issue—an issue which in importance had never been surpassed in the history of this country, not even at the time when the Declaration of Independence was published. Under this impression, he had brought forward his resolution to bring the papers before the Senate. If any Senator thought proper to move to lay the resolution on the table, he should make no objection to the course.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the resolution was then laid on the table.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate then resumed the bill to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, &c.

Mr. BUCKNER continued, and concluded his remarks in support of the amendment, (as given above.)

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 16.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

A message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting copies of the proclamation and other documents relating to South Carolina, her ordinance, &c. &c.

The reading of the message occupied an hour and a quarter. As soon as it was finished—

Mr. GRUNDY moved to refer the message and documents to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that they be printed.

Mr. CALHOUN then rose and said, that his object in taking the floor was not to make any remark on the motion which was immediately before the Senate. What he was about to say, therefore, would, under parliamentary rule, be entirely out of order. But he would, in the peculiar circumstances of his situation, throw himself on the indulgence of the Senate for his pardon for the entire irrelevance of the remarks which he should feel himself bound to make.

He felt no disposition to notice many of the errors which the message contained in reference to the documents by which it was accompanied, but there was one which he should deem himself a recreant to his State if he did not rise emphatically and promptly to notice. It was stated by the Chief Magistrate, in substance, that the movements made by the State of South Carolina were of a character hostile to the Union. Was he right in this impression? If so, he would say that there was not a shadow of foundation for such a statement. There was not a State in the Union less disposed than South Carolina to put herself in such attitude of hostility. But the grounds on which the President founds this inference were not less extraordinary than the inference itself. When he stated that hostile movements had been made, it was to be regretted that the President did not state the whole of the movements of this character which had taken place. Before South Carolina had taken any position of a conflicting character, there had been a concentration of United States' troops on two points, obviously for the purpose of controlling the movements of the State. One of these concentrations was at Augusta, and the other at Charleston. Previous to this circumstance, the State of South Carolina had looked to nothing beyond a civil process, and had intended merely to give effect to her opposition in the form of a suit at law. It was only when a military force was displayed on her borders, and in her limits, and when the menace was thrown out against the lives of her citizens, and of their wives and children, that they found themselves driven to an attitude of resistance. Then it was that they all prepared to resist any aggression.

South Carolina.

But the President had also rested his inference on another ground. He had laid it down, that the tribunal of the Supreme Court of the United States was, in the last resort, the only arbiter of the difference in the construction of the constitutionality of the laws. On this point there seems to have been a great change in the opinion of the Executive within the last twelve months. The President had not held this opinion in reference to the resistance of the State of Georgia. A narrow river only divides the territory of Georgia from that of South Carolina; yet, on the one side, the power of the Supreme Court, as the arbiter in the last resort, is to be sustained; while, on the other side, the will of the Executive is to be supreme.

But, if the Supreme Court was to be the arbiter, he wished to know in what manner the decision of that tribunal, as to the constitutionality of the tariff law as a measure of protection, was to be obtained? How was an issue to be made up? This mode had already been tried in the case of Holmes, a citizen of Charleston, and the court had declared its incapacity to act, for want of jurisdiction, and refused to take cognizance of the subject. He wished to know why this circumstance had been suppressed—no, suppressed was too strong a term—for gotten in the message of the Executive. It will be remembered that when the bill of 1828 was introduced, which had been justly called by the Senator from Massachusetts a bill of abominations, a representative from South Carolina had ineffectually endeavored to obtain an amendment of the title of it, so that it might bear on its face the character of protection, which belonged to it. But it was sent abroad under a delusive and deceptive name. How, then, was South Carolina to try the question? Even if she had every reliance on the authority of the Supreme Court, she could not obtain the judgment of that court. What course, then, was left for South Carolina, but that which she had pursued?

It was also suggested in the message of the Executive, that the State ought to have resorted to the other remedy which was pointed out, and asked at an earlier period for a convention of the States, in order to amend the constitution. South Carolina had been prevented from making applications on this subject. She had wished over and over again to obtain a convention, but she had uniformly found a fixed majority in both Houses against her. How, then, was she to obtain the acquiescence of the constitutional majority of two-thirds of the two Houses? Under these circumstances, she made no application until the State itself had declared it unconstitutional, and the emergency arose which called for it.

These were all the remarks which he considered himself called on to make at this moment in reference to the message of the Executive.

It was obvious that the country had now reached a crisis. It had been often said that every thing which lives contains in itself the elements of its own destruction. This principle was no less applicable to political, than to physical constructions. The principle of decay is to be found in our institutions; and, unless it can be checked and corrected in its course, by the wisdom of the Federal Government, its operation will form no exception to the general course of events. The only cause of wonder, in his opinion, was, that our Union had continued so long; that, at the end of forty-four years, our Government should still retain its original form. He considered that, to the great event of 1801, the success of the party which had elevated Mr. Jefferson to the Presidency, was mainly to be attributed this duration. Nothing but the elevation of that individual had prevented the earlier termination of an experiment. But the time had at length come when we are required to decide whether this shall be a confederacy any longer, or whether it shall give way to a consolidated Government. He called on Senators solemnly to pause and deliberate on this important question. As he lived, he believed that the continuance of any consolidated Government was impossible. It must inevitably lead to a military despotism. At this moment, without having been brought into contact with any adverse circumstances, without any conflicting causes, in a time of peace, and under the influence of an unexampled prosperity, our Union stands on the eve of dissolution or the verge of a civil war. How was this? Was it not attributable to the powerful workings of the consolidating principle?

In this widely extended republic there has been, of necessity, an active conflict of interests. In one portion a system works beneficially, which is found to be oppressive in another portion. The system of protection is said to operate to the advantage of those parts of the country which are the strongest. Every one said so, and, therefore, he was bound to believe so. But in the weakest portions of the country there was scarcely to be found one who would not, if he had the power, put down the system of protection. There were thus different views on both sides. How was this to operate? He intended, in nothing which he should say, to make any personal references. It was his wish to argue the subject solely on philosophical grounds. A President is elected, and comes into power; his policy necessarily conforms to that of the party by which he is chosen. It cannot be otherwise. The tariff party, for example, support as their candidate a gentleman who is known to be in favor of their views. He did not condemn this: it was the natural and unavoidable course of things. The opposite side must then take up one as their candidate, whose opinions on the subject of protection are less marked, but who may be sustained by a portion of the tariff party, because he is for that system to a certain extent, and by a portion of the anti-tariff States, because he is less hostile to their interests than his competitor. By this combination a triumph is obtained. He who comes into power in this manner, if he is possessed of any intelligence, can never be dislodged. How can he? He takes a middle ground between the North and the South. If one interest attempts to make a forward movement, the other side has occupied the ground. And, by this means, burdens to the amount of thirty millions, without the Post Office Department, and, including that department, thirty-two millions, are imposed upon the country, under the pretence of revenue—an amount considerably greater than the value of any single one of the great interests of the country—exceeding the whole amount of the cotton crop, or the entire value of the shipping interest. Thus, identifying himself neither with tariff nor anti-tariff, bank nor anti-bank, internal improvement nor anti-internal improvement, he cannot be dislodged. What is the result? The system of oppression goes on. The weaker side sees it is a hopeless case, and makes resistance. The stronger still adheres to the system. The middle power is then thrown to the stronger side, and the stronger calls in force which puts down reason. This was the process of consolidation. Gentlemen

South Carolina.—Public Lands.

might contend that this was not a question of consolidation; but it is consolidation. And he could see no distinction between a consolidated Government and one which assumed the right of judging of the propriety of interposing military power to coerce a State.

We (said Mr. C.) made no such Government. South Carolina sanctioned no such Government. She entered the confederacy with the understanding that a State, in the last resort, has a right to judge of the expediency of resistance to oppression, or secession from the Union. And for so doing it is that we are threatened to have our throats cut, and those of our wives and children. No—I go too far. I did not intend to use language so strong. The Chief Magistrate had not yet recommended so desperate a remedy. The present is a great question, and the liberties of the American people depend upon the decision of it. It was impossible that a consolidated Government could exist in this country; it never can. Did I say in this country? It never can exist in any country. If any man would look into the history of the world, and find any single case in which the government of absolute majority, unchecked by any constitutional restraints, had lasted one century, he would yield the question. For himself, he had been, from his earliest life, deeply attached to the Union; and he felt, with a proportionate intensity, the importance of this question. In his early youth he had cherished a deep and enthusiastic admiration of this Union. He had looked on its progress with rapture, and encouraged the most sanguine expectations of its endurance. He still believed that if it could be conformed to the principles of 1798, as they were then construed, it might endure forever. Bring back the Government to those principles, and he would be the last to abandon it, and South Carolina would be amongst its warmest advocates. But depart from these principles, and in the course of ten years we shall degenerate into a military despotism. The cry had been raised, "the Union is in danger." He knew of no other danger but that of military despotism. He would proclaim it on this floor, that this was the greatest danger with which it was menaced—a danger the greatest which any country had to apprehend.

He begged pardon for the warmth with which he had expressed himself. Unbecoming as he knew that warmth to be, he must throw himself on his country and his countrymen for indulgence. Situated as he was, and feeling as he did, he could not have spoken otherwise.

Mr. FORSYTH said, on the motion to refer, all observations on the merits of the President's message were irrelevant and irregular.

Mr. CALHOUN said he had so stated in the outset of his remarks, and apologized for it.

Mr. FORSYTH.—True, the Senator from South Carolina had admitted the existence of the rule, and had given the best possible excuse for the violation of it. Mr. F. had no such excuse to offer; therefore, should not follow the example.

The President has, in the execution of his duty, frankly and openly expressed his opinions, and the facts and reasons upon which they were founded. The Senator from South Carolina, on the part of his State, had interposed his denial. The issue is fairly made; the competent tribunal will decide. There was one of the remarks of the Senator Mr. F. felt himself bound promptly to notice, lest his silence might be construed into acquiescence. The President is charged with inconsistency of opinion in the cases of South Carolina and Georgia.

[Mr. C. explained. He alluded only to the opinion that the Supreme Court was a final arbiter.]

Mr. F. said it was not important as to the extent of the allusion. As the sole representative at present [Governor Troup is confined by indisposition] of Georgia, he must protest against the case of Georgia being confounded with that of South Carolina. He had, on a former occasione, endeavored to demonstrate to the Senate the distinction between the two cases: he was ready again to show the distinction between them, and to defend its justness. To others it might not be so, but to the great body of the people of Georgia it was obvious and palpable. The honorable Senator had assured the Senate that no State loved the Union more than the State of South Carolina. Mr. F. heard this declaration from such high authority with pleasure. It must be confessed that the course of the State had placed the object of their love in extreme danger. Mr. F. congratulated the Senate, that, notwithstanding the threatening appearance, there was no danger to the public peace. The Chief Magistrate pledges himself not to resort to any but defensive force; and the Senator from South Carolina tells us that South Carolina has no desire to use force unless assailed. The hope might be indulged that all these pledges would be redeemed—if they were, force would not be used.

The motion was then agreed to.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, 3,000 extra copies of the message and documents were ordered to be printed.

Mr. POINDEXTER laid on the table certain amendments which he proposed to make in the bill appropriating, for a limited time, the proceeds of the public lands, &c.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill appropriating, for a limited time, the proceeds of the public lands, &c.

Mr. BLACK, of Mississippi, said, but for the peculiar situation in which he was placed, after so much having been said on this subject, both at the present and last session of Congress, and said, too, by gentlemen who justly command a high reputation for their wisdom and experience in national affairs, he should not have troubled the Senate with any remarks. He trusted, however, that the importance of the subject, involving, perhaps, the tranquillity of the Union, and certainly the prosperity of the State he had the honor in part to represent, would plead his apology for asking for a few moments the attention of the Senate.

We who represent the new States (said Mr. B.) have been especially invited by gentlemen to enlist with them in this service. To some of us has been offered the imposing consideration of five hundred thousand acres of land, and twelve per cent. on the amount of sales as bounty; and our dividend with them proportioned according to federal numbers as yearly pay. For one, I have determined to refuse the bounty, reject the pay, and to decline the service. I am well aware, that in so doing, my judgment will be called in question by many, even of those whose good opinions I have been accustomed to value. To vindicate, therefore, the conclusions to which I have come in this matter, I will state in a brief, but I fear a desultory manner, the reasons which have induced them.

The earnestness with which this measure was brought forward, and the zeal with which it has been pressed upon the Senate, cannot have escaped the observation of any. It is feared that these symptoms manifest on the part of some a wish to press this question through the Senate, that it may have an important bearing on another measure which will probably come up, with which this is intimately connected. My allusion, sir, is to a reduction of the duties on imports. It is my intention to abstain from any remarks on this interesting, too exciting, and, I had almost said, awful subject. I have alluded to it for the purpose of giving it as my opinion, and I submit it with deference to the Senate, that, under existing circumstances, no obstacle should be permitted to intervene between us and the adjustment, and the speedy adjustment, of that question. It is thought that the amount of duties may be reduced six millions; let this bill pass, and we shall instantly be told that the estimate made is incorrect—that three millions arising from the sales of public lands having been abstracted, a deduction of fifty per cent. from the estimate must be made. The three millions being taken away, other three millions, arising from the duties on imports, must supply the place of it. That there is no difference between taking this money and other money from the treasury, to the amount of current disbursements, on account of land, is too palpable to be denied. The officers attached to the Land Office Department are to be quartered on the treasury. Their salaries, amounting annually to ———, all the expense of surveying and bringing the land to sale, the expense of making future Indian treaties, and, if those are already made, (the amount requisite for which is estimated at near two and a half millions,) the expense of annuities to Indians, with which the lands properly stand chargeable, are to be paid by the operations of the custom-house. To meet all these demands, under our present engagements, nearly one and a half millions will be required annually for several years. An increase on this sum, in effecting other Indian treaties, and carrying them into effect, may be expected to a large amount, which, in a few years, coupled with the common current expense on account of the public lands, will make a considerable outlet for the surplus revenue, which, at present, threatens to become troublesome on our hands. If this goes into operation, we expect, in future, to hear no more resolutions to suspend the surveys of the public land, but any and every expense relating to lands borne without a murmur, so long as it is not to come out of this distribution fund. The South has complained, and justly too, of the unequal operation of the present system of revenue laws. It is unequal, unjust, and oppressive. Its baneful effects upon the prosperity of the South have been severely felt, while the collection of revenue was confined to a sufficient sum to pay the necessary disbursements of the Government, and a portion yearly of the national debt. Against this oppression they have remonstrated times almost without number, with no effect. This measure, in addition to paying to the revenue as heretofore, will have the effect in its operation to force out of them yearly a sum for distribution among the States. Why add injustice to that already complained of? Will it not, particularly at such a time as this, be received ungraciously? Sir, it was the last pound added to the burden of the camel which destroyed the animal.

Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

Have gentlemen well considered this system of distributing money among the States in all its tendencies and consequences? Have they fully weighed all the bearings which it will naturally have, or be made to have, on our relations between State and Federal Governments? Can gentlemen give us any assurance that, this sum being at first distributed, other and larger amounts will not be demanded, and the strong arm of the Government made use of to raise the money? Can we be assured that the General Government, having the power to raise funds and distribute them, will not in time be enabled to buy up the assent of the States to the exercise of any and every power? I think my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BRAN], when he spoke of force being necessary to carry down this system, if he had looked into futurity, would have seen a period not far distant when it will be uncalled for. By a plentiful use of the silver, there will be no necessity for the steel. Sir, we are, I fear, on the eve of taking a step in national policy, the full effect of which our generations will alone be able to determine. The desire of gain and aggrandizement, although planted in the human bosom for the wisest of purposes, is yet a dangerous passion. Who can tell to what dereliction of principle the corrupt and corrupting use of money will not lead? The history of our own and former times furnishes innumerable instances. It was the thirty pieces of silver which procured the surrender of the Saviour of the universe.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has pictured in glowing colors the beautiful prospect of this Union cemented in more perfect amity for ages to come by the interest which each State will have in the distribution of the funds from these public lands. If I thought a consummation so desirable could be realized, no objection would be made, although it were all at our expense. I should fear to call in the assistance of the sordid passion of avarice to the noble feeling of patriotism, heretofore considered the best security of our Union. It would be safer to depend for the permanency of our Union upon that high veneration which all must feel for those institutions bequeathed to us by our ancestors, the rich purchase of their blood; upon that love which one portion of our country must bear to those of another, as brethren and countrymen; upon that pride to which the bosom of no true American is a stranger, when he looks upon this his country and native land. Our country, governed by the constitution and just laws, must always present an object of veneration, love, and pride. Our Government is a noble model from the hands of masters. Its ruin would be that of a mighty fabric; an unenviable immortality is secured to him who procures its downfall; his case will be parallel with that of the dark angel of heaven, and his doom will be the same. I hope, sir, not to see the day when my country shall be divided into distinct communities, or States, separated by irreconcilable jealousies and eternal wars. I will not enlarge on this unwelcome topic. There is a legal question arising on the construction of the acts of cession of the several States. The lands are declared to be a fund, after the payment of the revolutionary debt, for the benefit of all, the States ceding the lands included. The Government, though having a general power to dispose of the lands, is yet charged with the trust to see that the lands, or the proceeds, are disposed of for the benefit and advantage of all. Would not this be a transfer of the trusteeship to the different States? Would it not be substituting them, instead of the Government, to see that the object of the grant be effected? Whether these lands, or the money arising from the sale of them, be disposed of for the benefit and advantage of all, must depend upon the use or disposition made of the lands or money. If a State should expend the money on internal improvements of a local nature, or on some work suggested by whim or desire of popularity, it would not be contended that this expenditure would be for the general good. The power to appropriate the funds on internal improvements, given by this bill to the several States, is not confined to that description which will be generally beneficial. As to colonization being of general benefit, the remarks of my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BRAN] have been full and sufficient. Power is also given to the States to pay off their old debts with this money, without reference to the objects on account of which the money for which the debt was contracted had been expended, and without reference to the nature of the debt itself. It may be that the States, some or all of them, will appropriate the money in such way as to be for the benefit and advantage of all; but that they have the power to do otherwise is too apparent. The claim which some of the new States have set up to the right both of jurisdiction and property over the public domain, has a direct bearing on this measure. The States of Indiana and Mississippi, by solemn resolutions of their Legislatures, have asserted this claim. The Governor of Illinois, in his annual message, set up the claim of that State. I am not prepared to urge any thing in favor of this pretension, but honorable Senators who represent those States cannot vote for this measure without an entire surrender of all such right claimed by these States. This would be an exercise of power over these lands entirely inconsistent with the ownership on the part of the States. Another objection to this bill arises on the part of the new States, on the ground of expediency. It will have a tendency to perpetuate the present high price of the public land, when all the States shall become directly interested in the amount of the sale. They will then hoard the lands up as their particular and special treasure, offering for sale only small quantities, and forcing off the inferior land at the same price with the good. Indeed, we have been told in this debate that this is to be a source of revenue to the States for five hundred years. We need not expect to see the prices reduced and graduated if this measure be successful. We have seen, with the present system in force, that our complaints on this subject have not been listened to, and our memorials have gone unheeded.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY], has told us in his speech and in his report, that the price of the public land ought not to be reduced; that the large quantity remaining unsold is no evidence that the land is worth less than the minimum price; but that it is for the want of demand. It is admitted that there is a large quantity of public land sold yearly of better quality than the large bodies which remain unsold. The reason of large quantities remaining on hand, for which there are no purchasers, is found in the want of quality in the land itself. I will illustrate my idea of the state of the case by a familiar, and, I think, a parallel example. Suppose a merchant ships large quantities of goods, (Kentucky bagging, if you please;) he sells all, except one lot, at a particular price; that lot remains on hand after all is sold, and while others are selling daily in the same market lots of the same goods at the same price; in a short time the merchant would begin to conclude that there was something in the quality of the goods on hand which caused them not to sell. Now, if the shipper were wealthy, and able to engross all the goods of this description in market, he might be enabled to force off the inferior for the same price that the superior article sold at, by making a high demand in market. In the same manner the inferior lands may be forced at the price of superior quality. This does not prove that those lands are now worth the minimum price, but that they may in time be forced off at it, by holding them up. I will submit whether it is the part of a paternal Government, anxious to foster the interests of all alike, to act the part of the stock-jobbing monopolizer; instead of disposing of the land at the price which it is now worth, to hold them up for a better price, for ages, to the great injury of the poor people within the limits of the State in which they are situated, and to the disadvantage of the States themselves? What is the opinion on this subject of the States in which these lands are situated? The States of Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, have, by frequent memorials, declared that the prices should be graduated and reduced; that holding up the refuse lands within their limits operates injuriously, by retarding their growth, and keeping many of their citizens from becoming freeholders. In support of these opinions, frequently expressed, the returns of the registers and receivers, making an estimate of the average value of the public lands, show it to be in every State far below the minimum price. Not more than one-twentieth part of the vacant land is said to be of first quality in any State, and the average value in some of the States not more than thirty cents, and in none, I think, more than one-half the minimum price. From an extensive acquaintance with the public lands in the Southwest, I am of opinion that the estimate made by most of those officers is much too high.

The policy pursued by this Government never was followed by any other under the sun. When Spain held a part of the Southwest, she thought it her interest to encourage the settlement of the country, and gave to every citizen who would settle the land as much as was necessary for his comfort and convenience. France and Great Britain, in different portions of the country, did the same. The republic of Mexico, by holding out the same inducement, is drawing daily to its territory numbers of our respectable citizens. In that section of the country where the public domain was thus disposed of by France and Spain, previous to the purchase by the United States, the advantage which the country derived from it is apparent at the present day. Every man there is a freeholder, interested in the soil, and his house and home is his own. That portion of the territory which subsequently fell within the limits of the State of Mississippi, although poor, is well settled by inhabitants who are sober, industrious, and hospitable. If the land had not been given away, it would never have been settled. The settlement of Kentucky was greatly accelerated by the terms on which the lands were disposed of, under different regulations. Settlements were encouraged; the prices were graduated at different times, until it was eventually sold to settlers at twenty-five cents the acre. Although the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has spoken in somewhat humble terms of the improvements made by the first settlers, yet I do not doubt but that much of the comfort and prosperity of the yeomanry of that State is attributable to their having obtained lands, on account of these improvements thought so inconsiderable. In the State of Maine, lands of inferior quality were disposed of at thirty cents. There is no doubt but the honorable Senators from that State have seen the happy influence on their prosperity, produced by the cheapness of land. Will they, having seen these advantages, unite with others in perpetuating on us an onerous system? In the States of Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, it is an object of great importance that the lands of inferior quality shall be offered at such prices as will induce the settlement of them. The most fertile land is settled by rich planters, having numbers of slaves; the second-rate land is taken up exclusively by those who have few or no slaves. The general settlement of these lands will add greatly to the strength and security of the whole State. Those portions of the State having a dense colored population will be protected by the proximity of the white population on these lands.

The Government is required, by the act of cession of Georgia, to "dispose" of them. The Government is not to hold them forever without offering them for sale, nor to offer them at prices at which they will not sell; which amounts, in fact, to not offering them at all; but to "dispose of them" for the common benefit.

The five hundred thousand acres is thrown into one section of the bill as a douceur for those States for whom it is intended; but it will be recollected that this is their proportionate part with the other new States for objects of internal improvements. The State of Ohio has received 922,937 acres, Indiana 384,728, Illinois 480,000, and Alabama 400,000 acres. These donations have been made for specific internal improvements; the completion of which, it was thought, would advance the prosperity of the States in which they were severally undertaken, and at the same time enhance the value of the public land. When it can be shown that both these great objects can be effected, there can be no objection, either on the score of principle, or constitutional objection, to the State of Mississippi receiving a similar donation. We expect to be able to show, within the State of Mississippi, objects of internal improvement which will command the favorable attention of Congress; and we expect that the same liberality and principle which dictated the propriety of these liberal grants to other States will also accord the same for Mississippi. Unless, on the same showing of facts which induced these donations, a similar benefit, in like manner, and for like purposes, should be extended to Mississippi and the other States—claims which have been heretofore overlooked or pretermitted—it would savour of rank favoritism. There can be no doubt but the claims of Mississippi will be properly appreciated in this respect on a proper showing of facts. I do not know that it would be amiss that I should here mention, in connexion with this branch of the subject, that there is one work of internal improvement of great consequence, both to the State of Mississippi and the United States. The Mississippi, below the mouth of the Arkansas, makes into the Yazoo by means of a bayou, navigable at high water, and requiring but little labor and expense to make the navigation perfect at all times for flat, keel, and steamboats. This pass runs through large bodies of the public land, of the richest quality, which would be greatly increased in value by the completion of this work. Other objects of improvement of equal importance, demanding of Congress a favorable attention, may also be presented. It is hoped that so much of this bill as makes the appropriation of land to Louisiana, Missouri, and Mississippi, will not depend upon the success or failure of the project to distribute the public funds. This was originally introduced as a separate and distinct proposition, by a distinct and separate bill; it has been incorporated into this bill. It is hoped that the two propositions may be considered separately, and that the one may not be made to depend upon the other. The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has said that the seventeen per cent. on the amount of sales in the new States, which is to be severally allotted to each, will be equal to the full amount of what the resident citizens of these States will pay for public lands; and this he undertakes to prove by the progressive population of these States. Let the State of Mississippi be taken for an example, (some of the new States have increased faster,) the population of which was in 1820, 66,352 white inhabitants; in 1830, 70,448 white inhabitants; showing an increase of little more than six per cent. per annum. Of this increase, it would be fair to suppose four per cent. arose from emigration. Now, sir, it is an extreme case to put, when we say that these four emigrants, which are yearly added to each hundred inhabitants, yearly pay eighty-three per cent. on the amount of sales.

[JULY 16, 1836.]

The amendment proposed by the Committee on Public Lands proposes to reduce the price of the lands, after they have regularly been proclaimed for sale, offered, and not sold at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, to one dollar per acre. It proposes, when the land has been thus offered, and not disposed of at public sale, to put the price to actual settlers, who will inhabit and cultivate them for five years, at fifty cents per acre—each head of a family, or young man over twenty-one, or widow, being entitled to a permit to settle one quarter section, or one hundred and sixty acres. That which is worth a dollar and a quarter per acre will be sold and disposed of at public sale; that which is worth less, will be put in favor of actual settlers at fifty cents. There will be no such opportunity for speculation as has been supposed; requiring the purchaser to inhabit and cultivate the soil for five years would of itself be a sufficient guard against this. The quantity which each purchaser may enter on these lands, being one hundred and sixty acres, would prevent it. The speculator will aim at lands of greater value, and will purchase in larger quantities. What! a speculator in lands buy and live on one hundred and sixty acres five years, to make money on his purchase! The idea is preposterous. It will be the poor, or those in moderate circumstances, who alone will be benefited by it, and if it is entitled to favor in the eyes of any Senator on that subject, this provision is peculiarly, and almost exclusively, for the advantage of that class who have but little

I hope to see not only this measure of relief afforded to the poor, by which it will be within the means of all to secure a home, but also those who may have settled the lands prior to sale, secured against the cupidity of speculators, by being entitled by law to the pre-emption.

Instead of this measure of reduction lessening the revenue arising from the public lands, it will increase it, by causing all who live on these lands to become purchasers. A great quantity of land will be disposed of, which would, at present prices, remain on hand for ages. If it be viewed as a matter of pecuniary interest only, the Government would be greatly gainer by disposing of the public domain at a moderate price, rather than hold it for a great length of time for higher prices. The use of the money from this to the time when it will probably sell, would amount to more than the difference in price.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky has called upon the Senators from the new States to say whether this bill does not propose advantages over the present system. I would answer that it does; for any return of the money to the States from which it is taken would be some advantage, however small this return might be. This bill proposes a return of part of the money received from the people of the new States into the treasury of these States. The amendment would save to the "working people" of the State three-fifths of the amount they pay for land. Supposing that amount in Mississippi to be two hundred thousand dollars, (which is a little under the true amount,) they would save one hundred and twenty thousand dollars.

The bill from the Committee on Manufactures proposes to put into the State treasury seventeen per cent. on the amount of sales, and a dividend proportioned according to federal numbers. The per cent. would be thirty thousand dollars; the proper dividend of the State would be upwards of twenty-three thousand; making an amount of nearly fifty-four thousand dollars. The advantage in amount to the State does not equal the amount the amendment proposes to the purchasers or the people. It will be more politic to bestow benefits upon the latter, in my opinion, than the former. Sir, I am in favor of the "working men." So long as they continue prosperous, independent, and free, the State must be in sound condition. They are the only support and dependence of the State when her rights are to be asserted, or her honor to be vindicated, and are ever ready at the call of duty. They can at any time fill the treasury full to overflowing, and are ready to put both hands into their pockets whenever there is need. I prefer a measure which gives advantages to them, to putting money into the State treasury, perhaps to be squandered.

Sir, the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has intimated that the new States would do well to accept this proposition, lest they may not be able hereafter to obtain so favorable terms. From the symptoms already indicated, there is too little doubt but they will find, whenever they shall become willing to distribute the funds of the Government, sufficient numbers will join them, more especially when they are exclusively the paying party, and others joint receivers. Sir, the people of the new States have looked anxiously for relief in regard to the lands. They have looked to the present as the auspicious period when they might expect it. The public debt is now paid off; the same amount of revenue not being required by the positive wants of the Government, the people must be relieved from a large part of the burdensome taxation necessary heretofore for the payment of a debt contracted in carrying on a war waged for the vindication of our national honor. To discharge the debt incurred in this war, the people of the new States have contributed as largely, and as willingly, as they shed their blood freely in the field during the contest. Are they to be the only portion of the citizens whose claims are to be overlooked, whose burdens are not to be lessened? Is it from a desire to have a perpetual fund of money drawn from us to distribute? Is it from a fear of lessening the value of land in the older States, or from an apprehension that emigration will be more rapid from the older States? The distributing system, I hope, will not be adopted. The fear of lessening the value of lands in the old States, or materially affecting them in point of population, is altogether illusory. Is it possible that the citizens of Ohio, Kentucky, or Tennessee, can think that, by fixing a dense population on the Mississippi and its waters, their lands will become of less value? Where is it, sir, that they find a market for their products—a ready and cash market? By making the demand for every article they export greater, is it possible, by any correct course of reasoning, they can come to the conclusion that the lands upon which these articles are produced will be worth less? We rely upon the upper country for supplies of numerous necessary products; we buy from them horses, mules, cattle, sheep, hogs, poultry, beef, pork, flour, corn, potatoes, &c., every thing that can be imagined, even down to dogs. We pay them cash for these articles of merchandise. It is the only market the people on the upper waters of the Mississippi ever did, or ever will, have for the most of them. The President, in his message to Congress at this session, has taken a liberal and statesman-like view of this subject. He is sensible of the wants of the people of the new States, knows their worth, and appreciates the privations which they endured in the settlement of a new country. He has expressed these in language more strong, clear, and eloquent than I can. [Mr. B. here read the several parts of the President's message relating to the public lands.] The Chief Magistrate is not one of those who have taken the view suggested by a narrow and short-sighted policy; that, by holding up these lands in such manner that the greatest possible sum can be realized, will advance the true interest of the Government, but is among those actuated by more liberal and enlarged views, who are of opinion, that by advancing the settlement of the country, by fixing upon the soil an adventurous and hardy population, interested in the freehold, the country will gain more real advantage in the addition to its security, strength, and aggregate wealth. We stand upon the justice of this recommendation, not doubting but the wisdom of Congress will soon lead to the adoption of the course recommended.

It is conceded, sir, that the settlement of this question is a matter of much importance, but I do not agree that it is among questions of that sort which had better be settled even wrong than not at all; it will be better that we should leave the matter where it now is, than make it worse. Be careful, sir, that, in the great anxiety which is shown to settle the question, to take, as it is said, from the new States all ground of complaint, you do not lay the foundation for greater discontent. Among the people of the new States, there has as yet been nothing like decided discontent. They have looked forward to the present period with anxiety, yet with the assured hope that the burdens of taxation would be lightened both as to the customary revenue, and that which they pay in the purchase of land. If they should be disappointed in these reasonable expectations, there is no telling how long they may remain so. Although anxious for the settlement of this great national question on just and equitable principles, yet I, for one, object to the present measure, as not calculated to relieve us from embarrassment, but to lead us into other and new difficulties.

Mr. B. having concluded,

Mr. MOORE moved an adjournment.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. POINDESTER made a few remarks in opposition to this motion.

Mr. CLAY hoped the question on the amendment would be taken now, unless some gentleman wished to express his sentiments on the subject.

Mr. BUCKNER expressed himself in favor of the amendments of Mr. POINDESTER, which had been ordered to be printed. He desired that they might have the consideration of the Senate, and hoped the pending question would not be taken before. He was also against haste in this important business, and reiterated Mr. FORSYTH's motion to lay on the table.

Mr. CLAY called for the yeas and nays. He felt unwilling that the subject should thus be postponed from day to day. By voting now on the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands, the amendments of Mr. POINDESTER would not be excluded. His utmost wish to-day was to dispose of the former amendment.

Mr. POINDESTER said, the amendment of the committee proposed to destroy the bill, for a substitute, which he, on examination, had found to be very imperfect. His (Mr. P's) object was to preserve the salutary portions of the bill, and to make such additions and improvements as would render it more beneficial. He had no disposition to delay the question on the amendment, because its decision would not at all interfere with the objects which he had in view.

After a few more remarks from several other Senators, the motion was withdrawn, and the Senate adjourned, after a short time spent in executive business.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 17.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate resumed the bill to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands.

Mr. GRUNDY said, upon this subject it is manifest that there are two opinions rising up in different quarters of the country, directly in opposition to each other, and both of them, in my humble judgment, founded in error. One portion of our politicians think that the new States, in which the lands are situated, have a claim, to the exclusion of all other portions of the country, upon that principle of national law which confers on the sovereignty of a State a right to all the soil within its limits. Against this opinion I have heretofore, and now contend, let it come from what authority it may. Another set of politicians say, and the bill on your table is predicated on that idea, that the States, as such, have some other and different kind of claim to these lands, or their proceeds, than they have to the money in the treasury of the United States, arising from other sources of the public revenue.

I differ from those who entertain this opinion likewise. My proposition is, and I shall endeavor to maintain it, that the lands belong to neither the new nor the old States, nor to both of them combined, but to the Federal Government; and that their proceeds cannot be applied to other objects than those to which the United States can constitutionally appropriate money. In order that I may be able to establish my proposition, I ask the attention of the Senate to the mode in which the titles were acquired, and I call upon the advocates of the title of the new States to show upon what they found their claim. Did the new States purchase these lands from the original proprietors or owners? Have they made any contract or agreement which would authorize them to put up this claim? Nothing of the kind is pretended. Their sole reliance is upon the principle that sovereignty conveys the title. This principle, it is admitted, exists, and is unquestionable between nations or States, foreign to each other, and between whom there are no stipulations or compacts to the contrary; but it is wholly inapplicable as between the General Government and the new States. To adopt it would be in direct violation of the agreements and compacts entered into by each of them in the most solemn manner. When about to become members of this Union, they disclaimed all right and pretence of title to the Federal Government within their respective limits; it is their own declaration; it is engrafted in the constitution of every State; the very charter which gave them their existence acknowledges that they have no right or claim to these lands. There is no State in which it was supposed the General Government owned land, which has not, in its constitution, relinquished that right which sovereignty confers, except the State of Tennessee. She was admitted into the Union without any such stipulation or condition, and therefore stands in a different situation, in relation to this subject, from the other States, in which there may be vacant and unappropriated lands. When the new States, some years since, came forward and put up their claim to these lands, I took the liberty of saying that it appeared to me to be a violation of good faith and the sacredness of a solemn agreement, and gave the reasons at length in support of the opinion I then expressed, and I will not detain the Senate by a repetition of them; but, with this short view of the subject, shall take it for granted that the new States have no right to these lands, more than the other States in the Union. At the same time, I wish it to be understood, that I do not object to the appropriations which have been, or hereafter may be, made to the new States, of portions of the land within their limits, for internal improvements; this, however, is not because they have a better claim than any other portion of the country; these appropriations are made upon the ground that it is sound policy to improve the country, and thereby add value to the residuum of the public lands. Hence, a right as well as a duty is created on the part of the General Government to enhance the value of the public domain.

Public Lands.

The next inquiry is, what right have the States, as such, to put up a claim to these lands? To ascertain this, we must look to the derivation of the title, and see to whom it has been made. During the revolutionary war, it was urged by several of the States, in strong and impressive language, that it was unjust that the wild and uninhabited tracts of land contained in the charter of Virginia, and other States similarly situated, should be conquered and secured by the joint arms of all the States, and then not be disposed of for the benefit of all; they, therefore, remonstrated with the old Congress against this injustice, as they considered it. Congress acknowledged the justice of their demands, and applied to the several States within whose limits the lands were situated to relinquish their title in support of the common cause in which all the States were engaged. The States yielded to this application, and Virginia surrendered all her territory west of the river Ohio, including the present States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan Territory; the other States followed her example; but for what purpose did they make these grants? Was it that the proceeds should be given away, either to States or individuals, or scattered to the winds? Such an idea never entered the minds of men at that period. What was the great and important object which operated upon a portion of the States in demanding, and on the others in surrendering, these lands to the disposition of the old Congress? It was known that we were engaged in an expensive war, and were deeply involved in debt. The issue of the controversy was doubtful, but if we succeeded, one thing was certain, that we had a large accumulation of debt existing against the old Congress, which it would be difficult to discharge, notwithstanding the termination of the war might be. In order, then, to promote the public credit, and to provide a common fund to meet the various engagements which the prosecution of the war necessarily created, almost all the States which had vacant and unappropriated lands came forward. And what is the declared intention of each of the States making the surrender? I have examined all the acts of session; the same language is used; they all say for the common charge and expenditure, for the common benefit, we surrender the lands; and to whom did they surrender them? To the Congress of the United States, to be applied for the common benefit, for and in discharge of the debt incurred by the war of the revolution. It is true, the debt of the revolution, as it is usually denominated and considered, is discharged; there is still, however, a heavy incumbrance upon the public lands, which cannot be discharged for many years—I refer to the pensions allowed by law to the officers and soldiers of the revolution. These constitute a charge upon this fund, and form a part of the common expenditure for which these lands were pledged; and, until fully paid, the lands cannot be released and applied to other purposes. It is supposed that not less than three millions a year will be necessary to meet this demand. The sales of the public lands will probably not amount to that sum; we know the nett proceeds will not. At present, this fund is answering the purpose of its original destination, and it ought not to be diverted from it.

But let us see by what means the debt proper has been paid. The proceeds of the public lands have discharged a very small portion of it; all the other sources of revenue have been resorted to, and the moneys arising from them applied to the extinguishment of this debt. When the money thus expended from other sources to this object shall be replaced in the public treasury from the sale of the public lands, surely it should not be used or employed in any other way, or for any other purposes, than those to which moneys arising from any other sources could be legitimately appropriated. To make my ideas upon this subject still plainer: we have taken money arising from the duties upon imports to pay the public debt, instead of using the land for that purpose; now, when we sell the lands, and receive the proceeds of the sales, the money should be substituted in the place of that which was received from imports. The treasury of the United States has furnished all the means by which the lands acquired from Georgia, by her cession, have been paid for. Louisiana was obtained from the Emperor of France by the Federal Government, and paid for by its own money. The Floridas were purchased from Spain, and paid for in the same manner. To none of these lands can I discover the least color of claim on the part of the States.

It is not argued by the friends of this bill that Congress can give away the public money, or distribute it to individuals or States ad libitum. Unless, therefore, its advocates can succeed in showing that Congress has more power over this source of revenue arising from the public lands than it possesses over other public moneys, this bill must fail. This brings me to the provisions of the bill under consideration; and I will endeavor to show to the Senate that this bill is calculated to put down the policy of this Government as now administered; that it is doing that indirectly which we cannot do directly, and we know it to be so. We are to give this money to the States; and for what purpose? To make internal improvements. And can we make such internal improvements as the States will make if you give them this money? There is a difference among politicians as to the powers of the General Government upon this subject. Great national objects of internal improvement, it is conceded by both parties, may be carried into effect by this Government; but local objects are not conceded; and, as this Government is now officered, we know that no bill for such improvements can become a law. Whatever Congress might be disposed to do in such cases, the Executive sanction cannot be obtained. But grant the States the money to make any improvements they please, however local and unimportant, and you evade the settled policy of the present administration, which you cannot overcome by direct action. In short, by giving the money to the States, and making them your agents, you expend it upon objects which the most zealous friends of internal improvements by the General Government would never dream of. Is this not doing, as I have said, that indirectly which you cannot do directly? Would you not, by the instrumentality of the State Legislatures, be doing acts which you have not the constitutional power to perform yourselves? The second object to which the money is to be applied by this bill, is education. I admit the full value of this object; but has it entered into the mind of any public man, that Congress could establish a system of education in the different States? Such a proposition has never been made, and, if made at any future period, it surely can meet with no favor in this body; and I ask Senators to reflect and consider whether there be any substantial difference, in point of constitutional power, between this Government's doing it itself, and giving the money to the States, and directing them to do it?

As to the third provision in the bill, which is to expend the money in transporting the free people of color to Liberia, on the coast of Africa, I consider it perfectly visionary; and this provision in the bill would be harmless, were it not for the infraction of the constitution involved in it, because I do not believe that the State Legislatures would so apply the money; they would expend it on objects in their own States. From what part of the constitution is the power thus to expend money derived? How can it be contended that this Government can furnish money to better the condition of the free man of color, when it is admitted that you cannot give money to a poor man to better his situation—no, not even to remove him from one part of the United States to another?

I will now proceed to another branch of this subject. If I were in favor of this measure; if I believed it authorized by the constitution; if I believed it wise and politic, I would not at this time give my assent to it. It is, and it cannot be concealed, a tariff measure. It is to keep up the duties on imports; and here I wish to be distinctly understood, I have contributed nothing by any vote or act of mine to produce the present state of excitement which exists in the country. I will do nothing to increase or aggravate it. I will yield nothing to intimidation, or to that hostile array which is displaying itself in the South. I will neither go faster nor slower. I will neither be accelerated nor retarded in my movements by any occurrence of that kind; but there are considerations to which I am prepared to yield much. To that deep sense of injustice, long continued, which is felt by the whole South, and by a great portion of the West, I would yield much. To the apprehension that oppression, long persisted in, which is heavy, and cannot be always borne, might weaken, and in time alienate, the affections of any great portion of the community from this Government, I am ready to yield any thing which will not produce injustice to others. However, whether the tariff be reduced or not, I am in favor of executing the laws and preserving the Union; and so far as my voice will go, the Executive shall be furnished with all the means necessary to accomplish these objects. Under this view of the subject, let us examine the effect to be produced by the passage of this bill, and ascertain whether, instead of alleviating the public burdens, and removing the grievances now felt and complained of, we are not giving a certain assurance that they never shall be removed. The public sentiment seems now settled, and we scarcely hear a voice to the contrary, from any quarter, that the public revenue must be brought down to the wants of the Government; if you, however, give away annually nearly three millions of your money, arising from the sale of the public lands, you thereby create the necessity of keeping up a tariff to that amount, higher than would be necessary if the proceeds of the public lands were placed in the treasury, to defray the expenditures of the Government; therefore, instead of reducing the public burdens, instead of doing away the just causes of complaint which exist in the country, you are fastening them upon the community. Make, if you please, the most liberal allowance for the support of the Government of the United States—a tariff, producing twelve millions, added to the three millions arising from the sales of the public lands, will support the Government; but give these three millions away, and you create the necessity of adding three millions to the tariff; this, therefore, is a tariff measure. It is to create a demand or necessity for more money; and when this necessity is created, I should myself feel bound, if it depended on my single vote, to fix the rate of duties high enough to produce the requisite amount. I have been compelled to give my opinion in reference to the tariff, because it is connected with the subject-matter of this bill. There is another reason why I object to this measure: it will operate deceptively; it looks like a gift upon its face to the States, but at the same time the people of the States are taxed to make up the amount; it looks as if the States were getting something from the General Government; but when it is recollected that a tax is imposed to supply the deficiency in the treasury, occasioned by this measure, the deception is at once discovered, and the delusion vanishes.

The politicians of the United States have been speaking and writing about State rights and State independence from the very foundation of this Government; and, according to my humble judgment, nothing that could be invented by Congress would operate so fatally against these doctrines as this measure. If the States are to receive annually from this Government large sums of money which may be withheld at pleasure, can you expect that manly spirit and strong language of remonstrance from State Legislatures which we have sometimes witnessed? It is with communities as with individuals, that a man loses his independence who is in the habit of living upon the bounty of another. He knows that to incur the displeasure of his benefactor may produce a withdrawal of that bounty which he has enjoyed; and the fear of this lessens his independence; he loses his own will, and adopts that of another as the rule of his conduct. The true mode upon which to administer this Government is, to keep the operations of the Federal and State Governments distinct and separate. In this way, that conflict which produces discord is avoided. The State Governments possess certain means of raising revenue to enable them to perform their respective functions; and the State Governments should never depend upon the General Government for the means of acting upon the subjects confided to them. So long as each Government depends upon its own means, it is independent, and no longer. We already see the effects produced in some of the States by this anticipated reliance upon the national treasury. Pennsylvania and Ohio have contracted large debts for internal improvements, and they are now pressing this measure with a view to obtain money to meet the annual interest falling due upon their State treasuries. Is there not danger that you will place all the States in a similar condition, if you encourage them to undertake expensive internal improvements beyond their own means of payment?

Further, I am opposed to this bill, because it will retard the improvement and settlement of the Western country. In what I say upon this subject, I know I feel, and shall speak, as a Western man. There is a greater portion of my affections, of my regards, than can exist elsewhere. If you say that the price of the public lands, (which is evidently the design of this bill,) even of poor quality, shall never be reduced, but at all times remain at the sum now fixed by the laws of the United States, for the purpose of distribution among the several States, you thereby prevent a dense population, and the cultivation of soil of inferior quality. It cannot be expected, under this new system, that any favors or indulgence will ever be extended to the settlers in the new States; a feeling in opposition to a liberal spirit towards the inhabitants of new States will be engendered in the different States; and avarice, the most unfeeling passion that inhabits the human breast, will forbid the distribution of favors amongst those who most need them. I readily admit that the shifting of population from one section of country to another does not increase the population; but I by no means admit that it may not increase the national strength and prosperity. The Government owes it to its citizens, as a duty, to furnish all the means in its power to render them collectively and individually happy and independent. When you put it in the power of every man, however poor and humble he may be, to acquire a freehold of forty, eighty, or one hundred and sixty acres of land, the Government has done its duty; and if idle and dissipated men will not take care of themselves and household, will not embrace and enjoy the bounty of their country, the Government is not responsible for their failure.

At the last session I was told that my argument upon this subject was not sound, because those who worked in the manufactories were as good citizens as those who cultivated the soil: that may be so. My principle, however, is this: make your citizens independent—and no man is so independent as he who gets his own livelihood upon his own soil, and is not dependent upon the will of others. A man thus situated is dependent upon Providence and his own exertions alone; he is not subject to the whim and caprice of others by whom he may be employed: his livelihood cannot be endangered by the failure of capitalists, which is the case with all those employed in manufacturing establishments. I therefore prefer that this Government should provide by its laws that every man of industry may acquire, at a cheap rate, a portion of the public domain. With respect to the policy which I advocate—taking off a portion of the population of the old States—I can fully appreciate it. Tennessee will be deprived of many of its most valuable citizens; with me, however, this forms no objection; I will never legislate to keep men where they are, that others may be benefited by their labor. Should any of my fellow-citizens consult me upon the subject of their removal, my language to them would be, "We should be glad if you could find it to your interest to remain amongst us, because we are unwilling to part with you; but if you can make yourself more happy and independent, if you can better provide for yourselves and families by going to a new country, go, and prosperity attend you." This is the way I feel, and this is the way I incline to act towards the citizens of my own State: and why should we feel any prejudice against this policy? The now waste lands are to be the homes of our children, and children's children; let us then adopt a liberal policy for their improvement. It should also be recollected that we have a very extensive exposed frontier in the West; we have gathered all the Indian tribes together; we have concentrated that which makes a formidable force, which may, at some future period, be employed against the United States. How can we provide against attacks from that quarter in any way so effectually as by having a dense population in the immediate neighborhood? By this means you will also lessen the expenditures of the Government, and give security to those who are now most exposed to danger. Another consideration of great weight upon this subject is, that New Orleans, the great commercial city of the West, will always be the point of attack aimed at by a powerful foreign enemy with whom we may be at war. The best security you can afford it will be found in thickly lining the banks of the Mississippi, and filling up the adjacent country with freemen interested in the soil. An opportunity to do this is now presented by the recent acquisition of territory from the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians. It has been said that these preference or occupant rights have not proved beneficial to the early adventurers of the Western country. Gentlemen who make this statement possess less knowledge than I do, or a different language would be used by them. The State of Virginia gave to each of the early settlers of the now State of Kentucky four hundred acres of a settlement right, and a pre-emption of a thousand acres adjoining, at a price merely nominal. The State of North Carolina, actuated by a similar liberal spirit, gave a pre-emption of six hundred and forty acres to each of the early settlers in what is now West Tennessee; and although it is true that but few of these men remain at the present day, having been slain by the hostile savages, or having died by reason of great exposure and hardships, and from other causes, yet I will venture to say that the descendants of no class of men in that vast region of country are more respected, or have more distinguished themselves in the learned professions, or have been greater ornaments to the benches of justice, or have acquired more fame in legislative halls. In regard to what is called the Green River country, in the State of Kentucky, it was settled upon the principle of occupancy; and there is no portion of that State, considering the quality of the soil, which contains a better or more substantial population. As to Tennessee, this has been her uniform policy; and by its wisdom we have changed tenants and day-laborers into independent freeholders. I am inclined favorably to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Public Lands, and will vote that each settler upon the public domain shall be entitled to a preference right at fifty cents per acre, upon condition that he reside on it for five years in succession: this latter provision will prevent all fraud and speculation, and secure to him who needs it a home at a cheap rate.

Upon a full view of the whole subject, my reflections result in this: that the new States have no exclusive claim to these lands, and that the States, as such, taken altogether, have no other claim to them or their proceeds than they have to moneys arising from other sources of revenue; and, of course, Congress has no power to give it to the States, or to apply it to any other objects or purposes than those conferred on Congress by the constitution. By giving this destination to this fund, we fulfil the design and expectation of the original donors, as well as the intention of the old Congress, to whom the donations were made. By the constitution of the United States, the title to these lands is transferred to the new Government, on which, by that instrument, the burden is placed of paying the national debt; of carrying on our foreign intercourse with all nations; of raising and supporting the army and navy; of sustaining the Executive, Judicial, and Legislative branches of this Government. These are legitimate subjects of public expenditure, and to these should this fund be applied; they are for the common benefit of all, and therefore within the meaning of the deeds of cession. Upon the subject of graduating the price, I think the Government should adopt the same rule which any prudent man, who owned a large quantity of land, and was anxious to sell it, would pursue; that would certainly be to lower the price, whenever all the lands of first quality were sold, and he could not find purchasers who would buy lands of inferior quality at the price originally fixed, after the public lands have remained in market at the minimum price for ten or fifteen years. Surely it would be sound policy to offer them at a lower rate; this would not only be beneficial to the General Government, but the advantage to the new States would be incalculable, as thereby the whole lands within their respective limits would become subject to State taxation. I, therefore, am willing at this time to vote for giving settlement rights—to occupants at fifty cents per acre, and to graduate the price according to the different qualities of land, and to reject at once the proposition contained in the original bill. Still, my impression is that this is not the proper time to act finally upon the subject. At the next session of Congress the new States will have a full representation in the other House. They are more particularly interested in this subject than the other States. I am willing they should have the benefit of their additional numbers. It has been urged that this subject has been before Congress at the last session; that it was then amply discussed; that the different able reports of the Committee on Manufactures and the Committee on Public Lands have been published and submitted to the people for their consideration. This is all true; but has the subject been considered? Has it been decided by the people? I think not. It was lost sight of in the all-absorbing topic of the Presidential election. That, like Aaron's rod, swallowed up every other consideration. I am, therefore, prepared to vote for an indefinite postponement of this bill, whenever that motion shall be made.

Mr. POINDEXTER then, with a view to perfect the original bill before the question was taken on the amendment, proposed to add several additional sections, providing for a gradual reduction of the price of the public lands remaining unsold for a specified period after being brought into market; granting pre-emptions under certain circumstances; providing for continuing the surveys and guarantying to the new States that the present minimum price of the public lands shall not be increased during the existence of the proposed law.

Mr. CLAY opposed this amendment, with the exception of the latter clause.

After a few observations by Messrs. BLACK, POINDEXTER, BUCKNER, and KING, the Senate, without taking the question, adjourned.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 18.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

On motion of Mr. BUCKNER, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill providing for the continuation of the Cumberland Road, from Vandalia, in Illinois, to Jefferson City, in Missouri.

The question being on the amendment offered by Mr. BAXTON, to insert the words, "and thence to the Western frontier of Missouri, in the direction of the military post, near the mouth of the Kansas river"—

Mr. SMITH suggested the propriety of authorizing the continuation of the road from Vandalia to "some point" in Missouri. He had no objection to the contemplated military road, but he thought that the provision which required that the road should be continued to Jefferson City might endanger the passage of the bill.

Mr. BENTON rose to advocate the amendment which he had proposed when the bill was last under consideration. The bill proposed to extend the road to the seat of Government in Missouri; the amendment which he had offered proposed to continue it to the Western frontier of the State of Missouri, in the direction to Fort Leavenworth, and to the intersection of the route for the caravans from Missouri to Santa Fé. He exhibited a map which he had obtained from the War Office, showing the position of the military post, Fort Leavenworth, on the left bank of the Missouri river, a few miles above the mouth of the Kansas, and proximate to the State line, and the course and bearing of the Santa Fé road, as marked out under the authority of the Federal Government. He showed, also, the course of the proposed road by the seat of Government in Missouri, and considered the part which the amendment proposed as a link in the chain of the great road from Washington City to Santa Fé, the two ends of which had been either made or marked out by the Federal Government, and only the link in Missouri remaining to be filled up to complete the longest line of road made by any Government since the time of the Roman empire. The part of the road which would extend to the Western frontier of Missouri was strictly and correctly a military way, leading to a frontier covered by Indian tribes which the Government was accumulating there, and to a fort at which a garrison of regular soldiers and a company of United States' rangers were now stationed. It was the principal fort on that frontier, and intended for a permanent position. A road to such a frontier, and to such a post, was a military road in fact as well as in name, and was better entitled to the care of the Federal Government than the military road in Maine to the Hill of Mars, imposing as that road might seem, from leading to an eminence which imported to be the residence of the ancient god of war. The Indians at this day, on the frontiers of Missouri, were once more formidable to the people of that State than Mars could be to the people of Maine; and the Mars Hill road had been deemed worthy of repeated appropriations of public money. In 1828, the sum of $15,000 was voted to make it; in 1829, the sum of $42,932 was voted for completing it; in 1830, the sum of $47,451 to complete it; in 1831, $500 more were granted to complete it; and in 1832, the sum of $21,000 was voted for repairs and improvements upon it. Mr. B. said there was another view to be taken of these two roads: that of Maine traversed no public lands belonging to the United States; that of Missouri would traverse the centre of a State containing thirty-six millions of acres of federal land, paying no tax to the State, and receiving an increased value from all the roads which the State made. It was an acknowledged principle with the Federal Government, that, as the principal landholder in the new States, it should contribute to the construction of their roads and canals; and, on this principle, about one million of acres had been granted to the State of Ohio, and nearly half a million to each of the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Alabama. Missouri was one of those which had received neither land nor money from the Federal Government for the construction of her highways, and the bill which he (Mr. B.) had brought in at the last session to make her a grant of half a million of acres was snatched out of his hand, and clapped into that universal combination bill, commonly called the land bill, which was to pay its way through the two Houses of Congress by dealing out land and money to the right and left, till an interest was created strong enough to carry it through. Mr. B. hoped it never would get through, although his own bill was now in it, and trusted that his bill would be allowed to come out from the company into which it had been pressed, and take its fate in a separate vote upon its own merits, as all the bills for granting lands to the other States had done. Mr. B. said that Missouri had received nothing in money for the construction of roads or canals. She had been equally unfortunate in her applications to Congress for grants of money or land. About a million of dollars were annually voted for objects of internal improvement; no part of it went to Missouri; very little to any part of the South or West. The Northeast was the grand absorbent of the whole; and the system of internal improvement, invented for the benefit of the West, and proclaimed to be the true means of getting a portion of the public money disbursed in the West to counterbalance the enormous expenditure on the sea-board for light-houses, navy yards, ships, and fortifications, had turned out to be nothing but an illusion to the West, and a new and enormous drain of money to the Northeast. Another bill is now presented in favor of Missouri; the reasons for it are numerous, cogent, and unanswerable; and it rested with the friends of internal improvement to say whether it should be passed. This bill proposed the extension of the road to the seat of Government in Missouri; the amendment which he offered proposed to continue it to the frontier of the State, covered with insidious savages, to a military post which needed a communication with the centre of the State, and to the intersection of the Santa Fé road, annually travelled by the caravans of Missouri. The fate of this application would depend upon those who were the advocates of internal improvement. Many members denied the power of Congress to make these improvements; of course their votes could not be looked for; to those who admitted the power, and advocated the system, and voted a million annually for improvements in other quarters, the fate of this application must be committed.

Mr. CHAMBERS thought the views of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] conflicted with those advanced yesterday by Mr. GROUND. The argument of the latter gentleman was more in unison with what was considered orthodox in a certain quarter, than that of the gentleman from Missouri, on the subject of the nationality, &c. of a particular class of internal improvements. He regretted that the gentleman from Tennessee was not in his seat, as he might feel bound to vindicate his views on this subject. There was a measure pending before the Senate, however, (the land bill,) which, if adopted, would relieve gentlemen from the necessity of making nice distinctions on the subject of the nationality of this or that improvement. Until that measure was disposed of, he considered it unnecessary to act on the bill now before the Senate, and he therefore moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. SMITH would vote to lay the bill on the table for a different reason; he wished further time to examine the subject, particularly the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.]

Mr. BUCKNER requested that the motion to lay the bill on the table should be withdrawn for a moment; which being done—

Mr. BUCKNER expressed a hope that the bill would not be further postponed. It had been some time before the Senate, and contained a plain proposition, involving a new principle. He could see no reason why this bill should be made to give place to the land bill, or any other favorite measure. There seemed to have been a species of discipline and training connected with this land bill, which was respectable, and at war with a free and fair course of legislation. Every important measure which came up was drawn within the vortex of the land bill, which appeared to have been gotten up principally with a view to rivet upon the country the present tariff. He warned gentlemen that this course might be attended with a different effect from that which was intended. He had himself been an advocate of the tariff; but when an effort was made to sustain it by an unjust, and sordid, and corrupt course of legislation, he warned gentlemen to beware of the consequences. Was it desired that the present bill should be postponed, in order that gentlemen might reserve themselves for the vote which its friends might think proper to give on the land bill? This was certainly an unjust course of proceeding. If the bill now before the Senate should fail, he wished it remembered that it had perished by the hands of those who had given birth to the principles upon which it was founded. Shall those who first stood forth the advocates of internal improvements be the first to destroy their own offspring? This was unnatural. He preferred that every measure should be tested by its own merits, unconnected with any other subject. A different course of legislation was unwise and dangerous, if not dishonest.

He had no objection that the bill should lie on the table, to allow any gentleman an opportunity for examination; but protested against postponing it, for the reasons which had been assigned by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. CHAMBERS.]

The bill was then laid on the table.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate then proceeded to the special order of the day, being the bill to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, &c.

The question pending being on the motion of Mr. POINDEXTER to amend the original bill—

Mr. MOORE moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Monday, on account principally of the indisposition, and consequent absence, of a member who was desirous to record his vote against the original bill.

Mr. CLAY suggested that there was also a Senator on the other side absent; but that he would rather hazard the loss of the bill than postpone it any longer. He asked for the yeas and nays on the question of postponement, and they were ordered.

Mr. POINDEXTER stated that he had not been as yet enabled to obtain all the information which he had expected to acquire from documents to which he desired to refer. It was a subject of great national importance, and he thought it improper to hasten a decision. In addition to these considerations, he much wished to give his views of it, but was at this moment laboring under a violent attack of cold. He hoped, therefore, that the subject would be postponed till Monday, as it was known that the other House would not go into an examination of this matter until the tariff question should be disposed of.

The question was then taken on the motion to postpone, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Black, Brown, Buckner, Calhoun, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Poindexter, Rives, Robinson, Smith, Tip-ton, Tyler, White, Wright.—22.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Naudain, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Sprague, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Webster.—22.

So the motion to postpone was lost, (the Senate being equally divided upon it.)

Mr. KING then addressed the Senate, at length, in opposition to the original bill, and in support of the amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERS spoke in reply.

Mr. BUCKNER moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject until Monday, in order to have an opportunity to move that, when the Senate adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday.

Mr. CLAY asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. POINDEXTER said a few words in favor of adjournment.

Mr. WEBSTER objected to any other adjournment than from day to day, in the present state of the public business. At the same time, he felt a strong disposition to give every indulgence to the gentleman from Mississippi. He then moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and

SATURDAY, JANUARY 19.

EVIDENCE OF CLAIMS.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, the previous orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of State to deliver to the commissioners under the French treaty the evidences of any claims delivered to and rejected by the commissioners under the Spanish treaty.

The resolution having been read a second time, it was taken up as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH then stated that the Committee on Finance had, in reporting this resolution, departed a little from the regular rule. The committee had been instructed to inquire into the expediency of employing clerks to make copies of these documents. They had made inquiry of the Secretary of State as to the cost of making these copies, and are told that it would amount to $10,600. Other inquiries which were made resulted in a conviction that the mode suggested by the resolution would be the most convenient and the most prompt, and one which the Secretary had stated as giving him sufficient authority to deliver over the originals.

Mr. FORSYTH said that the committee seemed to have forgotten the instructions which had been given to them. They were required to make an appropriation for the necessary clerks. It was true that there would be a considerable saving of expense if the originals were handed over to the commissioners; but the question was whether this could be done consistently with the treaty with Spain? If it could, the Secretary had the power of handing over the papers; if he had it not, the Senate could not give it to him. He should, therefore, vote against the resolution.

Mr. SPRAGUE said he had always been of the opinion that the construction of the treaty which required these papers to be kept in any particular building was a very limited one. He did not understand that they were papers over which Spain could have any control. They are the documents relating to claims which had been disallowed. Spain could hardly expect that we should retain documents of this character forever. She could have nothing more to do with them. If the narrow construction to which he referred was to be adhered to, why could not the commissioners sit in rooms in the Department of State? He presumed that there could be no difficulty in this. But believing that there could be no necessity for this, he should vote for the resolution.

Mr. KANE thought the only question was, whether it is necessary that these documents should be where they would be submitted to the personal inspection of the commissioners? If so, and if copies would not answer, and the Secretary could not let the originals go from his custody without this resolution was passed, it ought to pass.

Mr. SMITH and Mr. FORSYTH reiterated what they had before stated.

Mr. SILSBEE expressed his inability to discover how it was possible that the treaty of Florida could have any more effect on these papers than on any of the claims put in for indemnity against spoliation committed by the French previous to 1800. The documents referred to captures condemned in French ports, and the claims founded on them had been rejected. Now, to establish these claims against France, it was necessary to produce these documents. The Secretary does not feel himself at liberty to give them up. This was very hard on the claimants, and in some way or other they ought to be relieved. He should therefore vote for the resolution.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, the resolution was amended by adding the words:

"Which evidences shall be returned to the Department of State when the commission shall expire."

The resolution was then reported as amended, and the amendment having been concurred in, the resolution was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, the question being on Mr. POINDEXTER's amendment.

After the failure of a motion to postpone the bill to Monday—

Mr. POINDEXTER rose and said: Mr. President, I should not have risen to partake of the debate on the interesting question brought before the Senate by the bill on your table, especially after the very able view which has been taken of it by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, who introduced the bill at the last and the present session of Congress, but for the deep interest which my immediate constituents have in the final disposition which may be made of the lands of the United States, in common with all the new States of the confederacy, and the high obligation which devolves on me, as a Senator from one of these new States, to vindicate their interests and advance their prosperity, on all proper occasions, not inconsistent with justice to the other members of the Union.

I am admonished by the state of my health, as well as by the anxiety which has been manifested by the Senate, to bring this discussion to a close, of the propriety, and I may add the necessity, of confining my remarks within the narrowest limits which the importance of the subject will permit. The President, in his annual message, brings the great question of the public lands distinctly before Congress; and, besides the notice which he takes of the various propositions heretofore submitted for an equitable and proper disposal of these lands, he recommends for our consideration a specific plan, resulting from his own reflections on the subject, which I shall, in the progress of my remarks, take occasion to contrast with the provisions of the bill on the table, and endeavor to show the effects of each system on the general welfare and future tranquility of the country, in reference to this most important branch of national wealth and internal policy.

But, sir, I cannot consent, in the arrangement of this difficult and perplexing question, to stop at the mere point of distribution, however much I may approve the measure. I desire to go further, and provide at once for the poor emigrants, by securing to those who actually inhabit and cultivate a tract of land of a limited quantity, for a number of years, to be specified, the right of pre-emption, at a moderate price, to the land so inhabited and cultivated. I wish also to incorporate in any bill which may be passed a provision for an equitable graduation of the minimum price at which the public lands are now directed by law to be sold, and thereby place lands of inferior quality at a rate which may induce men in moderate circumstances to purchase and cultivate them. With these salutary modifications, the system of distribution proposed will be acceptable not only to the old but the new States of the confederacy. It will do justice to every portion of the Union, and on that foundation alone can we hope to inspire confidence and give durability to the plan which it is proposed to carry into effect, by the passage of the bill now under consideration. The origin of the title of the United States to the eminent domain seems to be generally conceded. On this point there exist but slight shades of difference in the opinions expressed by honorable Senators who have preceded me in this discussion.

The sources from which our title has sprung may be divided into the three following classes:

1st. Voluntary cessions from the States having within their chartered limits a large extent of waste and unappropriated territory.

2d. Cessions from the States, founded on purchase, for a valuable consideration.

3d. Cessions from foreign nations since the adoption of the federal constitution, founded on purchase, for a valuable consideration.

In this latter class I do not include purchases from the Indian tribes or nations, because the right of soil in the United States existed prior to these purchases, and no other title has ever been recognised in the Indian tribes but the right of occupancy, which has from time to time been extinguished by the numerous Indian treaties which are to be found in the archives of the Government.

I shall proceed to examine these various cessions, and the conditions in which they were made, in connexion with the laws which have been enacted to carry them into effect, both under the old confederation and the existing constitution.

But before I enter into this examination, I beg the indulgence of the Senate while I take a very brief notice of what I consider an erroneous opinion which several honorable Senators have expressed in relation to the title to the waste and unappropriated lands in the United States, supposed to be acquired by conquest from the crown of Great Britain. It is alleged that these lands were won by the common arms, and therefore became the common property of all the States of the confederacy. From this opinion I must be permitted, without intending to doubt the sincerity with which it has been advanced, or the high authority by which it is maintained, to enter my entire dissent.

By the war of the revolution the united arms of the colonies conquered and gained their liberties and independence on the mother country.

These were acknowledged by the British Monarch in the treaty of peace entered into on the 3d day of September, 1783, which fully recognised each separate colony as an independent sovereignty, by name, as they were respectively formed by their ancient charters.

The treaty with Great Britain did not acknowledge the independence of the United States as a nation; but the thirteen colonies were, by that instrument, declared to be thirteen separate and independent States; they were treated with as such, and as such they confederated for their mutual safety and common defence.

The treaty made no cessions of the crown lands, in right of conquest, either to the States individually, or to the confederacy; they were left precisely on the footing in which they stood prior to the revolution, and each looked to their antecedent charters, defining the boundaries assigned to them by the parent country. I, therefore, hold it to be clear and undeniable, that, as the several States united contributed both in men and money to the accomplishment of the great end of conquering their independence, each became a separate sovereignty by the terms of the treaty of peace; and, within their respective limits, each might dispose of its unappropriated domain without interruption or restraint from the other States, in the same manner, and to the same extent, that the crown of Great Britain could have exercised that power while we remained in a colonial condition.

If any doubt could have existed on this principle during the revolutionary war, it has been since entirely removed; and the right of each State to the waste lands within the chartered limits of each is recognised and conceded by the application made to the States by the old Congress, acting under the articles of confederation, for cessions of these lands, for the common benefit of the Union, and the subsequent ratification by Congress of those cessions, on the conditions therein expressed, as they were respectively made by the State Legislatures; and this opinion is still more strongly enforced by the purchase of a considerable extent of territory, now formed into two new and flourishing States, from Georgia, in the year 1802, for which the United States paid to that State the large sum of $1,250,000.

Considering, then, the several deeds of cession made by the States as the basis of our title to the lands which remain waste and unappropriated within their boundaries, I shall proceed, sir, to inquire into the origin of these deeds of cession, the great purposes for which they were made, and the limitations imposed on the Government by the grantors.

The Declaration of Independence was the voluntary act of the colonies, by which they united in the great struggle against the tyranny and oppression of the King and Parliament of Great Britain; and, in announcing to the civilised world that they were, and of right ought to be, free, sovereign, and independent States, they solemnly pledged to each other "their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor," to maintain and preserve the independence thus declared in defiance of the power of the mother country, or of any other power whatsoever, by which their liberties might be assailed or endangered. This memorable and solemn act was promulgated only a short time before the articles of confederation were agreed on, by the same patriotic body, and transmitted to the respective State Legislatures for their assent and ratification.

The war of the revolution progressed, but the means by which it might be brought to a speedy and favorable termination engaged the attention and excited the anxious solicitude of Congress and the country at large. Amidst the numerous difficulties by which this noble band of patriots were surrounded, the scanty means on which they were compelled to rely to supply the indispensable wants of the army, the absence of a sound circulating medium, and the depression of public credit, their attention was very naturally and properly turned to the wilderness of the West; and the vast uncultivated domains in these regions were looked to as a fund out of which to compensate, at a future day, the services and sacrifices of the war-worn veterans who so triumphantly fought our battles in the field, and as a permanent resource on which we might safely depend for the final extinguishment of the enormous debt incurred in achieving the glorious result by which we became a free people.

The hopes of the army, throughout the whole of the revolutionary war, and of the militia, called into service on sudden emergencies by the States, were animated and cherished by the pledges which were from time to time made, that so soon as the great object for which they so freely shed their blood was attained, destitute as they were of the ordinary subsistence and means of comfort in the tented field, and their hard earnings paid in a depreciated paper currency, the most liberal grants of land would be made to them by Congress, to which they might retire when peace should be restored to the country, and their toils ended by the acknowledgment of our independence as one among the nations of the earth.

These pledges were made in anticipation of the transfers which it was believed would be readily made for the general good, by each State, of their domains which remained unreclaimed by the hand of industry, and untrodden by the footsteps of civilized man.

Appeals were sent forth by Congress to the States for the consummation of these just and benevolent intentions towards the soldiers of the revolution, which were answered by a patriotic surrender of their title to those lands, which have since been appropriated, according to the original design of the parties, in satisfaction of military grants and the payment of the public debt. The articles of confederation for several years were suspended on the issue of this important question; and Maryland, the last State by which they were ratified, did not accede to them until the year 1781, about one year prior to the close of the war. New York took the lead in offering to cede her waste lands to be applied for the common benefit of all the States. In March, 1780, the Legislature of that patriotic State passed a resolve, part of which I beg leave to read to the Senate. The preamble contains a summary of the causes which induced the Legislature, in the name of the people of New York, to authorize their delegates in Congress, or a majority of them, to make the proposed cession to the United States, in the manner specified in the act. And, among other things, it is enacted and declared, "that the territory which may be ceded or relinquished by virtue of this act, either with respect to the jurisdiction, as well as the right or pre-emption of soil only, shall be and inure for the use and benefit of such of the United States as shall become members of the federal alliance of the said States, and

"for no other use or purpose whatsoever." Congress referred this act of the Legislature of New York, together with other papers relating to the same subject, to a special committee, who made thereon a detailed report, concluding with the following resolution:

Resolved, That copies of the several papers referred to the committee be transmitted, with a copy of the report, to the Legislatures of the several States; and that it be earnestly recommended to those States who have claims to the Western country to pass such laws, and give their delegates in Congress such powers, as may effectually remove the only obstacle to a final ratification of the articles of confederation; and that the Legislature of Maryland be earnestly requested to authorize their delegates in Congress to subscribe the said articles."

This report was considered, and adopted by the delegates from each State in Congress assembled on the 6th day of September, 1780. Subsequent to these proceedings, and during the same session of Congress, on the 10th of October, 1780, a resolution was adopted, which declares, "that the unappropriated lands which may be ceded or relinquished to the United States by any particular State, pursuant to the recommendation of Congress of the 6th day of September last, shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States."

A deed of cession from New York was executed by three of the delegates in Congress from that State, on the 1st day of March 1781, on condition that the territory ceded or relinquished shall be and inure for the use and benefit of such of the United States as shall become members of the federal alliance of the said States, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever." And further, that the lands thus ceded shall be "granted, disposed of, and appropriated in such manner only as the Congress of the United States shall order and direct."

The cession made by Virginia of her territory northwest of the river Ohio, then an uncultivated wilderness, inhabited only by the savage tribes of that region, but which has since been formed into three large and well populated States of the Union, was not finally completed and accepted by Congress until the year 1784. The conditions are similar to those contained in the cession of New York, with the exception of a reservation for bounty lands to be granted to the troops of that State, who were placed on the continental establishment. All the lands within the ceded territory, not reserved for specified purposes, were to be considered a "common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the confederation, or in federal alliance of said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their several respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever." On these conditions the cession was accepted by Congress, and thereby they became obligatory on both parties to the contract. The following cessions were made and accepted subsequent to those already noticed from New York and Virginia:

By Massachusetts, on the 19th day of April, 1785; by Connecticut, on the 14th of September, 1785, and of what is called the Western reserve, on the 30th day of May, 1800; by South Carolina, on the 9th day of August, 1787; by North Carolina, on the 25th of February, 1790. The above enumeration comprises all the voluntary cessions of territory made by the States to the United States, either prior or subsequent to the adoption of the existing constitution. The conditions annexed to each grant are of the same general character, and each stipulates that the lands ceded shall be and inure to the common benefit of all the States.

The powers of Congress under the articles of confederation did not authorize that body to make any other disposition of the ceded territory than such as accorded with the limitations expressed in the several deeds of cession. The grantees could only use the thing granted according to the conditions prescribed by the grantors. This constituted the basis of all the acts of Congress in respect to the public lands, prior to the adoption of the federal constitution. The States collectively were the joint owners of this immense real estate, but were restricted in the disposal of it to certain specified objects, from which they could not depart without a manifest violation of the contract with the parties under whom they claimed the right of soil.

Under these circumstances, the delegates of the respective States, constituting the representation of both the grantors and the grantees, all equally interested in any regulation which might be deemed expedient in reference to the future disposition which might be made of the common fund, met in the city of Philadelphia, with power to revise and amend the articles of confederation, and to enlarge and modify them, so as to form a more perfect union of the States, to establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, "promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty." This body of men, bringing with them the feelings and wishes of the State Legislatures by whom they had been appointed, took this important subject of the public lands into their serious consideration, and, with full power to act in this matter for the States which they respectively represented, thought proper to change the conditions on which these lands had been ceded to the United States, by a special provision, which vested in Congress a plenary power to dispose of them as they might deem most beneficial, and best calculated to promote the general good of the people at large.

It is admitted on all hands, that, under the articles of confederation, Congress had no power to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States for local or internal purposes, to make grants to the new States whensoever they might be introduced into the Union, or to make donations to individuals or to bodies corporate. Nor, indeed, could any power be exercised distinct from such as were contained in the deeds of cession. But it cannot be denied, on any legal or moral principle, that the parties to an instrument containing specified limitations and conditions may, at any time, by mutual consent, either enlarge or abolish altogether these limitations and conditions, and that such modifications of the pre-existing rights of the parties will be as binding and obligatory upon them as if it had constituted a part of the original contract between them. The States for whose common benefit these voluntary cessions of territory had been made on the conditions therein expressed, and who were alone interested in any and every question which might arise under them, met face to face, by their delegates in the National Convention; and with a full knowledge of the restrictions contained in the deeds of cession, and the total absence of all power in Congress to appropriate the public domain, except in the manner and for the purposes designated by the grantors, after the mature consideration which the importance of the interest involved demanded, and doubtless received, recommended to their respective States the adoption of the following provision in the new constitution, which was acceded to by all the States in the Union, and now forms a part of the fundamental law of the republic:

Art. 4, sec. 3. "The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States or any particular State."

Since the adoption of the federal constitution, North Carolina came in and made a voluntary cession of her surplus territory to the United States, on conditions which, being carried into effect, rendered the cession of no value to the Government, merely as a source of revenue. A large proportion of the ceded territory was covered by grants and warrants issued by North Carolina to the officers and soldiers of that State in the continental line, who fought in the revolutionary war. All the lands which were not covered by grants of this description have been disposed of, for purposes of benevolent donations to individual settlers, and concessions to the State of Tennessee, in which they are situated; and, as yet, no part of them has been sold or appropriated for the common benefit of all the States. In 1802, the purchase from Georgia was effected, and, in the following year, Louisiana was purchased from the Government of France, which, including the acquisition of Florida, under the treaty with Spain in 1819, comprises the entire territory claimed by the United States in right of purchase. Notwithstanding the enlargement of the powers of Congress, by the article of the constitution to which I have referred, the lands ceded to the Government have, with some unimportant exceptions, been surveyed and sold, and the nett proceeds applied, for the benefit of all the States, to the payment of the national debt, and the current expenses which might accrue in the administration of the Government. Thus the original intention of the grantees in the voluntary cessions, and the stipulations in the treaties of cession from Georgia and foreign Powers, have been carried into effect, and the money arising from the sales of the public lands has been applied to the general purposes of the treasury from the commencement of the Government up to the present time.

And now, sir, the national debt is paid; the great debt of the revolution is finally discharged; the country finds itself entirely absolved from all the obligations incurred in that arduous struggle, as well as those incurred in the late war with Great Britain, which has very properly been called the second war of independence; and the public domain remaining undisposed of is, as heretofore, the common property of all the States of the confederacy, and may be disposed of by Congress, for their benefit, in the exercise of a sound discretion, reposed in the National Legislature, "to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property of the United States."

The question then arises, under the existing circumstances of the country, free from debt, and with a treasury overflowing, beyond the most extravagant wants of the Government, what disposition ought to be made of the public lands yet remaining unsold and unappropriated?

Two propositions are under consideration.

The President of the United States, at the opening of the present session of Congress, proposes to dispense with these lands altogether, as a source of revenue for the general purposes of the Government; to bring them down to a price which will simply cover the expenses of surveying and selling them to individuals; and ultimately ceding them to the several States within the jurisdiction of which they are situated.

This recommendation of the President, although it has been highly eulogized and commended by several honorable Senators, in the progress of this debate, was entirely overlooked by the Committee on the Public Lands, who have simply reported to the Senate a very imperfect scheme for graduating the price of such lands as may have remained in market unsold for a specified number of years. We are thus driven back to the other proposition contained in the bill on our table, which was reported by the Committee on Manufactures at the last session, and received the sanction of this branch of the Legislature. Considering this measure in connexion with the views presented by the Chief Magistrate, we are called on to decide whether the interests of the country, and especially those of the new States, will be best promoted by reducing the price, making it nearly nominal, or retain the present system, and appropriate the money arising from the sales of the public lands among the several States, for the beneficent purposes enumerated in the bill. To this plan, various objections have been made, which it is my purpose to notice in the order in which they have been introduced into the debate. The honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. BAXTON] has endeavored to show, by certain estimates to which he has referred, but which I do not deem at all applicable to the subject, that after deducting the various charges of surveying and selling the public lands, and the amount of money which has been paid in acquiring them, and for the relinquishment of Indian titles, there will remain no surplus to be distributed among the States, even if a bill for that purpose should become a law. This view of the subject is altogether erroneous, and the deductions, which the Senator seems to suppose ought to be made before the distribution takes place, are in direct opposition to the uniform practice of the Government in like cases. We know that the new States are, by compact with the Government of the United States made, on their admission into the Union, entitled, for certain purposes, to five per cent. of the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands within their limits. In estimating the amount to be paid to each State, under these compacts, the rule observed at the Department of the Treasury has invariably been to reduce the actual amount of sales, by deducting the expenses incurred in surveying and selling the lands, and to calculate the five per cent. due to the State on the sum which shall appear after making these deductions.

Conforming to this practice, which could not be departed from without some special provision by law, the same rule must be observed in the distribution contemplated by the bill under consideration. Taking the amount of sales for the past year as the data on which to calculate the probable sales in future years, (and experience has shown that they will rather increase than diminish,) the amount to be divided on these principles could not fall short of three millions of dollars annually. But it is manifest, that the items included in the estimate of the Senator might, according to his own reasoning, be extended to a great variety of objects which he has not enumerated.

Besides the large sums paid to the State of Georgia, to France, under the Louisiana treaty, and to Spain, for the cession of Florida, the Senator from Missouri insists that we must deduct. 1st. Indian annuities. 2d. The sums paid for the relinquishment of Indian title of occupancy. 3d. The whole expense of Indian intercourse. 4th. The salaries of all the land officers, and their clerks, throughout the United States. 5th. The appropriation annually made for surveying the public lands, and to the General Land Office, at the seat of Government, including the salary of the Commissioner, his clerks, and all others in his employment in that department. I ask, why did the Senator not include the salary of the Secretary of the Treasury? He is by law placed at the head of the land department. Why not also include the salary of the President? He has numerous duties to perform in the disposal of the public lands, and among them the very onerous and almost impracticable duty of affixing his signature to all the patents which may be issued to purchasers. Various other charges of a similar character might be mentioned, which would properly come within the rule laid down by the honorable Senator from Missouri. But I consider the objection as mere declamation, unsupported by a proper interpretation of the existing laws; inconsistent with common sense and the plainest dictates of justice, and contrary to all the antecedent actions of the Government in estimating what are denominated the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands. The Senator from Missouri has delivered a labored argument to show that an annual appropriation of two millions of dollars will be necessary for defraying the expenses incident to the gradual acquisition of Indian titles, and other objects connected with the sales of the public lands; from which he draws the inference that no revenue has ever accrued to the United States, and none is likely to accrue, from the sales of these lands; and he has examined the provisions of several Indian treaties, to establish the position which he has assumed, that the mere purchase of the right of occupancy from the several tribes of Indians costs the Government more than the minimum price at which the public lands are directed to be sold by law. Since this novel and extraordinary idea was advanced in the debate, I have turned my attention more particularly to the various Indian treaties which have been made since the establishment of the Government, to ascertain the estimated price per acre which had been given from time to time for the extinguishment of Indian titles. I have examined the instructions from the Department of War to commissioners appointed to form Indian treaties; and I find that, in almost every instance, they were limited to one cent per acre, on the quantity of lands supposed to be ceded, and were positively instructed not to exceed that limitation, including the expense of the treaty, the round sum stipulated to be given for the ceded lands, and the annuities and other presents granted to the Indians. In the year 1807, during the administration of Mr. Jefferson, it will be seen, by the instructions from General Dearborn, then Secretary of War, to Governor Hull, authorizing him to treat with the chiefs of various Indian tribes or nations for the relinquishment of their right of occupancy, that he is explicitly instructed not to exceed two cents per acre.

Public Lands.

Among other things, the instructions contain the following sentence:

"It will be difficult to ascertain, with any tolerable degree of certainty, the quantity of acres included in any purchase you may make; but you will endeavor to calculate the price in such manner, as not, on any condition, to exceed two cents per acre; and I presume it will not be necessary to exceed one cent per acre."

I might refer to other instructions of similar import, but I content myself by stating, in general terms, that although, at subsequent periods, these limits have been transcended, a fair average of the whole of the purchases from the Indians, made up to the present time, will not exceed four cents per acre, exclusive of Indian reservations, which are never taken into the estimate.

I ask, therefore, on what foundation the Senator from Missouri rests the broad declaration which he has made, that the extinguishment of Indian title costs the Government more than the minimum price of the public lands; that these lands produce no revenue to the national treasury; and that it would be sound policy, in future, to stipulate for the sale of all such lands as may be hereafter ceded, for the sole benefit of the Indian tribes who make the cessions? He has resorted to every source of expenditure, having the most remote relation to the public lands, and thereby swelled the amount to more than two millions of dollars annually. He has relied on his own exaggerated statements, unsupported by the official records of the country, to prove that the price actually paid to the Indian tribes exceeds one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, although the contrary has been already shown by the instructions and treaties to which I have referred; and in this manner, and by this process of reasoning, he gravely draws the conclusion that the bill under consideration, if enacted into a law, will be worthless to the States, as there will not remain, according to his views, one cent to be distributed among the States after his enormous, and, I will add, ridiculous enumeration of charges shall have been paid at the public treasury.

But the Senator has given a sufficient answer to his own argument, when he denounces this bill as No. 3 in the series of measures proposed for perpetuating the system of high duties, for the protection of domestic manufactures. He deprecates the withdrawal of the net proceeds of the public lands from the treasury, because he alleges that duties on foreign importations must be imposed to supply the place of the three millions of dollars which this bill proposes to distribute among the States; and yet we are told, at the same moment, that these lands do not cover the sum required to purchase them of the Indian tribes, and the expenses incurred in bringing them into market. This is, indeed, reasoning in a circle, in the progress of which the Senator assumes false premises, and arrives at conclusions directly opposed to those premises.

I shall, however, sir, have occasion to recur again to this view of the subject, and will for the present dismiss it, and proceed to notice the objections which have been urged against the bill, both as to its principle and details.

The first objection, in the order of this discussion, which has been made to the passage of the bill, is, that the objects designated as those only to which the several States shall be permitted to apply their respective proportions of the general fund are unconstitutional, and for which Congress could not appropriate directly the money of the United States, and therefore they cannot indirectly appropriate it, by granting the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands for the purposes specified in the bill.

The first section of the bill contains a special provision in favor of the new States, within which the public lands are situated, by which they are to receive, in addition to the five per centum heretofore allowed, twelve and a half per centum upon the net amount of the sales of the public lands which shall subsequently be made within the several limits of said States.

This sum of twelve and a half per centum is to be appropriated by the States "to some objects of internal improvements, or education, within the said States, under the direction of their respective State Legislatures."

The second section of the bill provides, that, after deducting the said twelve and a half per centum, the residue of the net proceeds of the public lands shall be divided among the twenty-four States of the Union, according to their respective federal representative population, to be applied by the Legislatures of said States to objects of "education, internal improvements, colonization of free people of color, or reimbursement of any existing debt contracted for internal improvements, as the said Legislatures may severally designate and authorize." These are the purposes contemplated in the bill, to which the fund shall be applied, after it shall have been distributed among the States.

The question then arises, are these objects for which the public domain of the United States cannot be granted without a violation of the constitution?

The Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GRAYSON,] and the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BRADLEY,] have taken ground in their argument, on this subject, against the exercise of the power to dispose of the public lands for the specific purposes enumerated in the sections of the bill to which I have referred.

If the reasoning advanced by these honorable Senators be sound, they at once destroy the bill, and it will be unnecessary to enlarge the discussion on the details or expediency of the measure. But considering, as I do, their positions unsound and untenable, I must be permitted to dissent from them, and beg the indulgence of the Senate while I offer very concisely my views on the constitutional difficulty which they have urged in opposition to the bill.

Prior to the adoption of the federal constitution, as I have attempted to show in a preceding part of my argument, Congress had no power to make any other disposition of the public domain than that which was authorized by the deeds of cession which had been accepted on the conditions therein contained.

Public Lands.

During the existence of the old confederation, no grants of land were made to individuals or bodies corporate, nor in any other manner but in strict accordance with these deeds of cession.

The enlargement of the powers of Congress, under the new constitution, I have already adverted to, which in express terms confers on the National Legislature the power to dispose of the "territory and other property of the United States," without limitation or restriction, either in respect to the amount, or objects to which it should be appropriated.

I wish it to be distinctly understood, that I claim for Congress no power, by implication or construction, on this subject; I confine myself literally to the ceded powers, expressed in language which can neither be misunderstood nor perverted.

The general phraseology used in the third section of the fourth article of the constitution comprehends the power to admit new States into the Union, with the exception "that no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well of the Congress;" and also the power to dispose of the public domain, and other property of the United States, with a proviso, "that nothing in this constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State." The language conferring both powers is the same, and each has been carried into practical operation according to their literal import. "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union."

Can honorable Senators point out any rule of construction by which this power can be limited, except in the cases specified in the article of the constitution to which I have referred? Was it confined to the original limits of the United States, as they were defined at that period? Certainly not. The power has been exercised in its broadest sense, and new States have been admitted, formed of territory acquired from foreign Powers, long subsequent to the adoption of the federal constitution.

The power over the public domain is equally comprehensive, and therefore cannot be limited in its exercise either by the conditions of the former deeds of cession, or the treaties by which it has subsequently been acquired. This opinion, it will be seen, is in strict conformity with the action of Congress on this subject, from the foundation of the Government up to the present time. Will honorable Senators say that there is a limitation in this grant of power? If so, where is the limitation to be found? None such exists, either in the letter or spirit of the constitution. I am supported in these views by a contemporaneous exposition given of the section of the constitution embracing the subjects to which I have referred. In the 43d number of the Federalist, written by James Madison, one of the illustrious founders of the constitution, these powers are expounded as they were understood by the writer at the time the constitution was adopted.

Mr. Madison, in speaking of the admission of new States, says—"In the articles of confederation no provision is made on this important subject. Canada was to be admitted of right, on her joining in the measures of the United States; and the other colonies" (by which were evidently meant the other British colonies) "at the discretion of the States." The eventual establishment of new States seems to have been overlooked by the compilers of that instrument. We have seen the inconveniences of this omission, and the assumption of power into which Congress has been led by it. With great propriety, therefore, the new system supplied the defect. The general precaution that no new States shall be formed without the concurrence of the federal authority and that of the States concerned, is consonant to the principles which ought to govern such transactions. The particular precaution against the erection of new States, by the partition of a State without its consent, quiets the jealousy of the larger States; as that of the smaller is quieted by a like precaution against a junction of States without their consent.

On the remaining part of the section which I have already quoted, having relation to the disposal of the territory and other property of the United States, Mr. Madison adds, "This is a power of very great importance, and required by considerations similar to those which show the propriety of the former."

"The proviso annexed is proper in itself, and was probably rendered absolutely necessary by jealousies and questions concerning the Western territory, sufficiently known to the public."

This I consider to be the true and only legitimate interpretation of the clauses in the constitution to which they relate. Mr. Madison does not even intimate a limitation on the powers of Congress, arising out of the conditions in the deeds of cession, or compacts entered into under the confederation; and surely, if it had been the intention of the framers of the constitution to restrict the action of Congress, in conformity with these deeds of cession or compacts, it would have been of sufficient importance to have attracted his attention, and must have drawn from him, while treating of this subject, a full and explicit explanation. None such has been given, from which I draw the conclusion that we are left without any guide which can lead us to a construction of this power distinct from that which accords with the words of the constitution.

But it has been said that the constitution of the United States did not confer on Congress the power to depart in any manner from the deeds of cession under which the public domain was acquired.

And this opinion rests for its support on the proviso in the article, "that nothing in this constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State;" from which it is inferred that the delegated power meant nothing more than to vest Congress with authority to make all "needful rules and regulations" for carrying these deeds of cession into effect. All beyond this is said to be undelegated power. I confess I am at a loss to trace the singular process of reasoning, by which any one, in the full possession of a sound mind, could have arrived at a conclusion so totally inconsistent with the plainest dictates of common sense, and so contrary to all the rules by which written instruments are to be construed and expounded. The proviso has not the remotest relation to the power delegated; but, out of abundant caution, it was inserted to quiet the apprehensions and jealousies which at that time existed among the States in relation to the unsettled boundaries of their Western territory. This is the view taken of it by Mr. Madison, and assuredly it can mean nothing more.

The construction contended for would lead to the absurdity of abrogating an important power explicitly conferred on Congress, by a mere proviso inserted to guard against contingent evils, which might by possibility arise in the execution of the granted power.

The idea is too ridiculous and absurd to merit even the short notice which I have taken of it. Having, as I trust, sufficiently shown the nature and extent of the powers of Congress, in reference to the public domain, I shall proceed to answer the objections which have been made to the appropriations of the public lands, or the money accruing from the sales of such of them as may be brought into market, to the purposes enumerated in the bill. The honorable Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GARNETT] contends that we have no power to appropriate the public money to works of internal improvement, or for the support of schools, within the limits of the several States; hence he concludes that we cannot apply the public lands to these objects.

I do not deem it necessary, on the present occasion, to deny the premises of the honorable Senator, in respect to appropriations of the money in the treasury of the United States to internal improvement, or education; but I utterly deny the correctness of the conclusion which he has drawn from these premises.

The power to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, is given for the express purpose of paying the debts, and providing for the common defence, and for the general welfare of the United States. It may well be doubted whether the revenue derived from these sources can be constitutionally applied to any local purpose within the limits of a sovereign State of the confederacy. But the power which it is now proposed to exercise, in distributing among the States, who are the joint owners of all the public lands, the money accruing from the sale of these lands, is of a character wholly different from that which relates to revenue from taxation. In the one case Congress may exercise unlimited discretion over the subject, according to the views which may be taken of the public good; and in the other, the power can only be exercised under the limitations specified in the constitution.

The distribution which it is proposed to make of this fund among the States, leaves it subject to the sound discretion of their respective Legislatures; it is not to be applied, in any event, according to the will of Congress.

The stockholders, having redeemed the mortgage, which, by general consent, and by acts of legislation, operated as an implied lien upon the public lands for the speedy discharge of the national debt, now desire to make an annual division among the partners, according to an equitable ratio of the joint income to which they are entitled, for the common and separate benefit of each, reserving to themselves the control and application of their respective proportions, but concurring in the general objects to which it shall be appropriated, for the advancement of the prosperity and welfare of the country.

And, sir, I ask if there is any rule of moral action, or principle of constitutional restriction, which can be interposed to prevent an arrangement so manifestly beneficial to the parties interested in this great and increasing fund?

The construction which has been put upon the powers of Congress, in relation to the disposal of the public lands of the United States, is to be found in every page of our statute book. No limitation on these powers has ever been recognised, but they have been uniformly deemed as broad as language could make them; and in all our legislation under these powers, no questions have arisen, except in reference to the expediency of the various measures which have from time to time been proposed, and adopted, or rejected. The public lands have been granted in donations to private persons, having no other claim to them than actual settlement and cultivation, and the bounty of Congress. Large grants have been made, as a reward for meritorious public services, to colleges, seminaries of learning, and common schools; to institutions for the instruction of the deaf and dumb, to internal improvements, and a variety of other objects, a summary of which is contained in a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in answer to a resolution which I had the honor to submit to the Senate on the 20th April, 1832, which I beg leave to read to the Senate.

[Mr. P. then read the report as follows:]

Notes to preceding Table.

(1) Section No. 29, appropriated for religious purposes in the purchase made by John C. Symmes and the Ohio Company.

(2) Including lands appropriated for schools in "Clark's grant."

(3) For the benefit of the Connecticut Deaf and Dumb Asylum.

(4) For the benefit of the Kentucky Deaf and Dumb Asylum.

(5) Including salt spring reservations, which are authorized to be sold by the State, and the proceeds applied to literary purposes.

(6) Including donation of 100,000 acres to the Ohio Company.

NOTE.—No measures having been yet taken by the Government for the surveying and disposing of the public lands in the State of Tennessee, no attention has been given to the appropriation made of any part of that domain for the purposes of education, or other objects.

ELIJAH HAYWARD.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, May 9, 1832.

Mr. P. proceeded—

Thus it appears that two millions one hundred and eighty-seven thousand six hundred and sixty-five acres of the public lands have already been appropriated by Congress to works of internal improvements in the several States and Territories; and the constitutional power of Congress to make the grants has, on no occasion, been contested, until the honorable senator from Tennessee has made the point in aid of his argument against the passage of this bill. The power is fixed in the constitution; it has been carried into practical operation, for benevolent purposes, throughout the whole history of the Government; it has never been doubted by any one; and the attempt to connect it with the general power of appropriating the money in the treasury to the same objects is equally novel and untenable. This view of the subject is fully established by the summary which I have just read to the Senate; and it cannot be necessary for me to refer in detail to reports of committees and other documents, which are on file, and may be seen by any Senator who shall think proper to examine them, clearly demonstrating the principles on which all these grants have been made.

I presume it will not be denied, if the lands unsold can be applied to works of internal improvements within the States, to be disposed of under the direction of the Legislatures, that the nett proceeds of the sales of these lands, after they have been sold by the Government, may, with equal justice and propriety, be appropriated in like manner. There can be no reasonable discrimination between a grant of land and its value in the market, whether it be sold by the Government of the United States or of the States to whom the grant is made. But the Senator is alarmed at that provision of the bill which authorizes the States to apply their respective proportions of this fund to the purposes of education.

He asks if Congress can exercise the dangerous power of regulating schools in the education of youth within the sovereign States of the confederacy? I answer the Senator by a simple denial that any such power is claimed, or that the words of the bill justify the inference that a system of education is contemplated to be prescribed to the States as a corollary of the measure now under consideration. The States are left, as heretofore, free to establish their own systems of education; to provide for the instruction of the poor and indigent orphan; to diffuse the lights of science among the rising generation, by means of well regulated colleges and seminaries of learning; and to the accomplishment of these great ends, we offer them, not the money in the treasury collected on imposts, but a distributive share of the vast resources which are annually accumulating on the sales of the public lands, to be used for these important purposes, in any manner which may meet the views of the legislative body in each State. No encroachment on State sovereignty, no violation of the reserved rights of the States, or usurpation of power by Congress in this distribution, either expressed or implied, can be inferred from this act of humanity and benevolence.

The measure is recommended by every consideration of national policy, and its results cannot be otherwise than salutary in giving strength and stability to the Union, and perpetuating the blessings of our free institutions. It will be seen, by the statement transmitted from the General Land Office, that grants have already been made to the States and Territorial Governments for colleges, and academies, and universities, amounting, in the whole, to five hundred and eight thousand acres of the public lands; and for common schools the grants have amounted to nearly eight millions of acres.

Have these grants been made in violation of the constitution, or of the deeds of cession, compacts, or treaties, by which the public domain was acquired? Surely not, sir. I have endeavored to demonstrate the fallacy of this objection to the bill in a preceding part of my argument, and I now refer to an authority which I cannot doubt will satisfy the scruples of Senators who so highly appreciate the source from which it comes, and who have pronounced the eulogy of the distinguished individual whose constitutional opinion is conclusive on this subject. I have said that the public lands may be disposed of in such manner, and for such purposes, as Congress, in the exercise of a sound discretion, may think proper for the general good. I am supported in this opinion by the plain letter of the constitution, by the uniform practice of the Government, and by the Chief Magistrate of the United States, in his message to Congress of the 4th day of December, 1832.

After an elaborate view of the policy which is recommended for the final disposal of the public lands, President Jackson says:

"Among the interests which merit the consideration of Congress, after the payment of the public debt, one of the most important, in my view, is that of the public lands. Previous to the formation of our present constitution it was recommended by Congress that a portion of the waste lands owned by the States should be ceded to the United States for the purposes of general harmony, and as a fund to meet the expenses of the war.

"The recommendation was adopted, and, at different periods of time, the States of Massachusetts, New York, Virginia, North and South Carolina, and Georgia, granted their vacant soil for the uses for which they had been asked.

"As the lands may now be considered as relieved from this pledge, the object for which they were ceded having been accomplished, it is in the discretion of Congress to dispose of them in such way as best to conduce to the quiet, harmony, and general interest of the American people.

"In examining this question, all local and sectional feelings should be discarded, and the whole United States regarded as one people, interested alike in the prosperity of the common country."

This paragraph in the message of the President covers the whole ground of the unlimited powers of Congress, in relation to the public lands, for which I have contended; it is clear, ample, and explicit, and needs no comments from me to interpret its meaning. Those who claim to be the exclusive friends of the President on this floor have denied the power which he here asserts to be in the National Legislature; they go back to the conditions annexed to the ancient deeds of cession to sustain them, and yet they tell us of the "statesman-like views of the President," which they deem worthy of this enlightened age, and of the free and virtuous people over whom he presides. I hold these honorable Senators to their word, and leave them the alternative of surrendering the constitutional difficulty which they have so earnestly urged, or of retracting the eulogy which they have so eloquently pronounced on this message.

The discretion, thus admitted by the Chief Magistrate to be vested in Congress, has been asserted in another form by the opponents of the bill, when they urged the policy (and of course the power) of ceding the whole of the lands remaining unsold to the several States in which they are situated. Does such a proposition conform to the deeds of cession so often mentioned, and so much relied on to defeat the distribution among the States of the money arising from the sales of these lands? If the action of Congress is restrained by these deeds, in respect to the distribution for the common benefit of all the States, under what rule of construction do honorable gentlemen propose to bring the sweeping power which they claim to transfer the entire domain to the States within whose chartered limits they are situated?

But the President has carried out this broad principle of discretion by a plan of his own for the final adjustment of the public lands, which is commended by honorable Senators as a scheme founded in wisdom, and the most profound statesman-like policy. Permit me, sir, to read another paragraph from his message, comprising the plan which he recommends, and to offer some of my own reflections on the practical effects which might be expected if it should be the pleasure of Congress to adopt it. The President, after maturely considering this great subject, arrives at the following conclusion:

"It seems to me to be our true policy that the public lands shall cease, as soon as practicable, to be a source of revenue, and that they be sold to settlers, in limited parcels, at a price barely sufficient to reimburse the United States the expense of the present system, and the cost arising under our Indian compacts. The advantages of accurate surveys and undoubted titles, now secured to purchasers, seem to forbid the abolition of the present system, because none can be substituted which will more perfectly accomplish these important ends. It is desirable, however, that in convenient time this machinery be withdrawn from the States, and that the right of soil, and the future disposition of it, be surrendered to the States, respectively, in which it lies."

This, sir, I consider a clear recognition of the power of Congress to reduce the price of the public lands, or to transfer them to the States whose jurisdiction extends over them; and the question arises, shall we concur in the recommendation of the President, or preserve the present system, and appropriate the money to objects intimately connected with the convenience and prosperity of the country at large? The right to make grants of land to the States, without a valuable consideration, or to sell them at a nominal price to individuals, involves an authority, if Congress shall so decide, to dispose of the proceeds in any manner which may be judged expedient.

This point being established, which I humbly conceive it has been, I shall next examine the plan proposed by the President, in reference to its probable operation on the prosperity of the new States, and the benefits which it is supposed to confer on emigrants who have not the means of procuring lands at the present minimum price at which they are directed to be sold at private sale.

If we estimate the sum paid for the extinguishment of Indian title at the average which corresponds with former purchases, of four cents per acre, and add the usual expenses attending the surveys, and all other expenditures incident to the sales, the public lands might be safely brought down to twenty-five cents per acre, to meet the demands on the treasury under the existing land system.

Could such a reduction be made with sufficient guards against a combination of speculators, who might unite with a large capital to purchase all the valuable lands subject to entry at the numerous land offices? I apprehend that this would be found impracticable.

The reduction of the price of the lands of the United States, professedly for the benefit of the poor man, is calculated to raise hopes and expectations which can never be realized.

No one is more anxious than I am to encourage emigration to the new States, and grant facilities to the emigrant in making a permanent settlement with his family on the waste lands of those States, and thereby not only obtain a home, where by honest industry he may provide the means of their comfortable subsistence, but contribute to open the forests, and redeem them from their state of rude nativity to a condition fit for profitable cultivation.

But I cannot believe that the plan of the Executive will be productive of these beneficial results to the poor who may find their way into the Western wilderness.

When we speak in general terms of reducing the public lands to a price which may bring them within the reach of the poorest individual, there is something peculiarly pleasing to the ear, which challenges instant and unqualified approbation, without the reflection and investigation so necessary to correct the judgment on all questions of grave legislation. The popular voice is raised in favor of the benevolent proposition, and the error is not seen until it leads to the most deleterious consequences.

The true policy of the Government consists in fixing the price of the public lands at a rate which will enable a poor man to obtain a quarter-section for a moderate sum, in case he takes possession, and cultivates it for a certain number of years, but, at the same time, to preserve the minimum price now established by law, which will effectually prevent large bodies of land from falling into the hands of moneyed capitalists, who may form themselves into companies for that purpose, if the sales are made at a lower minimum, and thereby render such investments profitable to those who make them.

If we put the lands in market at twenty-five cents per acre, my word for it, we shall very soon hear of companies, from one extreme of the Union to the other, with their millions of dollars, and their agents dispersed over all our land districts, whose business it will be to select the choice lands, and hold them at a price at least equal to their real value, which will operate to make tenants of the poor emigrants, who will thus be excluded from the privilege now enjoyed, of going into the land offices, and becoming the owners of small tracts at a price within the means of every man who labors for the maintenance of himself and family.

The proposition has not received the slightest attention from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which the whole subject was referred by the Senate; that important part of the message of the President has been entirely overlooked; and why is it resorted to in debate, and commended as a "statesman-like" view of this great question by the opponents of the bill? Why do those Senators dwell on the beauty of the system, and tell us of the advantages which it offers to the settlers, who may remove to the new States, and yet submit no definite proposition to carry it into effect? Sir, it is manifest that the argument is used ad captandam, to mislead the people of the new States, and excite their opposition to the liberal terms of distribution contained in the bill, under the specious guise of a desire to grant the lands for a consideration merely nominal, and ultimately to cede the waste lands to the States wherein they are situated, to be disposed of for their exclusive benefit; a system which no one seriously believes will ever be sanctioned by Congress, and which no one has ventured to bring forward with the proper details for the consideration of the Senate. The question which it involves is of the highest importance, because it is evident that the system will effectually transfer the public lands from the Government to companies, and subject the emigrants to the onerous terms of the agents of those companies; thereby making them tenants at will, instead of being the independent proprietors of the soil, at a moderate price, under the existing, well regulated system of laws providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States at the respective land offices established for that purpose. Under the existing system, the surveys are made with great care and accuracy by surveyors appointed and paid by the Government; correct maps are made of the country, designating each tract of land for sale, by legal subdivisions, from an entire township down to one-eighth of a section. These maps are open to every one who may desire to purchase. All the officers necessary to carry into effect the public and private sales, and the safe keeping of the records of titles, are appointed, and their salaries from year to year paid, by the Government. No country in the world has ever devised a system for the disposal of its domain combining so many advantages, and such ample security to those who become purchasers, as that which now exists in the United States; shall we then abandon it for some new untried experiment, the effects of which no one can calculate with any degree of certainty? I think not. From every view which I have been enabled to take of the subject, after the most careful investigation of all its bearings, I cannot bring my mind to the conclusion that it would be sound policy to disturb the regulations heretofore adopted, and now in operation, for the sale and settlement of the public lands, except in the cases specified in the several amendments which I have had the honor to lay on the table, and which have been published for the use of the Senate. Of these amendments I shall speak hereafter. Under the existing laws, a poor man may become the bona fide owner of a quarter-section of valuable land, for the small consideration of one hundred dollars; and he may, if he chooses, purchase half that number of acres, which, in many of the new States, where slavery is not tolerated, would be fully adequate to all his wants, and furnish a comfortable settlement for his family. An industrious frugal man would never find it difficult to obtain the small sum necessary to make such a purchase, and thereby at once become a freeholder, and independent of all the world in the enjoyment of his own domicile. But what would be his condition if, by a sudden reduction of the minimum price to twenty-five cents per acre, we invite speculators into the market, whose investments will enable them to locate all the valuable lands, and hold them as lords proprietors, to be disposed of at their pleasure, on such terms, and at such rates, as will be productive of the largest amount of profit? No man can shut his eyes to the evil consequences of those monopolies on emigration, and the character of the increasing population of the new States. For independent freeholders we should substitute large masses of laboring tenants, who cultivate the soil, as the menials of some wealthy landlord, who fattens on the spoils of the industry and hard earnings of this valuable class of our citizens. These results must happen if we do not guard against them by law, which shall at the same time protect the poor man and keep the public lands at a price a little above the speculating point.

Public Lands.

The experiments which have been made by the States on this subject clearly demonstrate that a reduction to a low standard of the price of waste and unappropriated lands, with a view to extend benefits to the poor, by opening that class of the community to become the owners of the soil in small parcels for actual cultivation, has invariably resulted in favor of monopolies and moneyed capitalists.

This example of Virginia illustrates, in a very striking manner, the practical effects of such a system. Sir, the fact must be familiar to almost every member of the Senate, that, a short time after the close of the war of the revolution, Virginia adopted the plan of selling her domain, by issuing what were called treasury warrants, at the reduced price of two cents per acre, to be located, at the discretion of the purchaser, on any vacant land within the commonwealth. This might seem to have been low enough to give every man in the State a fair opportunity of becoming a freeholder, and of making a permanent settlement for his family.

But was that the result of the policy? No, sir; it attracted the attention of moneyed men, companies were formed, both in Europe and America; and the vast mountain region in western Virginia was explored by agents of these companies, and surveyors, who located large bodies of lands, and obtained grants or patents for the trifling sum of two cents per acre; and thus hundreds of thousands of acres of land were in many instances granted to a single individual, while the poor man, who emigrated with his family to that part of the State, was entirely excluded from a participation in the benefits of the law, and was compelled either to purchase at a high rate from the wealthy speculator, or set down as his tenant, and labor to improve the country, not as the proprietor in his own right of the soil, but as a temporary occupant, liable to be removed at the will of his wealthy landlord. These were the consequences of an attempt to favor the poor by putting the public lands of that State in market, at a price which would bring them within the means of the poorest citizens; and similar results may be confidently looked for if Congress should now legislate on the same principles, under a belief that it will encourage emigration to the new States, and promote the welfare of the laboring classes, who may remove to the rich country in the great valley of the Mississippi. Sir, we do not want humble tenants, but independent freemen, who are lords of their own habitations, to fill up the population of that fertile and growing portion of the republic.

But it is said that the existing system operates as a heavy tax on the people of these new States; that it withdraws from them millions of dollars, which are expended in other sections of the Union; and that one of the provisions of this bill authorizes its expenditure in removing free people of color to be colonized in Africa.

We are told, also, that the abstraction of the revenue arising from the sales of the public lands, from the general purposes of the treasury, will perpetuate the present high rate of duties on foreign importations, of which the Southern States so loudly, and I will add, so justly complain. Mr. President, I ask if there be any solid foundation on which these objections rest? Sir, permit me to say, and I do so with the utmost sincerity, that if those views of the policy under consideration are correct, in all or either of the enumerated cases, I should be disposed to go as far as any honorable gentleman on this floor in my opposition to this bill. But, to my mind, they are the offspring of the imagination, and cannot be supported by any solid reason whatever.

I will inquire, first, Is the purchase of a tract of land by an individual from the Government a tax on the purchaser, under any circumstances? Nothing can be more clear to me than that it is not. Sir, it is purely a matter of contract, by which a man may improve his condition in life, and for a small sum acquire property, which, when reduced to possession, will be worth three or four times the amount of money paid for it.

Can any distinction be drawn between purchasers of real estate from a body politic and corporate, or a natural person? I presume not: they are founded on the same general law of contracts; and it might with the same propriety be contended that an emigrant who bargains with a land company for a quarter-section of land, pays a tax to the Government, from which the company purchased it, as to allege that it constitutes a tax on the original purchaser. In either case, it is a voluntary contract, to which each party assents, and nothing more. But if it be a tax, it is worthy of inquiry to what extent the burden falls exclusively on the people who now reside in the new States. Let us take the case of a citizen of Massachusetts or Virginia, or any one of the old States, who removes into Mississippi. He takes with him two thousand dollars in money, or a greater or smaller sum, which he immediately vests in the purchase of a portion of the public lands; this amount of money did not previously belong to Mississippi; it is an accumulation brought into the State by the emigrant; and if it be a tax paid into the treasury, it falls on the State from which the money is withdrawn, and not on the State into which it may be carried by the owner for his own individual purposes. Sir, I utterly deny that such a transaction can be properly regarded in the nature of a tax on any one who chooses to buy the lands of the United States, for his own convenience or advantage. The next subject of inquiry is, the appropriation which each State may make of its distributive share of the public lands.

The power is denied to Congress to appropriate money to internal improvements and education, of which I have already spoken. But the most objectionable feature of the bill seems to be that which relates to the colonization of free people of color. I admit, sir, that an appropriation by Congress of the money in the treasury for this object would be a usurpation of power not to be endured. The power has not been claimed in this discussion, and is not incorporated in the bill. No appropriation is either made, or contemplated to be made, by Congress, in aid of the colonization of free people of color. We know that memorials have been presented from the slave-holding States of Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, North Carolina, and, I believe, Tennessee, praying Congress to act on this subject, and grant them the necessary means for transporting their free black population to Liberia. These memorials have been suffered silently to sleep on our files—they have not been acted on. But now, when the public debt is paid, when the public lands, pledged by the national faith to its payment, are redeemed, and remain at the disposition of Congress, for the common benefit of all the States, we propose to give to each State its proper proportion of this fund; and we answer the States who have asked assistance in accomplishing this benevolent object, so intimately connected with their safety and prosperity, by authorizing their respective Legislatures to use the funds to which they may be entitled for this purpose, if, in their discretion, they may think fit to do so. Is there any violation of the constitution in according to the States this privilege? Are honorable gentlemen afraid to trust this power to the representatives of the people of their respective States? Is my honorable colleague [Mr. BLACK] unwilling to confide this discretion to the Legislature of Mississippi? If he is, I can only say that I am not. Each State will decide for itself, without the dictation of Congress, or any department of the Federal Government, how far its interests may or may not be promoted, by giving the fund for the removal of what are denominated free negroes, or applying it to the other great purposes enumerated in the bill. I am willing, for one, sir, to repose in the States this confidence, without the slightest apprehension that it will be either abused or perverted.

The honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY,] and the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] have declaimed with much vehemence against the proposed distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States, on the ground of its tendency to corrupt the States, and extend over them the deleterious influences of this Government. Sir, it is the first time in my life that I have ever heard it seriously contended that either men or Governments were to be corrupted with their own money. It is agreed on all hands, that the public domain is the common property of all the States, to be used for their common benefit. On this ground the whole argument against this measure has been based. If, then, the States think proper to dispense with this source of revenue for national purposes, when it is no longer wanted, and to distribute it in just and equitable proportions among themselves, to be applied to the beneficent and highly valuable objects of internal improvements, the education of youth, and, if they please, to colonization of free people of color, is there any danger that they will corrupt themselves by such a use of a fund acknowledged to belong to them, as a body of political sovereignties? The idea appears to me to be both novel and absurd. The natural effect will be precisely the contrary. It will render the States more independent; it will put an end to the long disputed questions on the policy and constitutionality of internal improvements by the General Government. Our table will not hereafter be crowded with petitions and memorials for appropriations to open roads and canals from every quarter of the country. Each State will look to its own resources for accomplishing its own internal works of improvement, and will, to that extent at least, feel a corresponding independence on the action of Congress. It will bind the States together by a stronger cord of union, and diffuse among them a feeling of brotherly kindness and affection. The face of the whole country will be adorned and beautified by an inexhaustible income, which from year to year will open to the eye new roads for the accommodation of travelling, and the transportation of agricultural products to a suitable and profitable market, and new avenues to internal commerce, by means of canals, and the improvement of our numerous rivers. If, sir, these results are to be expected, as I think they may be, from the passage of the bill, the corrupting influences so much deprecated will vanish into thin air, and leave us in the enjoyment of a glorious sunshine of prosperity and union.

On the other branch of this inquiry, relating to the effects of this distribution on the existing tariff of duties, I confess my great surprise at the conflicting arguments which have been urged by honorable Senators opposed to the bill.

The President recommends to Congress to dispense altogether with the public lands as a source of revenue to the treasury! He says, and truly says, that it is not necessary or proper to bring their proceeds into the general scope of the expenses of the Government. I have already expressed my disapprobation of his plan. But honorable gentlemen have said that they deem it full of wisdom, sound policy, and patriotism, and yet they turn round, and gravely tell us that this bill ought to be rejected, because it withdraws three millions of dollars from the national treasury to be distributed among the States, and, as a necessary consequence, requires that amount to be supplied by imposts on foreign importations. Both the message and the bill are founded on the postulatum of dispensing with the lands of the United States as a source of revenue; they differ only in the mode of carrying this principle into effect; and while the one is extolled as a "statesman-like" view of the question, the other is denounced as No 3 in the measures proposed to perpetuate on the people an odious and exorbitant tariff of duties. If, sir, it may be designated as No. 1, or No. 3, in the catalogue of the honorable gentlemen who consider it connected with the question of imposts, it follows, in that respect, the policy of the Executive; and I have yet to learn on what principles they can approve the one, and condemn the other. But there is, in fact, no such connexion as the Senators imagine between the two questions; they are wholly separate and distinct, founded on considerations of policy, entirely independent, and in no manner whatever affiliated. Sir, we all know that the public lands, bring what they may from time to time into the Treasury, never have, and never will, control our policy in levying imposts and regulating foreign commerce. High duties are often imposed to retaliate the injustice of other nations with whom we have commercial relations; sometimes they are necessary to meet the ordinary expenditures of Government; but in every system of revenue which has been framed, since the adoption of the federal constitution, the protection of domestic industry and the arts has, to a greater or less extent, formed an ingredient. These important considerations, whether collectively or separately, have uniformly governed our legislation in taxing articles of consumption imported into the United States; and I defy contradiction when I say, that in no instance can it be shown that the revenue derived from the public lands has been regarded as furnishing a reason for reducing or raising the rate of duties on imports. But I find it difficult, sir, if not impracticable, to detect, by any direct researches, the incongruities and palpable contradictions, both of principle and fact, which have been interwoven into this debate by the ingenuity of honorable Senators, who feel the necessity of resorting to these conflicting arguments from the peculiar position which they occupy.

They dare not condemn the President, who tells them plainly that the public debt is, in effect, paid, and that in future the public lands ought not to be looked to as a source of revenue; and, as in duty bound, they oppose the passage of this bill, because it accords in that particular with the views of the President! At one time we are told that the distributive principle is illusory; that there will be no money to divide, after defraying the expenses of sale, and the price given to the Indian tribes for their right of occupancy; at another time we are admonished that three millions of dollars will be taken from the treasury and divided among the States, which must be replaced by a high rate of duties. We are warmly and zealously urged to bring down the public lands to a nominal price, and no longer consider them a part of our revenue system; and then we are gravely told that this precise measure which they recommend is fraught with incalculable mischiefs, and is more particularly injurious, as it will operate to fasten on the Southern States the present tariff for the protection of domestic manufactures. These are a few only of the many opposite extremes to which honorable gentlemen are driven in making out something like an argument against the measure under consideration.

The only material difference between the plan of the Executive, and that contained in the bill, consists in the question—shall we abandon our present land system, and put the lands at a price which will simply restore to the Government the cost of surveying and selling them, which I have estimated at twenty-five cents per acre, and thereby tempt moneyed men and speculators into the market, who will very soon take the place of the Government, as the owners of all the valuable lands which have been surveyed? Or shall we adhere to the laws heretofore passed on that subject, for the real advantage of the laboring class who migrate to the new States, and use the proceeds as directed in the second section of the bill? After the most careful investigation of this great question, in reference to its operation on the interests of the whole country, I have formed the deliberate and decided opinion, that our wise and well-digested code of land laws ought to be preserved, with slight modifications; and I can perceive no sound objection to the distribution of the nett proceeds provided for in the bill.

It cannot fail to produce beneficial results both to the old and the new States, and especially to the latter, as I shall endeavor to prove clearly and conclusively, I hope, before I resume my seat.

Mr. P. then proceeded to examine the special provisions of the bill in favor of the new States. Sir, said he, the provisions to which I am about to refer were not in the original bill reported at the last session of Congress, but were incorporated, on my motion, as amendments, when it came before the Senate. I frankly own that had they been negatived, I should have voted against the bill in the shape in which it was at first presented by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY.] They were, however, adopted, and to my mind they place the new States on a footing, in the proposed distribution, highly advantageous to them; and, as a Senator from one of those States, I cannot withhold from the measure my support. By the first section of the bill, there is set apart to each of the new States $12\frac{1}{2}$ per centum on the nett proceeds of the public lands, within the limits of those States respectively, which may be sold from and after the 31st day of December, 1832. The terms of the compacts entered into by these States with the Government of the United States, on their admission into the Union, stipulated that 5 per centum on the sales of the public lands was to be paid to each of the said States for certain specified purposes. The aggregate amount, then, to which each State will be entitled before a general distribution is made, if this bill shall become a law, is $17\frac{1}{2}$ per centum on the nett amount of the sales of the public lands within its limits.

This sum so reserved is to be applied to some "object or objects of internal improvement or education within the said States, under the direction of their respective Legislatures."

The 5th section of the bill, in addition to the sum directed to be paid to each of the new States by the 1st section, to which I have referred, grants to the States of Mississippi, Louisiana and Missouri, a quantity of five hundred thousand acres of land, and to the State of Indiana one hundred and fifteen thousand two hundred and seventy-two acres; to the State of Illinois twenty thousand acres, and to the State of Alabama one hundred thousand acres of land, lying within the limits of said States, respectively, to be selected in such manner as the Legislatures thereof shall direct, and located in parcels, conformably to sectional divisions and subdivisions, of not less than three hundred and twenty acres in any one location.

The nett proceeds of the sales of the lands so granted are to be faithfully applied to works of internal improvement within the aforesaid States, respectively.

It is further provided, that nothing in the bill contained shall be construed to the "prejudice of future applications for a reduction of the price of the public lands, or to the prejudice of applications for a transfer of the public lands, on reasonable terms, to the States within which they lie, nor to impair the power of Congress to make such future disposition of the public lands, or any part thereof, as it may see fit."

These liberal grants, both in land and money, are made to the new States, besides the equal proportion to which they are entitled, according to their respective federal representative population, under the general distribution.

Combining the $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., which is to be deducted before the distribution of the residue of the common fund, with the amount which will accrue to each new State as its proportion, I have estimated the whole as amounting to about thirty per cent. on the sales which may be made in each State. This estimate must, of course, depend on the quantity of land which may be sold in each year, and may vary according to that standard. I respectfully ask, sir, if these grants are not liberal, far transcending the donations made at any former period of our history to any one of the States within which the public lands are situated? To me it appears that if this offer is rejected, we may indulge a lingering hope of obtaining our ultimate wish by a transfer of the entire domain for a century to come, and at last it will be but a dream, and end in cruel disappointment.

Nor can I bring my mind to the conclusion, that such a result, if it were to happen at this time, would be productive of greater pecuniary benefits to the new States, than the annuity which it is now proposed to grant them. Some of us, at least, know that Kentucky opened an office for the sale of her waste lands, and they were sold. But was the State treasury replenished by these sales? No, sir; it was made a popular theme on which unworthy men appealed to those interested, and by that means thrust themselves into the legislative halls, for the very purpose of postponing, and finally surrendering the debt, incurred by the purchaser to the State. Who can doubt that the same scenes would be acted over in any State having the disposal of a large extent of unappropriated territory?

But if I am wrong in this opinion; I cannot be mistaken in the other view which I have taken of the subject—that a cession by the old States of their interest in the public domain is not to be expected, until the existing Government shall be overthrown, and a new one erected on its ruins.

Shall we act wisely in rejecting a present good, because it falls short of the utmost limit of our hopes and expectations? I think not. But, sir, I beg the indulgence of the Senate, while I offer some views of the practical operation of this bill on the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent on this floor.

Thirty years have elapsed since the public lands in Mississippi were put in market, and seventeen years since that State was admitted into the Federal Union.

What, sir, during this whole period, have we gained from the sales, made under the authority of the United States, of their lands within our limits? Why, sir, substantially nothing. The miserable pittance of five per cent. on these sales was given us by compact, for which we gave in return a much greater amount, by our agreement not to levy a tax on the lands sold by the Government until the expiration of five years after the sale. What shall we gain in thirty years to come, if this bill does not become a law? I answer—nothing, which can be turned to any profitable account.

Let us then inquire what will be the reasonable amount of income to the State, if we receive hereafter seventeen and a half per cent. on sales within the State, an equal dividend on the entire sales throughout the United States, and a sweeping grant of five hundred thousand acres of land, to be located in half-sections, under the direction of the Legislature?

The sales of the past year have amounted to something over two hundred thousand dollars, but that does not furnish a proper standard by which to estimate the probable amount of sales in future years; or, at any rate, for the period to which this bill is limited.

The Choctaw tribe of Indians have recently ceded to the United States the whole of their lands east of the river Mississippi, of which about eleven millions of acres lie within the boundaries of the State of Mississippi.

The Chickasaw tribe have also entered into a treaty, of which I am not now at liberty to speak, as it has not been ratified by the Senate.

The surveys of the Choctaw purchase are rapidly progressing, and it is believed that they will be thrown into market in the course of the present year. I calculate that, so soon as these sales are opened, the nett proceeds, for several years to come, will average about five hundred thousand dollars. But I deem it quite within the bounds of moderation, to put the average for five years at three hundred thousand dollars. At this latter estimate, the annual income of the State, at seventeen and a half per cent., would be fifty-two thousand five hundred dollars, making, in the whole period of five years, the round sum of two hundred and sixty thousand dollars, or thereabouts. This is exclusive of the amount which we should receive on the general dividend, which would not fall short more than eight or ten per cent. of the sum specially reserved to the State.

In addition to these large sums, which may be wholly applied to the endowment of colleges, seminaries of learning, and common schools, at the discretion of the Legislature, we have the grant of five hundred thousand acres of land, for works of internal improvements, which, if judiciously located, will be more than adequate to all the expenditures required to render our rivers navigable; open canals for internal commerce; and to construct the great roads leading through the State, which are so necessary to connect the interior with the market towns, at which the planter annually delivers his bulky articles of agriculture.

These are the eminent benefits placed within our grasp; and shall we, who represent the people, and are bound by the most solemn obligations to advance their interests on all proper occasions, cast them from us in pursuit of objects which can never be attained, or on some vague notions of political economy, too remote to be brought into active operation, and resting on speculative opinions, which have no solid foundation, and are unworthy of a moment's consideration, in the progress of sober legislation, for purposes of practical utility to the country?

Sir, I cannot consent to place myself before my constituents in that attitude. I know, and feel, the importance of the relief which the passage of this bill will afford them; and so far as the influence of my vote will contribute to that desirable end, they shall not be disappointed. The grant of land, if properly located, immediately after the first sales are closed, may be estimated at the average value of three dollars per acre. The State would thus require a fund of one million five hundred thousand dollars, which, with the annual income from the sales of land for five years, could not, in my judgment, fall much, if any, below the enormous sum of two millions of dollars.

Sir, the people of the State, I am persuaded, cannot be so far blinded by party feelings, or party factions, as not to see and appreciate the enviable condition in which these large grants will place them.

Be that as it may, I am here to perform my duty, in the discharge of the high trust confided to me; and I shall fearlessly act on all subjects, brought to the consideration of the Senate, according to my honest convictions of what is due to the honor and prosperity of those whom I represent.

But my honorable colleague, [Mr. BLACK,] and the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BROWN,] have taunted us with the insinuation that these grants are put into the bill, as a douceur or bonus, to enlist the support of Senators who represent the new States.

They proceed to tell us that they spurn the bonus, and refuse the service for which it is offered.

The honorable Senators have my permission to apply any epithet to these grants which may best accord with their own peculiar taste, and, so far as it may concern themselves, to act in obedience to their own impressions, however fallacious they may be, or however coarse the language employed to convey these impressions.

I can only say for myself, "let the galled jade wince; my withers are unwrung."

Sir, for what purpose am I sent here, if it be not to advocate measures, conferring benefits on my constituents? Was it ever heard before, that a Senator, who, looking with a vigilant eye into the actual condition of the State which had honored him with its confidence, sought, on all proper occasions, an opportunity to advance its interests, and promote its welfare, thereby subjected himself to the imputation of accepting a bonus as a consideration for his vote?

Is there a single Senator present who is not liable to the imputation?

Sir, I beg leave to tell the honorable gentlemen, who have introduced this new rule of parliamentary ethics,

JAN. 19, 21, 1833.]

Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

that, if in the arrangement of any important interest of the country, my constituents happen to be particularly favored, without prejudice to their fellow-citizens in other sections of the Union, I shall never hesitate to accept the "bonus," however unpleasant it may be to the morbid sensibility of honorable Senators who, perhaps, look for their reward for services rendered in another quarter.

I came here for that especial purpose, and shall keep it steadily in view, as a part of my duty which shall never be neglected.

But, sir, there is another description of "bonus," which is not unfrequently offered within the limits of the ten miles square, which I utterly disdain and reject.

It consists of a small piece of parchment, under the broad seal, which is never tendered to any but the faithful.

The recruit who accepts it is bound by a pledge never to disobey the commands of the chieftain under whose banner he enlists; and in all things to conform his actions and doings to the will of him, "who was born to command," his heir and successor. Such a bonus, accepted on such conditions, may well be supposed to corrupt the sources of legislation, and mislead the judgment in matters of great national concern. If honorable Senators can guard themselves from these influences, and indignantly repel them, as foul encroachments on the purity and independence which ought to be maintained in the faithful discharge of their public duties, they will find less difficulty in tracing my support of this bill to more lofty considerations than the temptation of gain, or the seductions of profit, which it holds out to my immediate constituents. I am well acquainted with their wants, and, in my endeavors to relieve them, I stand erect before the people, and am not alarmed lest they should ascribe to me such unworthy motives, and refuse the "bonus" which I may be so fortunate as to obtain for them.

Is my honorable colleague [Mr. BLACK] unmindful of these wants? Have we not numerous rivers capable of being rendered navigable for steamboats to a great distance into the interior of the country, passing through rich and highly cultivated portions of the State? Are there no canals to be cut, intersecting these rivers, and affording cheap and convenient channels, through which the planter may carry the products of his labor to market? Are there no colleges and seminaries of learning in the State, calling for endowments to bring them to maturity, and render them practically useful in diffusing the lights of science and the benefits of education to the rising generation?

Sir, we have all these important objects to provide for, which are sufficient to call forth the anxious solicitude of every citizen in the State. Our population cannot bear the burden of taxation to an amount which would be required for all, or either of those objects, so necessary to the growth and prosperity of the State. Shall we, then, act wisely, in rejecting the means now proposed to be put into the hands of the Legislature, so ample for their accomplishment?

It is my firm belief, that if the present occasion is permitted to pass without the relief which is embodied in this bill, we may hope in vain for any assistance hereafter from Congress. The best portion of the State will very soon be in market; our locations must be made immediately hereafter; and if not made in two or three years from this time, the grant of five hundred thousand acres of land to the State will not be worth the parchment on which it is written.

All the lands of any value, capable of cultivation, which are not purchased at the public sales, will be subject to entry at private sale; and we may reasonably expect that the lapse of a few years will not leave a spot which will command one dollar and a quarter per acre, on which this grant can be located.

This is the precise moment for action, and I shall act on the conviction that the passage of the bill is identified with the welfare and best interests of each of the new States, and especially that of which I am an humble representative.

[Mr. P. here complained of fatigue; and, on motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate adjourned.]

MONDAY, JANUARY 21.

Mr. WILKINS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the message of the President, accompanying copies of the proclamation, &c., reported a bill further to provide for the collection of duties on imports. The bill

SIGNING LAND PATENTS,

Describing the mode by which patents for public lands may be signed and executed, was taken up, as in Committee of the Whole.

An amendment, limiting the operation of the act to March, 1837, was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER then stated his objections to the bill, and wished for time to substitute a provision for a fac simile of the President's signature, in lieu of the existing provision to authorize the employment of a Secretary by the President for the purpose of signing patents. He therefore moved to lay the bill on the table; but the motion was negatived—ayes 13, noes 16.

Mr. KANE then moved to fill up the blank for the salary of the Secretary, by inserting 1,500 dollars.

Mr. RUGGLES moved to lay the bill on the table—ayes 13, noes 16.

Mr. POINDEXTER moved to fill up the blank with 1000 dollars.

After a few words from Mr. HOLMES, the question was taken on the largest sum, and decided in the affirmative—Yea 15, Nays 14.

Mr. POINDEXTER then moved to amend the bill, by inserting, after the word "President," the words "and in his presence."

The motion was negatived.

The bill was then reported as amended, and the amendments being concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate resumed the bill to distribute, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands; the question being on the motion of Mr. POINDEXTER to amend,

Mr. POINDEXTER again rose, and resumed his argument commenced on Saturday.

He said, he would add a few words to what he said when he last had the honor to address the Senate, in relation to internal improvements and education, and the means to give support to them in Mississippi.

He had stated that the population of that State could not accomplish these great objects by resorting to a system of exorbitant taxation; the people would not bear it. This fact was clearly demonstrated by the numerous petitions and memorials which were annually transmitted to their Senators and Representatives in Congress, from the Legislature, praying grants of a few thousand acres of land, for clearing away obstructions in their navigable rivers, for opening canals, and for the encouragement of education, by the establishment of colleges and seminaries of learning.

He had the other day presented such a memorial to the Senate, praying for a grant of a township of land to a new and flourishing college in the town of Clinton. He would only add, if these partial grants were deemed of so much importance as to attract the attention of the Legislature from year to year, would it not be folly and madness in her representatives here to set their faces against a grant which would more than cover all the wants of the State, in perfecting her wise system of internal policy?

He felt himself bound by the imperious obligations of duty to accept the grant, and thereby remove the insuperable difficulties which interposed to retard the growing prosperity of the State.

Mr. President: I have endeavored, in the views which I have already taken of the subject before the Senate, to establish:

1st. That no part of the public domain of the United States was acquired by conquest.

2d. That the States, in conquering their separate independence on the crown of Great Britain, succeeded to the sovereignty and jurisdiction of the territory within their respective chartered limits.

3d. That to provide for those who fought our battles in the war of the revolution, and to pay the debt incurred in that glorious and arduous struggle, the States having waste and unappropriated lands in the Western wilderness magnanimously ceded them to the General Government for those purposes, without an equivalent in money, on certain specified conditions, which were binding on the old Congress under the confederation.

4th. That, by the adoption of the new constitution, all the States who were the original parties to these compact agreed, by a fundamental law of the republic, to render the powers of Congress over the ceded territory plenary, and thereby removed the limitations contained in the deeds of cession, and left the whole policy, in relation to the territory of the United States, open to the sound discretion of Congress.

5th. That up to the present time the public lands have been considered, in the main, a common fund for the payment of the national debt.

6th. That this debt being extinguished, these lands remain the common property of all the States, to be disposed of for their common benefit. On these principles, I ground my support of the measure under consideration.

But, sir, I feel myself called on, by a due regard to the welfare of my constituents and of each of the new States, to render the proposed system still more perfect and acceptable, by attracting the serious attention of its friends to the several amendments which I have offered as additional sections to be incorporated in the bill.

If these amendments are adopted, I am fully impressed with the belief that the system will give general satisfaction, and may be continued to an indefinite period, without complaint or interruption. It is true, we have inserted an express provision, that Congress may hereafter legislate in respect to the public lands without regard to the present arrangement; but we ought not to leave any matter for future legislation which can be properly adjusted at this time. Such a course might, and most probably would, give rise to heart-burnings, jealousies, and discontents, unfavorable to the tranquility of the Union.

I wish to provide for an equitable graduation of the public lands after they shall have been subject to private entry for a specified number of years, and to reduce the price at once to fifty cents per acre on small tracts not exceeding one quarter-section to a poor man, who shall actually inhabit and cultivate it for five successive years.

These provisions are contained in two sections of the printed amendments laid on the table, which were prepared with great care. I shall now, sir, proceed to examine them, and offer some of the leading considerations which induced me to offer them.

The first section of the amendments proposes to graduate the price of the public lands by a scale which shall reduce them to the minimum price of fifty cents per acre, at the end of twenty years, in the following manner:

1st. All lands subject to entry at private sale, and which shall remain unsold at the expiration of ten years, shall be offered at one dollar per acre.

2d. All lands which in like manner shall remain unsold at the expiration of fifteen years after the same shall have been subject to private entry, shall be offered at seventy-five cents per acre; and all lands remaining unsold at the expiration of twenty years shall be offered at the price of fifty cents per acre. No reduction below fifty cents is contemplated at any period. The second section of the amendment provides that every person who shall be the head of a family, or above the age of twenty-one years, and who shall actually inhabit and cultivate a tract of land not exceeding in quantity one hundred and sixty acres for the period of five consecutive years, shall be entitled to become the purchaser of such tract of land on paying for the same, at the proper land office, at the rate of fifty cents per acre.

This provision is so guarded that no one can obtain a patent, without making satisfactory proof to the Register of the Land Office that the tract of land has been actually inhabited and cultivated by the claimant for the whole period specified in the act.

In support of these modifications of the existing laws, I beg leave to recur again to the message of the President of the United States, which fully recognises, in the opinion of that high public functionary, the power of Congress in its discretion to dispose of the public lands "in such way as best to conduce to the quiet, harmony, and general interests of the American people."

He thus puts out of view altogether the deeds of cession and treaties by which they were acquired.

He considers them no longer binking on Congress since the payment of the national debt, for which they were pledged; and recommends that not a dollar shall hereafter be paid into the public treasury arising from the sales of these lands; that they be sold in limited parcels to actual settlers at a price barely sufficient to reimburse the United States the expense of the present system, and the amount paid for the extinguishment of Indian titles. He further proposes, at a day not distant, to cede the lands remaining unsold to the States within which they lie.

These propositions open the entire policy to the action of Congress on the ground of expediency, in its broadest sense.

Under this high authority, therefore, I proceed to inquire—Is it expedient to graduate the price of the public lands according to the scale which I have presented to the consideration of the Senate?

Is it expedient to encourage emigration to the new States, and grant facilities to those who remove with their families into these States, by granting to each head of a family the right of pre-emption in one quarter-section of land, at fifty cents per acre, after it shall have been cultivated successively, and without intermission, for five years?

I respond affirmatively to both these questions; and I appeal to the friends of this bill for distribution to consider them well; for if we are to legislate finally on this important subject, it must be clear to every gentleman that our laws should be so formed as to give satisfaction to the country—to the old as well as the new States.

I am sensible that this appeal would be made in vain to the opponents of the bill, many of whom are utterly opposed to any measure of relief to the new States, and rest their opposition on the ground that already our bounty and liberality have been too freely lavished on the people who take possession of the public lands.

I look for no aid from that quarter, unless it may be found in professions of good will, of which we are yet unable to see any practical evidence.

The success of these amendments must, therefore, depend on those honorable Senators who are the advocates

JAN. 21, 1833.]

Public Lands.

of the system, and desire to perfect it by adopting any just and reasonable modifications.

I cannot concur in the report of the Committee on Manufactures, to which the subject was, by a singular transposition of the business of the Senate, referred at the last session of Congress, so far as that report controverts the expediency of graduating the price of the public lands on fair and equitable principles. From my own experience in these matters, I am firmly persuaded that it would increase rather than diminish the amount of money annually paid into the public treasury from that source of revenue. It will operate in favor of the scheme of distribution, by bringing into market, successfully, such lands as will not, after the lapse of years, command one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, at a reduced price, which will enable the Government to dispose of them and realize their actual value, when there is no prospect that they can be sold at the present minimum standard.

Under our existing system, the lands are first carefully surveyed, and parcelled out into legal subdivisions. Maps are prepared, exhibiting accurately each range of townships divided into small tracts according to law. The President is authorized, after these surveys are completed, to issue his proclamation, offering the whole or any part of a district for sale at public auction, under the superintendence of officers appointed for the purpose. Well, sir, he issues his proclamation, and puts in market a range of ten or twenty townships, at his discretion, which is published in all the newspapers authorized to publish the laws of the United States, and continued for some six or eight months prior to the day fixed for the commencement of the sales, which are to be kept open two weeks. At these public sales, men of capital usually attend, who have explored the country, who know the good lands, have selected their favorite tracts, and go prepared to purchase them. The consequence is, much competition; and choice selections are not unfrequently bid up to twenty or twenty-five dollars per acre, and sometimes even higher prices are given.

A poor man has but little chance to supply himself at these sales; men with long purses compete with each other for the choice lands; and we may safely calculate that at least one-tenth part of the highest quality of land in a range of townships will be bid off at the first sale. At the close of the public sales, all the lands which have been offered, and remain unsold, are subject to entry at private sale by any one who will pay down for them one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. Then, sir, a new scene opens. The speculator, who wishes to make profitable investments; the rich planter, who is anxious to provide suitable settlements for his sons; the poor man, who wants a comfortable home for his family; and the emigrant, arriving in the country from one of the old States, wishing to take up his permanent residence there—all these classes of persons are actively employed in seeking out the best lands, and entering them at the proper land office, in large or small tracts, to suit the purposes of the respective purchasers.

Now, sir, I say, from an intimate knowledge of these sales, public and private, for nearly thirty years past—and I believe every Senator from a new State will accord with me in the declaration—that, after any given number of townships shall have been in market for ten years, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to find lands even of second or third rate quality open to entry at the minimum price of the Government.

The official documents on the files of the Senate go far to attest the accuracy of this opinion.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a call made on the head of that department in 1828, made a report to the Senate containing a statement of the quantity of land surveyed and unsold in each of the States and Territories where the public lands are situated.

This report classifies, under separate heads—1st. The lands which may be deemed good; 2d. Lands of second rate quality; 3d. Lands of third rate quality; 4th. The quantity unfit for cultivation; 5th. The number of years it has been in market, and the average value per acre of the vacant land in each State and Territory. As this document has a direct bearing on the subject now before the Senate, I beg leave to give the summary which it presents of the actual condition of the public lands at the date when it was prepared. I confine the statement to lands of good quality, and those which are deemed unfit for cultivation.

Mr. P. here read from the report, as follows:

DISTRICT AND STATE.	First rate.	Unfit for cultivation.
	Acres.	Acres.
Ohio, - - -	200,000	666,000
Indiana, - - -	1,470,000	2,430,000
Illinois, - - -	2,935,000	6,023,000
Missouri, - - -	159,000	5,700,000
Alabama, - - -	687,000	6,915,000
Mississippi, - - -	-	8,294,000
Louisiana, - - -	95,000	740,000
Michigan, - - -	-	-
Arkansas, - - -	53,000	2,500,000
Florida, - - -	15,000	1,005,000
Aggregate, - - -	5,614,000	34,373,000

These statements are drawn from the most authentic sources—the returns of actual surveys, and the field notes of the deputy surveyors. It may not be precisely accurate, but it furnishes general views, which will aid us in arriving at proper conclusions in the adjustment of this question. The returns from Louisiana, I am inclined to think, overrates the quantity of first rate land in that State which was unsold at that time.

But, sir, the whole of the lands described in the preceding summary, it must be recollected, have been in market for five years, since the report was made; may it not, then, be reasonably supposed that the greater part of the first, and the second, rate qualities, have been sold within that period? And certainly we may fairly conclude, that no part, or, at any rate, a very small part, of the lands reported to be unfit for cultivation have been entered at the present minimum price; nor is it probable that they could be disposed of in a century to come, at that rate. Let us look at the prices, estimated by the land officers in the various districts, as the average value of the lands in market. Does not the picture which it presents to us strongly enforce the propriety of a judicious graduation of the minimum price, which may induce purchasers to enter the lands of inferior quality, and thereby not only hasten the sales, but facilitate the settlement and improvement of the country? I sincerely hope it may produce that desirable result. What, sir, are the estimates contained in the reports of the registers and receivers of public moneys to the Commissioner of the General Land Office? I will refer the Senate to the reports separately, and then compare the whole, so as to reach, as nearly as practicable, the general average of the estimated value of the public lands in all the States and Territories from which official information has been communicated on the subject.

In Ohio the average value of the lands in market, is estimated, per acre, at	$1 03½
In Indiana, the average is,	82
Illinois,	40
Missouri,	23
Alabama,	15
Mississippi,	23

Public Lands.

[JAN. 21, 1833.]

In Louisiana,	- - - - -	38
Arkansas Territory,	- - - - -	4
Florida Territory,	- - - - -	30

It will be seen by this enumeration, that in Ohio the average is higher than in the other States and Territories. There are more good lands in that State, and a smaller quantity unfit for cultivation, than are to be found elsewhere. The settlements have been, and continue to be, rapid and extensive. These causes contribute to raise the value of their lands to a point beyond that of other portions of the country.

But by a careful comparison of the returns from all the land districts, according to the most accurate calculations which I have been enabled to make, the general average value of the lands in market, in 1828, would not exceed thirty cents per acre. Much of the first and second rate qualities has, doubtless, been entered since that time, from which we may draw the inference, that a corresponding diminution in the estimate then made has taken place.

With these facts before us, I respectfully ask honorable Senators, who are in favor of the plan of distribution, what advantage can they hope to gain by keeping the inferior lands out of the market? After all our exertions to dispose of these lands at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre have proved ineffectual for ten, fifteen, and twenty years, what prospect is there, that at the expiration of these periods we can find purchasers at that price? Certainly, none! But, if any, it is too remote to be relied on as a reason for rejecting the proposed graduation. It enters into the ordinary transactions of life; it is the practice of every man of business throughout the world, who has on hand an extensive supply of any article, first to dispose of the choice selections at the highest prices, and the remnants are sent to auction, and sold for whatever they will bring. A merchant must be mad, who would suffer his refuse goods to remain on hand and encumber his shelves, because they could not be sold for the marked prices. We must adopt this common sense practice in disposing of the public lands, unless we determine to hold them for all time to come, as a part of the eminent domain—a mere nominal estate, from which we cannot hope to derive one dollar of income.

Sir, I beg leave to fortify myself on this subject, by presenting to the Senate the very liberal views of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] in 1828, when this great question of reducing and graduating the price of the public lands was under consideration in the Senate. I call the attention of the Senate to a few sentences from a short speech, delivered by that honorable Senator on the occasion, and to several amendments subsequently offered by him, which are, in substance, the same as those which I have had the honor to submit, and which are now before the Senate.

Mr. WEBSTER said: "The bill proposed that all lands, that shall have been in market two years, should be brought into market at one dollar the acre. There were somewhere about eighty millions of acres of land that had been in the market for many years. And this bill made no distinction between lands that had been in market twenty years, and those that have been offered for sale only two years. He thought the supply of land would be altogether too large. It was generally thought that even now the market was overstocked, and that for the last forty years there had been double the quantity on sale that was required." This he thought was proof enough that this bill proposed to go too largely into the matter. He thought there ought to be some limitation; and it occurred to him, that to fix it to all "the lands that had been offered for sale for ten years would be a more satisfactory provision. An amendment of that kind would exclude a great quantity of land from the operation of the bill, would still include sufficient, and suffer all the old land officers to wind up their accounts. He thought two years too short a period for the next reduction; but such a limitation would lessen his objections to it; and it would be far better than to have such a mass of land thrown at once into the market. It could not be doubted that land would come down to twenty-five cents much sooner than the population would require it. This, to Mr. W., was obvious that the graduation of the prices would bring it down to twenty-five cents vastly sooner than the people would want it. He was in favor of the graduation system; but he thought the effect of it would be, if it went into operation as detailed in this bill, to throw the lands into the hands of people who will hold it, as the United States do now, for want of purchasers. He was in favor of making the system apply on lands that had been ten years in the market; but as it was not now in order to move an amendment to that effect, he would defer it until it should be proper."

Mr. P. then read the amendments offered by Mr. WEBSTER, and proceeded to say: This, sir, is almost the precise system which I have proposed. May I not, then, confidently hope to receive the aid of the honorable gentleman, since it is apparent that I have simply revived his own propositions, made in 1828? I can testify, from practical experience, to the soundness of the views of the honorable Senator, and concur with him in his plan of graduation. I know of no instance where a district of lands have been in market ten years, in which any tracts remain to be disposed of, from which the Government can realize one dollar the acre. The first Choctaw purchase in Mississippi, comprising a valuable portion of cotton lands, has been surveyed, and offered for sale, only a few years past, far short of the period of ten years, and I may venture to say, that very few, if any, sections of land remain unsold, which could command one dollar and a quarter per acre. In one or two years more there will, in all probability, not be a single section which could command that price. What, sir, do we now ask? Is it unreasonable that lands which have remained in market ten years, should be reduced twenty-five cents per acre; that at the end of fifteen years, they should undergo a further reduction of twenty-five cents per acre; and at the end of twenty years, be reduced to fifty cents? This is all we ask, and it is not more than the honorable Senator from Massachusetts proposed to give us in 1828.

Has there been any change in the circumstances of the country since that period which will justify a change of opinion on this subject? Sir, I think not; and I cannot but hope for the countenance and vote of the honorable Senator, which, I am very confident, would ensure the adoption of my amendment.

I dismiss this part of the argument, leaving the proposition to graduate the price of the public lands to the fate which I am sure awaits it, unless it shall find advocates among the friends of this bill. Those honorable Senators who so anxiously desire to retain the revenue accruing from the sales of the public lands, because it may be wielded as an "argument" to reduce the rate of imposts, and reject the benefits accorded to the new States because they deem them offensive to the purity of their moral sensibility, cannot be brought to the support of my amendment.

They call on me to surrender two millions of dollars which are tendered to my constituents, and sacrifice them to escape the imputation of accepting a "bonus" for the vote which I may give in their favor. This terrible "bonus" is held up as a frightful spectre to alarm Senators who represent interested parties from the performance of their duty.

Now, sir, for one, I cannot bid so high for an "argument" against protecting duties which will fall pointlessly at the feet of those to whom it is addressed; nor can I be induced to sacrifice the best interests of those whom I represent, lest I might be suspected of the high crime of permitting their welfare to influence my judgment.

Mr. President: I will detain the Senate only a few moments longer, while I present concisely my views of the operation of the second amendment, which proposes to bring down the price of the public lands to the poor emigrant on the condition of actual settlement and cultivation for five successive years. It will be observed, that the limitations, both as to quantity and cultivation, are so clearly expressed, that none but the laboring class of emigrants can profit by the privilege granted.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has admonished us to be "patient," and promises at a more convenient season to listen to our complaints. I will tell the honorable Senator, that our patience has been already well-tried, and has thus far enabled us to bear all our privations and sufferings. We have quietly waited these thirty years for some measure of relief, and our anxious hopes have ended in disappointment.

When will the hour of our deliverance come? May we not pause for another quarter of a century; and, when we press on Congress again the necessity of attending to our claims for redress, be thrown back on our patience as the best friend of the afflicted?

But the honorable Senator asks, with peculiar emphasis, what do the new States want? Sir, as a Senator from one of those junior members of the confederacy, I have already disclosed to the Senate the condition of my State, its wants, and its expectations. We are yet in our infancy, and need the fostering hand of the Federal Government to hasten us on to maturity and manhood, and strengthen us in our march to prosperity and real independence.

I have said that we want the means necessary to construct important works of internal improvements, to establish colleges and seminaries of learning, to enlighten the minds of the rising generation. We want a great deal; perhaps more than the honorable Senator, with his acknowledged feelings of generosity, would be willing to give us.

I cannot, however, withhold from the honorable gentleman the homage of my thanks for the liberal provisions of this bill; for the increased per centage on the sales of the public lands which is accorded to us, besides the grant of half a million of acres of land, to be selected and located under the direction of our Legislature. But we do not think it unreasonable to ask, in addition to this "bonus," a liberal system for the future disposal of the lands belonging to the United States within our boundaries. Such a system shall not be prejudicial to the elder members of this great family of States, but one which shall hasten the sales of these lands, and enable every poor emigrant to become a freeholder the moment he arrives at his new home, without extorting from his hard earnings the last dollar which he may need for the immediate sustenance and support of a helpless family.

Is there any thing in this demand which can be regarded as exorbitant or unreasonable? To my humble conception, there is not. We know, and feel, that the Government of the United States, as the proprietors of the soil, possess the power to obstruct our growing prosperity, by imposing onerous conditions on those who purchase her unappropriated domains. But I will not indulge the thought, that a free Government like ours will so act towards the hardy, patriotic, and meritorious citizens who constitute its best support in peace, and its best defence in the hour of danger and difficulty, from whatever quarter it may come.

Can it be believed that those who hold the reins of power in their hands will treat us like the inexorable creditor, and demand "the pound of flesh nearest to our hearts, because it is written so in the bond?" No, sir; we look with becoming confidence to this Government for that disinterested kindness and clemency which an elder brother should extend to a minor, of whom he is the natural guardian and protector.

I seek to ameliorate the condition of the poor man; to open wide the door to the honest industrious cultivators of the soil; to render them independent, contented, and happy, by laws founded in wisdom, justice, and humanity. May I not hope in such a cause to find an eloquent and able advocate in the honorable Senator from Kentucky? [Mr. CLAY.] I desire most earnestly to modify the bill so as to make it acceptable to all the new States, and thereby put an end to this disturbing controversy in respect to the public lands for many years to come.

I consider this amendment even more important than that in relation to the graduation of the price of the public lands. It holds out inducements to the settlement of the vast wilderness of the West; it will invite into that extensive frontier a dense population, the bone and muscle of the country, adequate to its defence on all sudden emergencies. Sir, it will do more; it will enable a citizen of Virginia, of Massachusetts, or of any State on the Atlantic sea-board, from the extreme North to the old States in the South, to husband his scanty means by a rigid economy, and by small accumulations to lay up a sum which will bear his expenses across the Alleghany mountains into the far West, where, by this beneficent provision, he will find a resting-place for his helpless wife and children—objects near and dear to his heart. He may take possession of a quarter-section of waste land, inhabit and cultivate it for five years, and, at the expiration of that period, upon due proof of the fact, obtain a grant from the Government at the moderate price of fifty cents per acre. Can it be imagined that this accommodation to the poor will meet the censure of the intelligent and hardy yeomanry of the old States? To me it appears otherwise. Let it be recollected that a distinguished Senator from Virginia, not now a member of this body, [Mr. TAZEWELL,] submitted a proposition to cede the whole of the public lands to the new States; it was much spoken of at that time, and, as far as public sentiment was developed, it met the approbation of a large proportion of the American people.

We do not now ask you to cede these lands to the States, but simply to allow the emigrant a privilege, unimportant to the Government, of becoming a freeholder on his entrance into the country which he may select for the place of his future residence.

The provision is recommended by every consideration of national policy; it is both just and equitable, and I trust it will meet the sanction of the Senate, and be incorporated in the bill. I have no hesitation in saying, and I might without hazard stake my reputation on the issue, that more land would be sold, and more money brought into the treasury, if the amendments are adopted, than under the bill as it now stands.

It is manifest, therefore, that this new arrangement of our land system will favor rather than interfere with the proposed distribution.

The honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] who seems to think that no inducements are to be held out to emigration from the old to the new States, because manufacturing labor would be diminished in the same ratio, has said that the man who labors for the whole community, and derives his support from his daily wages, is as independent as he who lives on his farm and maintains his family by the fruits of agricultural labor. Sir, the honorable gentleman, in giving utterance to this sentiment, has, in my judgment, totally mistaken the feelings and character of the American people. On this part of the subject, I entirely concur in the opinion expressed by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GAVNHAM,] that the liberties of the country will be best secured by making, as far as possible, every man in the community a freeholder.

I believe this to be sound policy in all free Governments: He who cultivates the earth looks only to his God and the strength of his own arm for the means of sustenance and comfort as the rewards of his industry.

An enlightened statesman, who looked deeply into the human heart, and understood well the springs of human action, has denominated the farmers and planters "God's chosen people;" and, whether it be fact or fancy, it conveys to my mind a pleasing illustration of the moral influence in society of that branch of industry which removes the laborer from the temptations of vice, and cherishes the holy inspirations of religion and virtue. The man who follows the plough, and wields the axe to fell the sturdy oak of the forest, is taught, by education and the nature of his pursuits, to spurn the humiliation of dependence on the courtesy of his fellow man. He enjoys his frugal fare in his homely cottage; he seeks not the smiles, and fears not the frowns, of wealth or power, so long as he is obedient to the laws of his country. It is a maxim of the common law, which we inherit from our ancestors, that "every man's house is his castle." Yes, sir; under the protection of our free institutions, it is indeed his castle; no matter if it be a thatched roof, with open walls through which every wind of heaven may whistle, and into which all the elements may freely enter—it is nevertheless his castle, within which no one may dare to intrude without his free consent, or by the authority of some known process of law. There, around his peaceful fireside, he may worship his God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and drink deep of the blessings of divine Providence, amidst the smiles of his poor but contented family.

In favor of this class of my fellow-citizens, I wish now to legislate, by extending to them the protecting arm of the Government, as the pioneers who are destined to open the Western wilderness, and as the defenders of the rich legacy of freedom and independence bequeathed to us by our fathers.

Sir, let us, while we are at peace with all the nations of the earth, by a wise and liberal course of legislation, give harmony and tranquillity to every portion of our beloved country. Let us remove the last "apple of discord," and present to the world the sublime spectacle of a confederacy of States, comprising more than twelve millions of free-men happy under a Government of just laws, which confer equal rights, equal benefits, and protection, on all who live under its benign influence.

Mr. President: I will say, in conclusion, pass the bill on your table with the amendments which I have had the honor to submit; bring down your system of imposts by gradual reductions, to the standard of a revenue necessary to defray the current expenses of the Government; and instead of discord, "blood and carnage," civil strife and military despotism, we may hope to transmit the blessings of liberty, the constitution and union, to generations yet unborn.

Sir, I have done; I leave the issue to the sound and impartial judgment of this honorable body.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, next rose. He said he was not aware that any gentleman had, in the progress of the present debate, or in that which took place on this subject at the last session of Congress, claimed for the new States, as a matter of right, the lands of the United States within their respective limits. That doctrine, it is true, (said Mr. E.) was at one time urged on the floor of Congress. It was said, that some principle—he knew not what—deep and recondite, and probably inexplicable; a principle inherent in, and of the essence of, State sovereignty—attached to the new States at the moment of their formation; and did at once and forever annul and destroy, in part, if not in whole, the very compact which gave them their being. But this notion has lived out its day, and expired in the due course of nature. I think (said Mr. E.) I am right in saying, that no one here has directly advanced or contended for such doctrine. It may be that I am mistaken, for my attention has not been closely fixed upon all that has been said in the course of the debate; but if it has been urged, it requires no argument of mine to refute it; that has been already conclusively done by the Senator from Tennessee, in whose views, on that branch of the argument, I entirely concur. We have, it is true, sir, heard much declamation about the rights of the new States, and justice to the new States, without any definition of the nature of those rights, or the exact measure of the justice which is claimed. It seems, however, that neither can be fully accorded, without yielding to all such modest demands as gentlemen may think proper to make; apparently terminating in nothing short of a cession of all the national domain to the States which they represent. But, sir, the question of right and justice to the new States is to be determined, not by the mere measure of their claims, but by reference to their several compacts with the Union; and, when any of us require right and justice, we must confine our demands within the purview of those instruments; we cannot bring our sister States into a court of conscience, and require of them there that which they never agreed to award us.

In deciding between this bill and the amendments proposed by the Committee on Public Lands, the power of Congress to distribute the proceeds of the sales of public lands among the several States necessarily comes in question. If we have not the power, by direct grant or strong implication, to make this distribution, there is, on my part, an end of the matter; if we have the power, by an undoubted grant from the constitution, the foundation of the argument of the Senator from Tennessee is swept away from under him, and the fabric which he has reared and balanced with such skill on this basis must fall to the ground.

I would ask the Senator to take up the deed of cession from Virginia to the United States—I name that particularly, because it cedes much the greater part of the land which we hold of the several States; and because, in this, you find substantially the provisions of them all. I would ask him to take up this deed, not to glance over it hastily, as he has done in his speech to-day, but carefully to weigh its provisions, and consider calmly and impartially their import, and come to such decision as he would do were he trying, in a judicial capacity, the right of parties under it; and, if he will do this, I can safely say for him, in advance, that he will hold it to be not only the right but the duty of Congress to make this distribution.

The situation of our country at the time of making and receiving this deed of cession, is important to the true comprehension of its import. We had just emerged from the war of the revolution; our independence had been achieved, and this immense territory conquered at the expense of the blood and treasure of the whole people. The waste and unappropriated lands were within the chartered limits of a few of the States, principally of Virginia; but it was urged by the other States, that justice required a cession for the common benefit; and this cession was accorded. At this time there was no such thing as revenue belonging to the confederacy; all that availed to pay the debts and support the current expenses of the General Government, was raised by contributions on the several States. This was the state of things at the time of the execution of this deed of cession; and I have now to ask the attention of the Senate, while I examine it somewhat closely, and endeavor to ascertain from the language of the instrument, as well as the situation of the parties, whether distribution of the proceeds was intended by the donor at the time of the grant. The deed, after reserving various parcels of land for specific objects, provides "that all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for, or appropriated to, any of the before-mentioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American army, shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall be-some, members of the confederation or federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other purpose whatsoever."

Now, sir, this land, which is reserved as a common fund, is vested in the General Government; not to be retained; not to be held in perpetuity as a joint tenancy, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. KANE] seems to suppose; but, in trust, to be disposed of "faithfully and bona fide" for the purposes designated in the grant. The land, then, is to be disposed of, and the proceeds are to go to the common benefit of all the members of the confederacy. But here arises the important question—was it intended at the time, by the parties to this deed of cession, that the General Government should disburse as well as receive their proceeds, or that she should merely receive and distribute them among the several States? Advert, sir, to the situation of our Government at that time, which I have already noted, and look also at the wording of the latter clause. Virginia was a member of the confederacy at the time she made the grant. Her benefit would necessarily be included in the common benefit, if the expenditure of the proceeds of these lands were to be made by the General Government, for the support of the Government, or the payment of its debts, and were to be confined to those purposes. Why, then, insert the words "Virginia inclusive," which we find in the clause of this grant? If the construction given it by some gentlemen be correct, this were an absurdity. If my view of it be correct, we can readily understand why a cautious conveyancer would choose to insert it. The next clause fixes the proportion in which each of the parties interested shall be entitled; the language, "according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure," is rational and intelligible, if it be true that distribution was intended; but, otherwise, it were wholly without meaning. If the money were to be paid out by the General Government only, in discharge of the common debts, and in support of the common Government, who would have thought of naming the proportion in which it should be enjoyed by the several States? And, sir, the rule for the construction of written instruments, with which we have been familiar in courts of law, namely, that an instrument shall be so constructed as to give efficiency to every part of it, is equally entitled to the attention of the legislator and the judge; it is founded in practical good sense, and is at once assented to by the most uninformed as well as the most enlightened mind. But to sustain this objection to the power of Congress over this property, to do with it as proposed, gentlemen must repudiate this principle, and suppose that the grantors of this deed, among the ablest men of any age, wrote nonsense in two striking particulars; and they must disregard, too, the most obvious coincidence of these clauses in the deed, with the situation of the parties making and accepting this grant. There cannot, I think, be any doubt remaining, that, at the date of this deed, distribution of the fund arising from these lands was in the contemplation of the parties. It remains to be shown whether that purpose has been changed, or the obligation removed, by any subsequent compact. Was it yielded up or abandoned in the formation of the constitution?

The second section of the fourth article of the constitution gives Congress "power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." The power is in itself plenary and unlimited; and, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. POINDEXTER] has ably urged, leaves Congress wholly unrestricted in the manner of the disposition of the public lands, and the purposes to which they may apply their proceeds; from this, however, must be excepted those cases where Congress is limited or restrained by the terms of some compact.

The deeds of cession, to which I have already referred, furnish a case of restriction by compact prior to the constitution; but that compact, with all others entered into by the old confederation, is recognised and made binding on the United States by a provision in the constitution. The first section of the sixth article declares, "that all debts contracted, and engagements entered into, before the adoption of this constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this constitution, as under the confederation." This instrument, therefore, which gives to Congress unlimited control over the national domain, binds them to fulfil all "engagements entered into" with regard to it. The engagement entered into by the acceptance of the deed of cession, to hold the lands in trust for the purposes designated, and to dispose of them, and apply the proceeds as therein directed, is recognised by this constitution, and the national faith is pledged anew for its observance.

It was said by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. KING,] that taxation for the support of Government, under the constitution, is levied on the people generally, and not raised from the States by contribution, as under the old confederation; and hence he argues, that the distribution contemplated by the deed of cession, though obligatory under the confederation, would be a violation of the constitution. Constitutional objections were easily got up, and made to bear upon any thing, no matter what, if we receive as the constitution every imputed intent in its framers, even in direct opposition to the very terms of the instrument itself. Concede but this, and each of us may fashion a constitution for himself; and every one would violate it, whose opinions or policy might be variant from ours.

But the gentleman is wrong as to his theory of taxation under the constitution. Taxes are not levied upon the people collectively, but are apportioned among them in States, according to the same principles as under the old confederation.

I will refer you to the third section of the first article of the constitution, which declares "that representation and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons." From this clause, it is obvious that the distribution which was contemplated by this deed of cession, and which in its inception had relation to the articles of confederation, will operate as fully and effectually under the constitution. And it is worthy of remark, that no change whatever in the ratio of taxation (and consequently of distribution) has taken place. I therefore hold, that not only are we at liberty, consistently with constitutional obligations, to make the general distribution contemplated by this bill, but that we are bound to do so, of all the lands which we hold by these deeds of cession. As to the territory purchased of France and Spain, its situation is different; and the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. POINDEXTER,] in whose views, in that particular, I entirely concur, has, as I conceive, placed it upon its true ground. Congress has the right to dispose of that in such manner as they see fit, unshackled by any restriction or limitation whatsoever, except their own sense of justice and expediency.

But, it may be asked, if my views be correct as to the lands held under the deeds of cession, as those lands were not pledged for the payment of the debts of the revolution, and as they were given for the purposes of distribution, why have not their proceeds been distributed? and has not the national faith been already violated in neglecting this distribution? To this I answer, the national debt was a sum owed or assumed by the General Government, for the payment of which each of the States was bound to contribute in precisely the same proportion as it was entitled to receive of the proceeds of these lands under the principle of distribution. The General Government, who is their trustee in this particular, held the proceeds of the public lands to which they were entitled in distribution, and at the same time was bound to pay a large sum annually, to which they were bound to contribute. The clearest principles of justice would warrant the General Government in retaining this fund, and applying it to the debt rather than to distribute it, and immediately reclaim it from the distributees for the purpose of so applying it. But the national debt is now paid; this fund is no longer needed for that purpose; nor can any man say that it is required for the purposes of revenue. Indeed, we have to look about us to see where we can cut off other streams which bring their golden tribute into our treasury, lest we be inundated and overwhelmed with its abundance. The necessities of the General Government do not require these proceeds. We are not placed in such a situation, that if it were paid over, we could rightfully reclaim it by direct taxation levied within the several States; other legal sources of revenue abundantly supply the wants of the Government. We are, therefore, now bound by the deed of cession, the acceptance of which was a compact, to execute the trust which it reposes in us, by direct distribution, according to its provisions.

Public Lands.

Another view, arising out of this deed of cession, touches especially the amendments offered by the Committee on Public Lands, viz. a reduction of the price of those lands to one dollar per acre, and fifty cents to actual settlers. This is intended to cover all the lands, as well those which we hold by the deeds of cession, as by purchase from foreign powers. I have already shown you, sir, that, of one portion, and that at present the most important, Congress is a trustee for the benefit of all the States—bound to dispose of it for the common benefit, "bona fide, and for no other purpose whatsoever." We have received the fee of those lands, and agreed to dispose of them to the best advantage, "in good faith," for the benefit of all equally, not of a part; and justly apportion the proceeds arising from their disposition among the several States; and I need hardly say to this Senate, that we must not violate this plighted good faith; we must not betray the trust reposed in us, and give or squander away these lands for the benefit of any one or more States, or any class of individuals, without regard to the rights and interests of the whole. Let us look at the principles of the proposed amendment in this point of view, and test its propriety by this our engagement.

The first and most obvious light in which the public lands may be considered, is as a vendible article, the property of the United States, which we are to dispose of at a fair price, for the common benefit of those who have intrusted us with its management and care. We fixed a price; we settled upon terms of sale long since; and we are now advised by the Committee on Public Lands to reduce that price generally, and make a discrimination in favor of actual settlers! And what reason is given for this? None on earth. Are the lands now too high? Do we sell them for more than they are intrinsically worth? No. On the contrary, they are now sold so low, that they are bought up by thousands and tens of thousands, for the purpose of speculation. A large amount, it is true, remains unsold; and so there would, reduce it as you might; for the amount on hand exceeds, and will exceed, for ages to come, the capacity of our population to occupy and improve it. Why, then, reduce the price? Would it be a disposition bona fide of the national domain, for the common benefit, to do so? Would it be making the most out of the common property for the common profit? I think it will be admitted on all hands, that, as a mere money transaction, it would not. But it is urged that indirect benefits to the Union would result from such reduction, far superior to the pecuniary loss which we should incur by lessening the proceeds of the sales. This, sir, I admit, is a fair subject of inquiry; and if, on a full view of all its effects, we find the good to overbalance the evil of the proposed measure, we ought, as statesmen, to adopt it. But what are the indirect benefits said to be derived from the reduction in price, or the free donation of the public lands? It is urged as a reason for this measure, that it will advance the settlement upon the public lands; that our new States will be sooner filled with inhabitants; and that we may obtain, from the abundant resources of a numerous and prosperous people, more substantial advantages to our country than from the sale of the national domain. And gentlemen who contend that we have not the constitutional power to sell and make distribution, gravely tell us that we have the power to give away the lands, in whole or in part, for the purpose of encouraging settlement and emigration.

Sir, with respect to the early and speedy settlement of our extensive domain, I, perhaps, differ from some of my friends; I certainly do dissent from an idea thrown out in argument by my honorable friend from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY.] I do not wish, with him, that all our lands, from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, were now teeming with population, and covered with cities and villages. I look upon our present situation as most peculiarly happy; we have a delightful climate, fertile soil, large navigable rivers and lakes, and all the mineral products of the earth in variety and abundance—not only enough for the wants of the present, but for the future generations which may succeed us for ages to come. And I am not anxious that this vast resource of future life and subsistence should be occupied to the full measure of its capacity in our age, or even in that which is next to succeed us; let it remain, as in the due course of things it will remain, an outlet and a resource for our children and our children's children, for generations to come. So far as regards the interests of the people of the United States, and the prospects of their posterity, we might as well wish to limit the extent of our lands to the wants of the present inhabitants, as to augment our population at once, so as to cover and occupy all our lands. If new and fertile lands be desirable in the present age, they will be equally so in succeeding ages; and I do not envy posterity their possession. They are open now to receive that portion of our population who seek them; and so desirable are they to the husbandman, that it requires no bounty from the Government to stimulate his enterprise. Let me not be misunderstood. I, sir, would not discourage emigration, nor would I hold out to it any other inducements than those which already exist. But I would give it all the facilities which arise from the internal improvement of the country—the construction of roads and canals, the opening and improving the navigation of our rivers. I would thus lessen to the emigrant the toil and expense of transporting his family and effects, and enable him to bring with him to his newly-chosen home many of the comforts and conveniences of life, which he must otherwise leave behind him. I would not pay him a bounty for removing; but if he wished to go, with the hope of bettering his situation, I would smooth the way before him. But all else I would have as it now is, and intrust it to the free choice of our citizens; let them balance advantages, and choose where they will abide.

But whence is this population to come with which gentlemen seem so urgent to fill up and occupy our new lands? They are not, surely, to be the product of special creation for that end and purpose merely. We, therefore, must draw them from Europe by our bounties, or, by the like bounties, entice them from one portion of the Union, and induce them to go and occupy another.

If, sir, we were a weak and timid people, exposed to danger or invasion from without, and unable to dwell in the presence of the other nations of the earth, there might be some reason for holding out bounties to the people of Europe to come and unite with us and strengthen our hands. But we have passed the season of danger from foreign aggression; we are strong enough to defend and protect ourselves; and although I object not to the influx of foreigners, who, animated by a spirit of enterprise or a love of liberty, adventure for our shores; and although, when they thus come among us, I would give them the hand of fellowship, and welcome them as brothers; yet, I would hold out no special inducements, no reward except that of freedom, a country, and a home; nothing to flatter their pride, or tempt their avarice; for emigration from that country might be pushed too far. I would not wish that all Europe, loosened from its foundation, should precipitate itself on our coast. Nor can I perceive the benefit which would accrue to us as a nation, by extraordinary efforts to transfer the population from the old to the new States. I have looked in vain for reasons to induce it, and can find none. There may be times and circumstances under which this would be wise and politic; but those times have gone by, and the circumstances do not now exist. If our frontier were feeble and incapable of self-defence, that might furnish a reason; but how is it? Sir, when the first settlements were commenced in Kentucky and Ohio, such was indeed the state of things. Here and there were planted a few scattered inhabitants in the presence of numerous hostile nations, counting hundreds to one, and without communications by which aid could be furnished from the older and more populous sections of our country. But they, feeble as they were, made good their footing, and gradually possessed themselves of the broad fields of the enemy. Now, the population of the West is moving forward in a broad and equal mass; nothing to divide, nothing to break the strength and force of the current; if there be danger on the frontier, its inhabitants have but to retire backward a day's journey, and they are in the midst of a populous, secure, and plentiful country. No impenetrable forests or rugged mountains form a barrier between them and succor. But how would our frontier be strengthened by a gift of all these lands? That frontier might, perhaps, be pushed more and more remote from point to point; but we shall still have a frontier, until our emigration westward be stayed at last on the shores of the Pacific.

If it were deemed important, for the purpose of securing our territory from foreign intrusion, or for any other sufficient cause, to plant a colony at once on the coast of the Pacific, or on the banks of the Oregon, I would agree that there was a fair occasion for the encouragement of enterprise, by holding out bounties for emigration; and, sir, the settlement of that coast and of those shores is not at this day either so difficult or dangerous, as was the settlement of the banks of the Ohio when that was achieved. In Kentucky, grants of land were given to the adventurous emigrant, to induce him to encounter the danger and privations incident to the country. In Ohio, little or nothing was given; but the country was peopled and defended, and it has risen rapidly enough in population, improvement, and wealth.

But the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] has discovered a principle on which we may justify a donation of all the lands in the valley of the Mississippi to whomsoever will receive and occupy them; and he proves it to be a disposition of them to the common benefit of all the States. His argument is this: The navigation of the Mississippi is important to us as a nation; it is, therefore, our interest as a nation to defend it; and, by holding out bounties to individuals to settle upon its waters, we shall strengthen ourselves in that quarter, and be the better able to make good that defence. Now, sir, I like the general doctrine of the Senator exceedingly well. I am in favor of appropriating the public funds, whether in land or money, to secure us from assaults from without, or to enable us to repel them. On this principle, I think it important to improve, and as soon as practicable to perfect, our various avenues of intercommunication between different sections of the Union. In short, by the construction of canals and railroads, diverging from the most important points on our coast into the populous interior, to enable us at any time, in case of a sudden descent of a foreign enemy on our shores, at once to meet him in force, and punish his aggression. If the honorable Senator will view the present bill in this point of light, I have little doubt he will give us his vote upon its passage. It will certainly remove all his constitutional scruples on the subject: for, if the lands may be constitutionally given away, in order to strengthen New Orleans, by increasing the population on the Wabash and Wisconsin, surely it may be sold, and the proceeds applied to internal improvements, which will aid the communications between different portions of the country; facilitate the transportation of men and munitions of war; and hasten the transmission of intelligence, whether of civil commotion or of military aggression.

But the honorable Senator has singled out New Orleans as a point peculiarly liable to attack and difficult to defend—a point in which we are weak, and therefore ought to be strengthened. Now is this the fact? Sir, there is not upon our whole maritime frontier any single point so secure from invasion as New Orleans is at this day; and there is no point at which half a million of armed men, with the necessary munitions of war, could be concentrated more easily and more speedily. Because that point was once exposed, and because the means of defence were small, and difficult to be brought together, it does not follow that they are so now. Why, sir, Britain was once invaded, and still more, she was conquered by the Roman legions; but what would we say of the statesman who now, in the British parliament, should express fears of another attack, and exhort the nation to summon all their energy, or concentrate all their forces, to guard the point at which Julius Cæsar landed? Yet he would have reason on his side about as strong as has the honorable Senator, who, here on this floor, invites us to give away lands, and plant colonies in our interior, with a special view to the defence of New Orleans. Why, sir, since New Orleans was, for the first and last time, attacked by a foreign foe, what changes have taken place in the interior which supports it? The population of the valley of the Mississippi has risen from one to three millions—a force equal to all the United States during the revolutionary war. The sphere of active assistance is extended five-fold. Troops and munitions of war could now be transported from Pittsburg in less time than they could have been in 1814 from Natchez to New Orleans. Nay, sir, by means of the New York and Ohio canals, and the use of steam in the navigation of our rivers, troops could now be transported from New York to New Orleans in one-fourth of the time that they could have been in 1814, from either point to Pittsburg. Yet gentlemen have constitutional scruples about appropriating the public funds, or the proceeds of the public lands, to the internal improvement of our country, which would render it impregnable in all its extent; but they will give it away by millions to settlers, for the purpose of strengthening a single point, which no one believes to be in danger.

But we are to invite emigration to the new and fresh lands on the upper Mississippi, that we may thereby accumulate a force sufficient to defend New Orleans; and where are those emigrants to come from, whom we thus buy with our bounties? Surely, from the less fertile lands of the East and South; from the tide water districts of Maryland, Virginia, and North and South Carolina. They, I presume, have their thousands to spare, and will still be strong in case of a military incursion, while New Orleans, backed by more than five hundred thousand men capable of bearing arms, must have the treasures of the nation lavished, and the population of the East drained, to protect her against an apprehended attack, which, indeed, nobody apprehends. I dwell on this the more particularly, that I may show you, sir, what kind of quiddity this constitutional scruple is. Can any Senator be really governed in action by things of this substance, so strongly dwelt on in debate?

I will now, as briefly as practicable, examine the effect of this proposed bounty to emigration on the several sections of the Union: as to its necessity for national defence, I shall leave that out of the question, believing the Union to be strong enough at all points, and especially at that point, for the safety of which honorable gentlemen express so much anxiety.

Once, on a former occasion, in reviewing the operation of some measures of national policy, I adverted to the effect of emigration on the older portions of the Southern States. The same views are applicable here. The opening of new and fertile lands in climates similar to their own, invites their planters to abandon their old and partially exhausted fields, and seek for rich virgin soil in the further West. Even now, much of these lands, which might, by careful culture, be kept up and preserved, are suffered to depreciate to barrenness, while its cultivators flock to the new and cheap lands, which produce abundantly by the slightest care of the husbandman.

But, sir, of this I do not complain. Our system is in this respect settled, and has been for a long time past, and I wish it to remain steady; but the inducements to emigration are, in that point of view, strong enough, and I would add to it no new stimulus. Let it not be forgotten that the pressure which bears upon the staple articles of the South arises from over production, and cheaper production upon the fresh lands. In this state of things, it would be neither wise nor just in Congress to render the cultivation of their old fields impracticable, and their lands wholly valueless, by bringing down to nothing the price of the Western lands, which at present so drains their population, and sinks so low the price of their products.

In another point of view, this proposed reduction would operate most seriously on the Southern portion of the Union. It is a bounty to emigration. Already, sir, does that section of our country, so far from advancing in population in equal steps with their sisters of the confederacy, suffer diminution in numbers of its free inhabitants, while the slaves go on increasing in the natural ratio. Why is this, and whither does it tend? The reason has been anticipated. Emigration takes off the sons and daughters of the freeman, while the progeny of the slave remains, in some manner, fixed to the soil. Its future consequences, the result to which it is already hastening, would be hurried to a catastrophe by this proposed bounty to emigration.

If we turn our eyes to the East, the reasons against it, deducible from the state of society there, are equally striking. There, less than elsewhere in our country, they rely for their wealth on the cultivation of the soil. Generally, their lands are poor and unproductive; the people laborious, enterprising, and ingenious. There it is that the manufactures, which it has been our policy to build up and foster, have taken root and flourished. The hands which can be spared from the cultivation of the soil are employed in the factory. So fixed have been the principles, and so cherished the policy of protection with a majority of the people of the United States, that we are accused of having pushed it beyond the powers given us by the constitution. These are the assertions of those who oppose, and who wish to prostrate the policy; but, true it is, that we have watched over them with care and anxiety, conscious that they are the germ of our future greatness and power. And now let me appeal to gentlemen who are the friends of this policy. Would they deem it just and wise, at the instant that a share of the protection under which they have flourished is about to be withdrawn, to prostrate them to the dust by a direct reward—a bounty held out to their operatives to leave their employments, and settle on the Western lands? It would be a deathblow to the prosperity of the East. Would it benefit the Western States?

It is presumed that it would cause an influx of emigrants from the older States, and thereby fill the country with population, and cover it with improvements. I propose to look at the supposed benefit with some care; for I would not in any thing overlook the interest of my own State, or those so nearly adjacent to her, and connected with her in interest and feeling. Nor am I to be led away in the support of every specious project which may be supposed to tend to their aggrandizement, but which my reason tells me will operate injuriously upon the people.

Something of pride is felt in the idea that a State is numerous in its inhabitants, and great in power; but when we speak of physical force, the power to attack an enemy, or repel invasion, it is the power of the Union, not of a State, that is to be regarded, for it is that which stands us in stead; since, whatever may be our views at home of the respective rights of the State and the General Governments, in our relations with foreign nations we are but one people, and our power as against them is one. If political power be the object which fires the ambition or flatters the pride of our statesmen, how, when analyzed, does the power of the great States compare with that of the small? In the House of Representatives, and in the choice of President and Vice President, if that choice be made by the electoral colleges, man for man, the citizens of the great and small States are equal; but in this branch of the National Legislature, and in this repository of a responsible portion of executive power, the small States, as States, are in all things equal to the largest. Delaware, with a population of less than eighty thousand, is equal to New York with her two millions; and Missouri, with a little more than one hundred thousand, is represented on this floor alike with Ohio, which has tenfold her numbers. So, too, in the election of President of the United States, when that election devolves on the House of Representatives; or of Vice President, when it devolves on the Senate; the States are equal in power, however unequal in population. Numbers, therefore, are not a desideratum, so far as it relates to political power, but the reverse; the citizen of Missouri has, from the very circumstance of its smaller population, a much larger share of political power than the citizen of Ohio.

Then as to this invisible, intangible being, called a State: our new States are not to be especially benefited by transferring to them the population from the old States.

It is next important to inquire whether the present inhabitants of the new States will derive any important benefits from the transfer of population, which this amendment is intended to produce.

My own opinion has long been fixed in this; that, for all the purposes of social intercourse and neighborly quiet, the settlement in our fertile districts is rapid enough. When individuals emigrate from their homes, from the neighborhood and society in which they have been reared and nurtured, something of the moral and social bonds, which are among the safeguards of virtue and order, are severed. If a great number of individuals, unknown to each other, and of dissimilar habits and feeling, be then thrown suddenly together, its tendency is to form, for a time, a violent, disorderly, and immoral mass, until the elements have time to separate, the parts which have affinities to combine and unite with each other, and thus gradually give union and coherence to the whole. But when our settlements form themselves gradually, the evils of the change are less sensibly felt; the few individuals who are thrown together, impelled by mutual wants, unite at once in friendship and affection, and lay the foundation of a society whose basis is mutual good will; and each new emigrant, as he comes, falls in and forms a part of that society. For the peace and morals of the new emigrants, it is better that they should not be too rapidly and suddenly transferred to the Western lands. It is better, too, for the comforts of the emigrants, that this transfer be not too rapid; the few that go in advance depend on the other advanced settlements, for a time, for the comforts, and even the necessities of life; while they, in their turn, having become fixed, and with improvements about them, contribute their aid to sustain the still more recent adventurer who settles near, or pushes by into the wilds beyond them. It will be at once perceived that there are, thus, limits beyond which emigration cannot extend without discomfort and privation.

But sir, the agricultural States in the West would suffer more heavily in another respect from the new and increased impulse proposed to be given to emigration by a reduction of the price of public lands, if we suppose it to have the proposed effect of increasing emigration. The markets for all the vendible products of the West are on or near the sea-coast, extending from New Orleans to Boston; the whole extent of that country, whether, as in the South, it furnish sugar, cotton, or rice plantations, or, as in the North, the various manufactories with which they abound, their laborers consume our products and furnish our principal if not our only market. But if, by any means, we induce those laborers to migrate and settle on our fertile lands, do we not at once, by this very act, take away the market for our produce? Every family, which, by your bounties of land, you entice from the East to the West, takes one from the number of those who buy our staples, and adds one to the number of those who compete with us in their production. Thus, all that our statesmen have done, for years past, in building up a market for our farmers, would be at once swept away and destroyed by a single act of improvident legislation.

In the present state of our country, the inducements to agricultural pursuits are strong—too strong, perhaps, for the most perfect prosperity of an entire community, especially as they are obvious and direct, and its disadvantages and embarrassments are the indirect consequence of the very inducements themselves. So many engage in the occupation of farming, that the other employments essential in civilized communities are pursued by too few to answer the purposes necessary for the common good; all the handicraft arts, the coarser and heavier manufactures, essential in every civilized community, however simple and rustic their habits may be, are plied by too small a number of hands in our more recent settlements. Nothing can be more strongly illustrative of this than the statistical information given us by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. KING.] He has shown us that in Ohio, out of a population of more than nine hundred thousand souls, there were thirty-seven thousand persons paying taxes who were not freeholders. Hence he infers that there were that number of squatters on the public lands, poor and penniless, and without security for their homes. Nothing can be more wild and erroneous than this estimate. Why, sir, we are not savages there, nor is food alone all that is required to sustain us. We live in houses, and employ the mason and the carpenter to rear them. We wear hats, coats, and shoes, and we require the labor of the mechanic to provide them. But I will not enumerate; let any man reflect for a moment upon the necessities of the most simple community; and he will be surprised at the insufficiency of the number thus excepted from agricultural pursuits to supply their most pressing wants. I know it may be, in some measure, explained by the fact, that many of our artisans have their small freeholds, and mingle agricultural labor with their other employments. Still they must have their journeymen; and, if they are farmers, their laborers; so that, on the whole, the smallness of the number is almost incredible. If, however, it be accurate, (and from its official character it is entitled to credit,) it should induce us to beware that we make not the evil worse. Certain it is, that no direct or indirect bounties from the Government are necessary to induce our people to become cultivators of the soil. Supply them with a market for their produce, and my word for it, their productions will keep pace with every wish, however unbounded. No, sir, it is not necessary to legislate to make men become farmers; but to give those who are farmers the means of acquiring, by their industry, comfort and independence.

Before proceeding to note what I consider the last and greatest evil of the proposed reduction, I wish to offer a few words explanatory of my views of the extent to which these amendments go; how far they, in fact, reduce the price of lands; and in what manner their particular mode of reduction operates.

The amendments proposed by the Committee on Public Lands reduce the price of all lands at once to one dollar per acre, and all lands, when purchased by actual settlers, to fifty cents. The effect of this is at once a reduction of all the land to fifty cents per acre. For land, abundant as it is, the quantity held by the United States being inexhaustible for ages to come, can never, in our border countries, be purchased under this law for any purpose but immediate occupation. No man, who wishes to provide for his future family, will purchase lands at one dollar, when that lying all around him is sold to the actual occupant at half that price. The value, the current value of the article in market, to those who wish to use and occupy, will be the value at which public opinion will rate it, and no man who has money to lay out will go beyond that value; so that it would be equivalent to a general reduction to fifty cents per acre.

The consequence of this would be to take off universally from all real estate in the Western country to a like amount per acre, whether it belonged to the States, or to individuals; and whether it were improved or unimproved, it would all go down. As to the unimproved lands lying in the States of Ohio and Indiana, for instance, the lands granted by Congress to Ohio to aid in the construction of her great works of internal navigation, if Congress adopt this amendment, and it become a law, every acre is reduced at once from one dollar and twenty-five cents to fifty cents in value. Say that in Ohio we have five hundred thousand acres remaining unsold, it would in that single item sacrifice directly of this property of the State three hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars. Can I, as one of the Senators of Ohio, representing her in this body, commissioned to guard her rights, and watch over her interests, consent to this? No, sir, surely not, unless I could find in it some latent virtue which would compensate her or her citizens for this sacrifice. But, so far from this, it appears to me as a measure fraught with unmixed, unqualified mischief. Of the lands of the State of Ohio there are, I believe, about twenty-two millions of acres, the property of individuals; the value of this land is made up of the original cost, or rather the market price of wild lands of like quality, and the improvements put upon it by the labor of the husbandman. Now, sir, if you reduce the price of the immense amount of wild lands owned by the United States, you sink, with it, the value, of all the lands in a state of nature, in that section of the Union in like proportion. The unimproved value, therefore, of all the lands in Ohio, and all the States in which large quantities of public lands are situated, would sink from one dollar and twenty-five cents to fifty cents per acre, if this amendment should be carried and pass into a law; and the whole loss to the State of Ohio and her citizens, in the depreciation of real estate, would not be less than seventeen millions of dollars. Such, too, would be the case, in like proportion, in all the new States; and I must be permitted to say that, however soundly gentlemen may judge of the wishes and interests of their constituents, I can anticipate nothing but misfortune and loss to them all as the result of a such a measure.

It is said that land, if intended merely for cultivation, is equally useful to the farmer, whether its nominal value be great or small. This, sir, might, in some conditions of society, be the case; in ours it is not. It might be so, if all that was sought or desired by our people were subsistence merely—unconnected wholly with the idea of property. But it is important to the prosperity and improvement of a country that a farmer should hold his farm in estimation, that he should value it, be proud of it, and reckon his wealth by its worth. Satisfy him that it is of little or no intrinsic value; that other land, as good, may be had for nothing; his motive to labor on it, to improve and ornament it, is weakened, and the home of the husbandman becomes less desirable and less happy, as it is less cherished.

Men who have already exhausted their means and expended their labor in the purchase of lands from the United States, and in the improvement of those lands, have a right to claim that we shall not disturb or unsettle the price of the property which we have sold to them. Those who purchased yesterday at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, have they not cause to complain if to-morrow, before they enter on their lands, or cut the first stick for the construction of their cabins, we put down the price to all other purchasers to fifty cents; and thus, by a mere act of wantonness, deprive them of more than half of the value of their purchase? I cannot forbear adverting to a very sensible paragraph from an Indiana paper, which has accidentally fallen into my hands. It shows the opinion which practical men on the spot entertain on this subject. I will take the liberty of reading it to the Senate.

“PUBLIC LANDS.—A Question.—Should the price of the public lands be reduced? Before a farmer should answer this question, he should be prepared to answer another one, in close connexion with it. It is this: Should the price of improved lands—the price of farms—be reduced? Now it is evident, in common sense, and from past experience, that if the unimproved lands be reduced in price, the improved will fall in price also. We well recollect the time and the effect of the reduction in the price of lands several years ago, for we were in Salem at the time. The effect was truly oppressive. All the money that could be collected in masses sufficient was used in the purchase of new lands; many were anxious to sell improved farms, that they might buy anew; and hundreds of farmers who had purchased improved lands, and had made large payments on them, were compelled to make unreserved sacrifice, in order to extricate themselves from the difficulty into which the depreciation in the value of lands had cast them. It has been nine or ten years since, and improved farms in the neighborhood of Salem have not yet risen to their former price. We would say, that before the price should be reduced to accommodate any class of men, it would be better for all, rich and poor, that the Government give to each poor and actual settler a half-quarter or a quarter-section.

“A farmer may want a neighboring quarter to his reduced in price, so that he can purchase it; but would not a reduction of the value of the unimproved produce an equal if not a greater reduction in the price of his improved farm? This is the question.”

The amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi, it appears to me, involves all the unhappy consequences with those which I have already considered. It proposes that all the lands which have been in market ten years be reduced to one dollar per acre; those that have been in market fifteen years, to seventy-five cents; and twenty years, to fifty cents per acre, with a privilege to every actual settler to enter upon, and purchase, any quantity not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, at fifty cents per acre, provided he remain upon it and cultivate it for five consecutive years.

The graduation principle, as proposed, operates at once to reduce nearly forty millions of acres of land to one dollar, or below that sum, and at least fifteen millions of this to fifty cents per acre. Nor is this of the land which is now least valuable, and less in demand, than that which is just offered for sale. The land office in Zanesville is among the oldest in the United States. It has existed more than thirty years, and, during the last year, there was more land sold there, in proportion to the amount remaining, than in any new district in the United States. Why, then, should this land be reduced? It is worth what is asked for it, and brings the price readily; and it has become thus valuable, in consequence of the improvements of the country. To those improvements the United States, as a wise and liberal landholder, contributed her proportion, and in these enhanced sales is now reaping the benefit of her appropriations. The land, then, which would be thus reduced to a mere nominal sum in price, would be great in quantity, and for the most part equal in value to the best new land. Its reduction in price, on the principle proposed, would therefore have the full effect of universal reduction upon all the land of the United States, and, connected with the other provisions offered as an amendment by the Senator from Mississippi, could not fail, in fact, to amount to universal reduction to the last extent.

Suppose the new lands to be open to entry to actual settlers at fifty cents per acre, and then, by his scale of reduction, all the lands come down to fifty cents per acre to all purchasers, after they shall have been twenty years in market; would any land be entered at a higher rate? I will not detain the Senate to trace, in detail, the combined operation of these provisions; it must of itself be obvious that its effect would be to keep out of market for the twenty years all the lands not taken up by actual settlers; so that all would fall to the lowest scale of the graduated minimum—fifty cents per acre. The general operation of this reduction I have traced in my remarks on the amendment offered by the Committee on Public Lands. The effect of the preference to actual settlers, proposed in both amendments, I will now separately consider; and let me say, sir, in advance, that it seems to me fraught with almost incalculable evil.

It assumes the position (whether true or false I do not now stop to inquire) that the lands, generally, would retain their higher price—say one dollar and twenty-five cents, or one dollar per acre—according as we adopt one or the other of the proposed projects. Admit it to be so, and the price of the other lands remains as it now is, at one dollar and twenty-five cents; and what is its effect?

On the other portions of the Union it operates directly as a bounty for emigration; not incidental merely, but direct. The General Government says, by this law, to the inhabitants of the older States of the South or the East: Leave your native place—the land of your birth and the home of your fathers—go westward, and settle in the new States, and you shall receive in land a bounty worth one hundred and twenty dollars per man. To the hands employed in the forging of iron, and blowing and cutting of glass in Pennsylvania, and in the various manufactories of New Jersey and New England, you would present a like powerful appeal. To each of them, every operative who would abandon his employment and go westward, the bounty is tendered of one hundred and twenty dollars. Aye, and worse than all this is its effect on those who do emigrate. Its inevitable consequence is to break up the bonds of family and kindred, and set their members, separately and unseasonably, afloat in the general mass of society. If the aged father and the widowed mother should emigrate with their sons, and settle on the new lands in the boundless West, from the very nature of their situation requiring the support and relying upon the exertions of those sons to aid in the improvements of the farm, and bringing comforts to their home, you address them also, if this amendment be converted into law, and enlist their cupidity to engage in conflict with their affections. My good youths, would you say to them, leave the house of your parents, withdraw from their succor, and let them shift for themselves; here is a reward of one hundred and twenty dollars in land, which the Government offers to you, and each of you, if you will abandon the mother who bore, and the father who reared you. But mark ye well; go and settle on these lands; make no false pretences in this matter; you must do all this in fact and in faith, and carry it out to the uttermost; for if your hearts relent, if before five years you return to your parents, you forfeit the gift; and beware, too, that you do not remove your parents from their hut to yours, and attempt to watch over them and administer to their comforts there; for if you do, their lands are forfeited by such removal. Such, sir, is the effect of the attempt here made, and probably of any which can be devised, to give to the actual settler an advantage over the ordinary purchaser of public lands. It were a measure admirably devised to sever the closest and most sacred bonds of society, and give to avarice the ascendancy over affection. Of all the mischiefs proposed in all these amendments, this is the worst in its consequences, both political and moral.

Of all the things which pertain to man as a social being, and which bear the appellation of property, those which should least be tampered with by legislation are the landed property and the current coin; and I know not which brings the more weighty calamity on a people, the debasement of the circulating medium, or a general prostration of the value of real estate. So far as legislation can affect it, both should be held with a steady hand, leaving it to the progress of events to increase the quantity of the one, and enhance the value of the other. With respect to real estate, it is at this time of a safe and steady value, gradually increasing in price, and rising in the estimation of men; that estimation ought not to be destroyed or diminished by any act of ours. The value which the husbandman places on his soil forms a strong and enduring bond which binds him to his country. I have already shown you the tendency of these propositions to shake its value and destroy its influence.

But the care of the West—the prosperity of the West—the progress of the West in population and improvements, are constantly, in the mouths of gentlemen; and these amendments say, they propose the most certain means of effecting these objects.

Sir, I can yield to no one, from whatever region he may come, in attachment to that young and rising portion of our Union. I may err in my judgment of the measures which will be most effectual in advancing its prosperity, but no one can desire it more ardently than I do, or more ardently labor in all things, according to his best judgment, to promote it. But, with its present rising prospects, the constant and rapid development of its resources, there is little that the most devoted patriot could wish in its behalf, which the progress of events does not consummate, almost in anticipation. I look upon our West as I might look on the vigorous and athletic youth, with the bloom of health on his cheeks, his muscular limbs and expanding frame just ripening into manhood; though I would watch his progress with pleasing solicitude, administer freely to all his wants, and anticipate with delight the day that should make him in maturity all that he were now in promise; yet I would beware of administering to him the nostrums of each empiric who might propose to freshen his bloom, enlarge his frame, and hasten on his maturity.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 22.

THE FORCE BILL.

Mr. WILKINS moved to postpone the previous orders, for the purpose of taking up the bill further to provide for the collection of the duties on imports. He stated that it was his object to fix on a future day when this bill should be taken up for discussion.

Mr. POINDEXTER asked if it was in order to move the postponement. As the bill had not yet been read a second time, he presumed that it was not among the orders of the day.

The CHAIR considered the motion as in order.

Mr. CLAY expressed a hope that all objection would be withdrawn, the object of the chairman of the committee being merely to appoint a day for taking up the subject.

The bill was then read a second time.

Mr. WILKINS said he was desirous to fix on some future day for the consideration of this bill, and to make it the special order for that day. The committee had desired him to name Thursday next. He would, therefore, move to postpone the further consideration of the bill till Thursday next, and to make it the special order for that day.

Mr. BIBB thought that the day named was too early, as it would not allow gentlemen time for the necessary examination of the provisions of this important bill. He would, therefore, move to postpone the bill to Thursday week.

Mr. GRUNDY stated that the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary had been instructed to move Thursday next, not because it was supposed that there would be any decision as to the bill on that day, or even within a few days of that day, but in order that an early progress should be made in this bill, which he considered to be the most important measure before Congress, or which was likely to come before that body at this session. There was one consideration which ought to have great weight with the Senate. He did not intend, by a reference to it, to go into any remarks on the state of the country until the merits of the bill should be fairly before the Senate. But the 1st day of February was near; and, as that was the time fixed by South Carolina for her ordinance to go into operation, it was impossible to know what events were to follow that day. It was incumbent on the Senate to take up the bill, in order that, after its passage, if it should pass, there might be time to send it to the other House. He thought no person would have any cause to complain if Thursday were fixed on. The committee would occupy some time in explaining the reasons which induced them to report the bill, and he thought that every gentleman would have sufficient time for reflection and examination.

Mr. MANGUM said, as one of the Judiciary Committee, he had been opposed to so early a day. He concurred with the gentleman from Tennessee, that this was vastly the most important question which could be brought forward for discussion at this session. So important was it, that, in his opinion, it would shake the ancient character of our institutions to their very foundation. He concurred in the opinion that it ought to be taken up and acted on with the most profound deliberation; for it depended on the result of this question whether there would not be a revolution which would change the whole character of our institutions. In moving to postpone the consideration of the bill to a later day, as he should do before he resumed his seat, he would do it without reference to the 1st of February. It was impossible that there could be any definitive action on the bill by that time. He deprecated references, the only effect of which would be to keep up an excitement which it would be wiser to allay. He did not refer to the 1st of February because he believed that there existed any ground of apprehension. When he proposed a more distant day, it was solely with reference to the convenience of this branch of the Government, and of the other House, in order that they might have sufficient time for deliberation upon a subject which touched the very heart's core of our institutions. No one could look at this bill without discovering that it revived all the distinguishing characteristics of the old parties, besides taking in its sweep much, in his opinion, that was odious, and wholly unknown to either of the old parties. It carried out to their full extent the principles of one of those parties with alarming and startling addenda, and came in conflict against all the principles of the other. It touched the fundamental character of our institutions, and, on the discussion and decision which would ensue, he conscientiously believed—and he would be constrained so to declare, were they the last words he should ever utter—would materially depend the continuance of our admirable institutions in that wholesome but restricted vigor that would perpetuate a well-regulated liberty. He concluded with moving to postpone the bill till Monday week.

Mr. GRUNDY said he hoped the Senate would not concur in this motion. The gentleman on his right, [Mr. MAXWELL,] who was a member of the Judiciary Committee, had said that it would be at once discovered, on reading the bill, that we were about to change the whole character of our institutions. That was the opinion of this gentleman; and he had no doubt that by Thursday next he would be furnished with all the arguments he could adduce to sustain that opinion. But there were others who held wholly different opinions, and who believed that there was nothing in this bill which was not necessary to enable the Government to sustain itself from ruin. He would not go into any debate upon the bill at this time. Why should the bill be postponed to Monday week? There was no doubt that the day on which it was taken up would be consumed by the committee in giving their explanation of their reasons for reporting the bill; and then, if gentlemen should not be ready to proceed with the subject, the discussion could be postponed.

He would make a frank acknowledgment of his own feelings. He hoped his fears were unfounded, but he had fears as to the issue of the proceedings in South Carolina; and if any thing disastrous should occur after the 1st of February, he desired to stand acquitted of having contributed any share in the production of such evils by having given his sanction to delay. As far as one vote would go, he would, at least, endeavor to prevent any collision.

Mr. MILLER, after some remarks, inaudible in the gallery, said that he did not perceive how the measures proposed by the Senator from Tennessee were to be accomplished by the passage of the bill under consideration. The 1st of February, he said, had been referred to by that Senator as a day likely to produce much evil to the country, and it had been consequently urged that this bill, or something similar to it in substance, was necessary to prevent it. But (said Mr. M.) the 1st of February will be here before that bill can possibly pass; and if the Senator from Tennessee is disposed, as he alleges, for conciliation, he can easily avoid the evils he so much deprecates, by a repeal or a modification of the tariff laws. Sir, (said Mr. M.) any modification will be, ipso facto, a repeal of the ordinance of South Carolina, and the acts of her Legislature passed in consequence of it, and require new proceedings on the part of the State. The Senator from Tennessee apprehends (continued Mr. M.) some ideal dangers on the day mentioned; and how does he propose to avoid them? Why, by putting at the disposal of the Executive the whole physical force of the United States—not for the purpose of putting down any unlawful acts of the people, but for the purpose of putting down the rightful act of a sovereign and independent member of the confederacy. This, sir, (said Mr. M.) is to be the grand panacea by which the gentleman from Tennessee proposes to cure the evils he so much apprehends on the 1st of February next. And what were they? There was nothing in South Carolina that had not occurred in many other instances in other parts of the Union. There had been nothing done by South Carolina that he or any other individual had not a right to do. South Carolina had said that the tariff laws were unconstitutional, and that she would not obey them. I (said Mr. M.) have a right to do the same, when I believe a law to be subversive of my rights, and in violation of the constitution. And will gentlemen, (said he,) in this last case, vote for a bill to arm the President with the whole force of the country to make war upon me? If I deny the action of the Government, according to my construction of the constitution, and take my gun in hand, or my battle-axe, and defy the officers of the United States, I do so at my own peril. It will be for the civil authority, not the military, to decide the question. South Carolina has, as yet, not done that much; and yet gentlemen, in anticipation of such an event, are about to make war upon her. Let the gentleman from Tennessee procure a repeal or modification of the tariff laws, and that will do more to cure the evil he dreads than the panacea he so highly recommends. Mr. M. said he did not rise to enter into the merits of the bill before the Senate, but to express his utter astonishment that the Senator from Tennessee should suppose that this bill could accomplish the object he had in view. He was not then prepared to say how far South Carolina would be satisfied by a modification of the tariff; that was not the subject under discussion; but this much he would say, that the measure proposed by the Judiciary Committee, and commended by the Senator from Tennessee, could be productive of no good. He had always understood that the constitution placed the civil above the military power. Pass this bill, sir, (said Mr. M.) authorizing the President, if he cannot act by the ordinary tribunals, to act with an armed force, and you at once put the military above the civil power. This, then, is the way, in the opinion of the Senator from Tennessee, to obviate the difficulties by which we are threatened. Sir, (said Mr. M.) the only way is to abate the nuisance—to repeal the unjust and unconstitutional legislation by which we are oppressed; and this will supersede any use of State authority.

There was one thing, Mr. M. said, he would advert to while he was up. He had seen, among the documents accompanying the President's message, one that was described as a test oath act. He was surprised at this, as he knew that no act bearing that title had been passed by the Legislature of South Carolina, and he was gratified to see, among the papers in the message to-day, an authentic copy of the act referred to, whose title is different from that described in the former message, and forms a part of the documents printed therewith. What the character of that act was might be seen from the certified copy now on the files of the Senate. It was this:

The people of South Carolina, in their highest sovereign character, had passed an ordinance declaring that every officer of the State shall swear to respect her constitution and laws; and the act referred to was passed in pursuance of the high authority thus given. In no case

The Force Bill.

[SENATE.]

(said Mr. M.) could it be considered a test oath act. It was not intended for every citizen of the State, but for those citizens who held offices under it. The State simply required all the agents in her pay to take an oath to support her laws; and, sir, (said Mr. M.) if they have not a right to pass a law to make their own officers and agents obey them, I would not give a brass farthing for State rights. This, sir, (said Mr. M.) is the nature of the act, and yet it is called by the President a test oath act. Was this oath more a test than that taken by every Senator at the Secretary's table? or essentially different from that taken by the officers of the Government? We swear to support the constitution of the United States, and yet this is not considered a test oath. What course (asked Mr. M.) does the General Government pursue, when its officers refuse or neglect to obey its mandates? The moment (said Mr. M.) that a United States' officer refuses to obey the will of the Executive, he is dismissed from office without ceremony, with or without having taken an oath. There was no proscription (Mr. M. added) in the act of South Carolina. The ordinance (continued Mr. M.) was passed by the people of the State in their highest sovereign capacity, was a part of the constitution of the State, and every man when he takes office under the State is rightfully required to swear that he will support her constitution; and when the ordinance itself came before the Senate, Mr. M. said he would be prepared to show that the oath to support it did not conflict with the obligation to support the constitution of the United States. There was, however, one part of the ordinance which might be supposed to conflict with the constitution of the United States. It is that which denies the right of the federal court to review the decisions of the State court. The ordinance, however, in this only was intended to operate on the State officers, and did not command resistance by force to the decrees and proceedings of the federal court; it was passive—the agents of the State were simply required not to act. But (said Mr. M.) it will be recollected that the 25th section of the judiciary act, which gives this right to review, was believed by many of the best informed, and, if he mistook not, by the President himself, to be unconstitutional, and therefore null and void.

Mr. M. further said, that when the ordinance of South Carolina came before the Senate, he would not only be prepared to show that it was not contrary to the constitution of the United States, but that it was not contrary, as alleged, to the constitution of South Carolina. It was absurd, he said, to pretend that the ordinance conflicted with the constitution of South Carolina. It was framed by the people of the State, in convention—in their highest sovereign capacity—and consequently a part of the constitution itself, and a repeal of all parts conflicting with its provisions.

With these preliminary remarks, called forth by gentlemen who had preceded him in debate, and without pretending to enter into the merits of the bill, he would content himself by stating that he would vote for the longest day named. He was in favor of harmonizing the country. He was not for secession, nor was he for disunion. When Congress should declare war against South Carolina, and should put it in the power of the President to assail her with the military and naval forces of the United States, it would then be the height of absurdity to talk of secession as a constitutional right. Secession would then be revolutionary in its nature, and would be forced on the State by the war carried on against her. The secession in the ordinance was predicated on the Federal Government disregarding its peaceful obligations to South Carolina.

Mr. M. continued: If the object was to avoid the danger to the Union apprehended by the Senator from Tennessee, it could not be accomplished by the passage of the bill before the Senate. But, he said, if by Monday week, the day named by the Senator from North Carolina, a bill for the modification of the tariff should be reported in the Senate, or the bill now discussed in the House of Representatives should come from that body, it will then be time enough to say whether this bill should pass. And in either case, he would ask the Senator from Tennessee if the Senate would think it necessary to pass a bill of the nature now before them?

[The PRESIDENT here reminded Mr. MILLER that it was not in order, on a mere motion for postponement, to discuss the merits of the bill.]

Mr. M. continued, that it was not his intention to discuss the bill, or its general principles. His object was only to delay action on the bill, until it could be seen whether there was a probability of the passage of a bill in modification of the tariff. By Monday week, he presumed the other House might be heard from, and it was possible that something might emanate from the Committee of Finance in this body. But (said Mr. M.) if the Senate will only now pass a resolution declaring that the tariff shall not be modified, I will at once agree to proceed to the consideration of the bill. If delayed, something may occur of a more peaceful character than that contemplated by the Committee on the Judiciary; but (added Mr. M.) if the pacification of the Senator from Tennessee is to be the only relief extended to the people of South Carolina, I can only say, Lord deliver me from such relief.

Mr. CLAY said he did not rise to go into the discussion of this question. He considered the suggestion of the Chair as to the unprofitableness of such a course, as entirely correct. And without casting censure on any Senator for pursuing such a course as he might deem fit, he was not disposed himself to go into such debate. The question before the Senate was merely to fix a day for the consideration of this bill; and on a question so trivial in itself, he regretted that there should be any exhibition of feeling. He thought that the time ought to be fixed, without reference to the 1st of February, or to any other day.

Certainly the action of this Government ought not to be retarded or quickened by any consideration of what might occur on that day. The only inquiry ought to be, what day would be most convenient in reference to the state of the public business? Although this was a highly important measure, no more time would be required than would be necessary to give it due consideration. He should, therefore, be disposed to fix a day which would not interfere with the business of the Senate, or which would be too late for their final action. He thought Thursday next was too short an interval, and that the other day was too remote. He was in favor of investing the authorities of the Federal Government with adequate powers to meet the present crisis. Yet, although he was in favor of this, he was not to be urged on by any circumstances, however imperative, to give his approbation to so important a measure, without the most careful investigation, in order that, while giving all constitutional aids to the Government, he did not invest them with any unconstitutional powers. He would, therefore, propose Monday next, considering that in the interval there would be time enough for full examination of the bill.

Mr. SMITH said he did not rise to go into the debate at all. He concurred with the Senator from Kentucky, that Monday next would be the proper day. By that time the Senate would get rid of the land bill; while, if the subject was brought up on Thursday, it was very likely that the other bill would be undisposed of.

Mr. BIBB said he was not disposed to go into an examination of the principles of the bill, upon the question for fixing the day; but he might be allowed to say, that he considered this bill as involving a return to first principles

The Force Bill.

—to the principles which influenced when we ourselves stood in the attitude of rebellious revolters against the British Government. He thought there was no man who would hesitate to invest the Government with powers sufficient for the preservation of the Union; but, when a bill was reported such as this, which gave a new action to the Government by means of the whole military and naval power to be wielded at the discretion of the President, he thought it would become Senators to pause and reflect. They ought to require time to look into a subject which made such great requisition upon their learning and research.

Thus much he had said to justify himself for moving a more distant day than Thursday next. But he had another reason for wishing delay. It was his desire to put off this discussion as long as possible. These were not the best of times for the consideration and discussion of principles of such an agitating character. Events might happen, in the course of a short time, which would render this subject less exciting. He was disposed now to adopt the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina. He wished to come to the discussion of this subject with as much reflection and solemn deliberation as he could bring with him into the debate. He thought the gentleman from Tennessee ought not, because of the occurrence of a particular emergency, to urge on to premature discussion a measure which might become part of the permanent policy of the country. He hoped that when the time for the discussion should arrive, Congress would be disposed to go into it in the spirit of conciliation and forbearance.

Mr. POINDEXTER next addressed the Chair. He said that his object in rising was, to ask that the question on the postponement of the consideration of the bill to Monday week might be taken by ayes and noes; but, while up, he said he would avail himself of the opportunity to offer some of the views which he had taken of the provisions of the bill, not for the purpose of entering into the general discussion of questions so momentous, but as justifying his vote in favor of the motion made by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MANLY.] He concurred in the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] that in fixing a day for the consideration of the bill, no particular examination of its details was either proper or necessary; but it was important to look the great principles which it embraced full in the face, and to afford ample time to investigate them maturely, before the measure was called up for the final action of the Senate. He considered the bill as one of a permanent and general character, co-extensive with the Union; aiming a deadly blow at the free institutions under which we live, and not as limited, according to its obvious intention, to the attitude assumed by South Carolina, in reference to the existing system of protection to domestic manufactures. Mr. President, said he, if the title of this bill corresponded with its provisions, it might, with equal justice and propriety, be called "A bill to repeal the constitution of the United States, and to vest in the President despotic powers." Such is its spirit, and such the import of the words used to carry out the purposes intended by its enactment. No measure had ever been presented to the consideration of Congress, from the close of the revolution to the present moment, so virtually destructive of public liberty, or so palpably conflicting with the plain and positive provisions of the constitution.

The first section of the bill clothed the President with the extraordinary and dangerous power of controlling, by the exercise of his own judgment, and at his mere will and pleasure, the liberty of speech and of the press, and the right of the people peaceably to assemble to deliberate on the condition of the country, and petition for a redress of grievances—rights secured by the very letter of the constitution, and inestimable to freemen.

At the head of the amendments proposed by the States, at the adoption of the federal constitution, and which now form a component part of that instrument, is an article, which declares that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." Sir, compare the checks interposed in this section to the encroachments of arbitrary power with the language of this bill: "Whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, or unlawful threats and menaces against officers of the United States, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President, to execute the revenue laws," &c.—then he is authorized to remove the custom-house to a secure place, and execute all the high duties and prerogatives with which the bill proposes to invest him. What shall constitute "unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons" is not defined; even a threat or a menace, consisting of mere words, is rendered criminal; and it is left exclusively to the judgment of the President to determine for himself what is the character and intention of "assemblages of persons," what words amount to a threat or a menace, and what is his own interpretation of these words or expressions, "to call forth the military force of the country," to enable him to carry into effect this new system of pains and penalties. May it not happen that an "assemblage of persons" for the most innocent and necessary purposes, in a particular quarter of the Union, will be construed into an unlawful combination, to obstruct the execution of the revenue laws, and, in the judgment of the President, authorize the employment of the army to disperse it? Do the people of the several States hold their constitutional privileges by a tenure so feeble and so uncertain; as the will, the mere caprice, of the Chief Magistrate? Sir, let us throw off the mask at once; enact the riot act of Great Britain; put it into the hands of one of the myrmidons of the President to be read aloud at every assemblage of persons which, in the "judgment" of the President, is unlawful; warn the multitude to disperse, and go peaceably to their homes; and, in case they refuse to obey, call out an armed force, and bring them to submission. This is substantially the power which it is now proposed to confer on the President as the basis of all the other high prerogatives enumerated in the bill on our table. But this is not the most extravagant feature in this novel and unprecedented transfer of arbitrary power in the executive branch of the Government. An assemblage of people dare not denounce an unjust, oppressive, and unconstitutional act of Congress, imposing burdens on them by an onerous system of imposts, in the presence of an officer of the United States, without being liable to have their words interpreted to mean a threat or menace against the officer, and thereby subject themselves to be dealt with as the "judgment" of the President shall decide under the provisions of this bill. The same consequences might result from the publication of a paragraph in a newspaper, denouncing an unconstitutional act of Congress, and complaining of the manner in which it is executed by an officer of the United States; this, too, might, in the judgment of the President, be a threat or menace calling for his interposition. Sir, the idea cannot be credited, that the free citizens of this confederacy will submit to these shackles on their dearest privileges, in contravention of the compact of union which secures them. It is an encroachment upon personal liberty not to be endured, and amounts almost in terms to a repeal of the constitution, which secures to every man the freedom of speech, and guards from invasion the liberty of the press, and the right of the people peaceably to assemble and declare their opinions of public men and measures. All these solemn guarantees are now to be placed in the custody of one man, and to be regulated according to his "judgment."

Mr. P. then adverted to the second section of the bill. He said it was not his intention, at present, to enter minutely into an examination of this scheme to prostrate the sovereignty of the States, and vest the President with extraordinary powers; but he claimed the indulgence of the Senate while he glanced at a part of the bill which conflicted with an express provision of the constitution. He then read from the third article of the constitution, to show the limitations on the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States. Among other defined cases, it is declared that it shall extend "to controversies between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States," &c. It cannot be denied that these courts possess no jurisdiction which is not expressly conferred on them by the constitution. They are not courts of general jurisdiction; they have no common law powers; and can only resort to that code to illustrate the powers especially granted in the article of the constitution referred to. This bill enlarges the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, and extends it to controversies between citizens of the same State. The provision is written in language not to be misunderstood or misconstrued: "If any person shall receive any injuries to his person or property, for or on account of any act by them done under any law of the United States for the protection of the revenue, or the collection of duties on imports, he shall be entitled to maintain suit for damage therefor in the circuit court of the United States, or the district wherein the party doing the injury may reside, or shall be found." It is manifest that this provision transcends the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and is, to that extent, a repeal of the constitution. An officer of the customs at the port of Boston receives a supposed injury from a citizen of Massachusetts while in the discharge of his official duties, both being citizens resident in the same State—will any man, having the least respect for his character as a statesman, hazard the opinion that the circuit court of the United States for the district where the injury was done can take cognizance of civil action between the parties for the recovery of damages? No, sir, there is not a respectable planter in any part of the Union who would venture to justify a departure so gross and palpable from the plain letter of the constitution. But we have arrived at a crisis in the progress of this Government, when the tide of popular impulse sets in the direction of power and patronage, and the barriers of the constitution no longer afford protection to the States or to the people against the overwhelming influence of the Executive and the dominant party in the National Legislature. Pass this bill, and the very idea of State sovereignty will be treated as a vision of the imagination—a tale of by-gone days, no longer to be remembered, but to be spurned and blotted out of our political history forever. Mr. President, (said Mr. P.,) when we turn our attention to the recent state papers under the signature of the Chief Magistrate, of the principles contained in which this bill is the consummation, the friends of constitutional liberty have abundant cause of alarm and apprehension. The alternative is presented to us, in a manner not to be blinked, between our original beautiful system of confederacy composed of separate independent sovereignties, united for the great purposes of common defence and general welfare, under defined and specified powers, and a vast consolidated empire, with its despot to rule and direct its destinies.

In such a contest there can be no neutrals: he who is not for us is against us; there is not one inch of neutral ground on which the friends of State rights can stand; none can wink so hard as not to see that upon the issue of this struggle must depend the fate of this free and enviable confederacy. Shall the States retain the rights reserved to them by the patriots who framed the constitution? or shall we throw our liberties at the feet of a military despot, clothed with unlimited powers throughout this widely-extended country, backed by the army and navy, ready at the sound of the bugle to rally around their chieftain and execute his mandates? To enable each honorable Senator to deliberate well on the important questions involved in the passage of this bill, and to recur to our political history from the close of the revolution up to the present time, in order to demonstrate the true character of this Government by a review of the meaning and intention of its founders, I shall vote to postpone the consideration of this subject to the longest time proposed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said that, as a member of the committee, he felt constrained to defend the provisions of the bill against the very serious charges that had assailed it. Gentlemen had gravely affirmed that "this bill repealed the constitution, and conferred the powers of a despot on the President." So far from all this, it only enabled the Executive to discharge the sacred obligations which the constitution imposes upon him, when it ordains that he "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." The President has applied to us for legislative aid, that he may the more certainly fulfil his high trust. This, sir, is a great duty for him and for us that cannot be dispensed with or avoided: it flows directly from our oaths to support the constitution of the United States. Mr. F. said that the dangers of the bill had been quite misapprehended by honorable Senators. The first section had been construed into the most dangerous power in the Executive alone, of deciding when combinations existed; what were riots, and what constituted menaces; whereas, by the plain terms of the law he is authorized to interpose, when from these specified causes it shall become, in his judgment, impracticable to collect the revenues of the Government. Now, sir, it will be readily perceived that this clause confers no novel or extraordinary powers. He is not to judge of combinations, unlawful assemblages, and other hostile arrays, any further than they interrupt the course of public laws: and when he is the officer bound to the duty of executing these laws, who else should have the power of vindicating their claims, and securing for them a prompt obedience?

It was further insisted by Mr. F. that the bill, with the single and harmless provision that authorized a removal of the custom-house, contained no principle that was not familiar to the legislation of Congress. Such powers as it gave to the President were conferred by our laws as early as 1795, and as lately as 1807. There was no odious or despotic feature in the measures reported by the committee. If they, as was said, made the Executive a despot, the constitution of the Union created the despotism. Sir, shall the majesty and supremacy of the laws be maintained? And how shall this be done if they may be defied, or put down by force or menace?

The bill proposes the employment of pacific measures, so long as opposition shall present a peaceful character: as in the case of South Carolina, while her ordinance and laws resist the legislation of the Union by judicial action merely, the bill meets them with the counteracting agency of the federal courts. She would draw the questions of collision to her own courts, that are sworn to nullify our laws. The bill provides that the laws of the United States shall be expounded and enforced by the courts of the United States. And when she resorts to military force, when insurrectionary movements there shall attempt to prostrate the Government of the country, and defy the judgments of its courts, then, and not until then, is the Executive to put into requisition the strong arm of military power, to defend and maintain them in their dignity and energy. And, sir, is not this all right? Is it not absolutely necessary? How otherwise can we preserve a Government? In a word, Mr. President, the bill is a necessary and salutary measure, demanded by the exigencies of the country. The Executive has declared his intention to maintain, as he shall be able, the integrity of the Union; and (said Mr. F.) for such a purpose I am prepared to sustain him.

Mr. BROWN rose, not with the intention of offering any views as to the merits of the bill which had been reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, as it would be anticipating a discussion which would more properly arise at another stage of the question. His object was merely to explain the reasons which would influence the vote he was about to give, in order that any misinterpretation of the motives which induced it might be prevented.

He should vote against the motion proposing Monday week for the consideration of the bill, because its postponement until that period would most probably defeat the great object which all, no doubt, had in view—to give to it that fair and deliberate examination which a measure of great and acknowledged importance demanded. He had most earnestly hoped that the exciting subjects which connected themselves with this question would not have mingled themselves with the deliberations of Congress on other great questions at the present session; but it could not be disguised that the question had now assumed a shape and character which left them no alternative but to meet it, and act on it. He concurred in the views expressed by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] as to the proper time for the consideration of the bill, and thought that Monday next would be the most appropriate time. The sentiments expressed by that gentleman, he must be permitted to say, were liberal, and he trusted he saw in them a spirit and temper which augured well for the adjustment of the difficulties which now menace the country. He entirely agreed with him, that the day proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILKINS] was too early, and that no reference ought to be had, in our decisions upon this question, to the 1st of February, when the ordinance of South Carolina is to go into effect. Why proceed with such a precipitate and indecent haste to the decision of a question, the great importance of which invokes our most calm and mature deliberation?

Before he took his seat, he would take occasion to remark, that when this question came up for consideration, while he would yield to none in a high and profound reverence for the Union of the States, he should most probably differ from some of those who felt an equal attachment to it, as to the modus operandi by which it was to be preserved. He would not be unmindful of the character of our form of Government; and one of its most distinguishing features was, that of a confederated republic. Mr. B. said he would content himself with this general remark, as any discussion of the particular features of the bill would be, at this time, premature.

Mr. MANGUM then rose to correct an impression which seemed to be on the mind of the Senator from New Jersey, that this measure had met with the unanimous approbation of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BENTON rose to a point of order. It was not in order to refer to matters which passed in another body.

Mr. MANGUM apologized to the Senate for the irregularity into which he had been led by the momentous character of the subject; but he appealed to every member of the committee whether he had not designated the bill as abominable.

Mr. WILKINS said he had only complied with the instructions of the committee in naming Thursday next. It had not been his wish to name too early a day, and he would willingly agree to take up the subject on Monday next. But he wished to suggest one or two considerations which had induced the committee to name so early a day. It had been admitted on all hands that a solemn crisis was about to arrive. He did consider it a solemn crisis; but he would not go so far as the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had gone the other day, when he had said it was more solemn and important than that of the Declaration of Independence. All have agreed that on the first of next month, this solemn epoch will arrive. The ordinance of the State of South Carolina—the test law—that unprecedented law called the replevin act—and the law for the protection of the citizens of South Carolina—all looking to one object—all go into operation on that day. He had said all these pointed to one object. To what object did they point? The answer was simple. To nullification of existing laws—to violent resistance to the United States.

Mr. CALHOUN rose, and said he could not sit silent and permit such erroneous constructions to go forth. South Carolina had never contemplated violent resistance to the laws of the United States.

Mr. WILKINS said he was at a loss to understand how any man could read the various acts of the State of South Carolina, and not say that they must lead—necessarily lead—in their consequences to violent measures. There had been no indication on the part of South Carolina of any disposition to retrace her steps.

Up to the last moment the President had been governed by the hope that she would have been convinced of the error of her course, and have exhibited some juster conceptions of her obligations to the confederacy of which she was a member. No such disposition had been evinced. What did the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MIXER] mean when he said that all difficulties would be obviated if Congress should only pass this tariff law? What was to be the alternative? If no such law was passed between this and the 1st of February? What, he repeated, was to be the alternative? Why, the tariff law was to be resisted and overturned in South Carolina. And was not this to be considered violent resistance to the laws? They who had framed this bill believed it to be, in every one of its provisions, strictly defensive. Every provision was defensive in its character, and intended to meet the particular crisis. There was not, on the face of the bill, one important provision introduced which was not to be found on reference to the statute book. Indeed, the present was not so strong a bill as Congress, under peculiar circumstances, had passed before.

The Judiciary Committee, in framing it, had been particularly anxious not to introduce any novel principle—any which could not be found on the statute book. The only novel one which the bill presented was one of a very simple nature. It was that which authorized the President, under the particular circumstances which were specified in the bill, to remove the custom-house. This was the only novel principle, and care was taken that in providing for such removal no authority was given to use force.

The committee were apprehensive that some collision might take place after the 1st of February, either between the conflicting parties of the citizens of South Carolina, or between the officers of the Federal Government and the citizens. And to remove, as far as possible, all chance of such collision, provision was made that the collector might, at the moment of imminent danger, remove the custom-house to a place of security; or, to use a plain phrase, put it out of harm's way. He admitted the importance of this bill; but he viewed its importance as arising not out of the provisions of the bill itself, but out of the state of affairs in South Carolina, to which the bill had reference. In this view, it was of paramount importance.

It had become necessary to legislate on this subject; whether it was necessary to pass the bill or not, he would not say; but legislation, in reference to South Carolina, previous to the 1st of February, had become necessary. Something must be done; and it behooves the Government to adopt every measure of precaution, to prevent those awful consequences which all must foresee as necessarily resulting from the position which South Carolina has thought proper to assume. He had no objection to make the bill the special order for Monday next, but he hoped no day more distant than that would be fixed on.

Mr. MILLER said, that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILKINS] had asked him "what was to be the alternative in case the tariff bill now pending should not pass?" He was not authorized to reply to this question for the State of South Carolina. But he would tell the Senator that, in his opinion, Congress might obviate the existing difficulty by passing a bill to decrease the tariff duties. The passage of even an initiating bill would obviate the difficulty, as the convention of South Carolina must be called again to meet the new contingency. He was not prepared to say what kind of a bill would satisfy South Carolina, but a new bill, whatever its character, would have the effect of annulling the ordinance. The actual state of South Carolina was this: By virtue of her reserved rights, she was about to throw off judiciously and peaceably a burden which had been cast upon her by the United States. Standing on their own soil, the people of South Carolina were about to rid themselves of an incubus to which they had been subjected. He would not go into a statement of the operation of this process through all its various ramifications; but, he contended, that gentlemen could not see, in the ordinance, or in the laws of South Carolina, any evidence to sustain the apprehensions of a violent resistance to the laws. It was a mere phantom of an excited imagination which had produced the great alarm that seemed to exist.

The Senator from Pennsylvania had said that South Carolina did not retrace her steps, when she was particularly invited to do so by the President. He (Mr. M.) did not now intend to say whether South Carolina was right or wrong in the course she had taken. But that State had thought that the President had no right to issue the proclamation which had come from him. The citizens of that State had thought that, under no construction of constitutional right, could they be deprived of the right to assemble in their own State, for the purpose of amending their own organic law; and that, when they did, they were to be put down by a proclamation of the President of the United States. The people of that State believed that, in issuing this proclamation, the President had himself been guilty of an unconstitutional and unauthorized act. When the Senator from Pennsylvania could show that it was the duty of the citizens of South Carolina to refrain from the exercise of their constitutional rights, in deference to the President of the United States, it would be time enough to answer the charge he had made against the State for not retracing her steps.

The President had, in his opening message at the commencement of the present session, recommended a modification and reduction of the tariff duties. South Carolina was ready to afford to the friends of the President the longest possible time to act on this recommendation; and for this purpose he should vote to postpone this bill to the most remote day. He challenged those who rallied round the President to come on, and to show why it was that they now wished to hurry the discussion of the bill. The President had said that the tariff ought to be repealed. Let Congress modify or repeal the tariff by 12 o'clock on the night of the 3d of March, and he would underwrite the State of South Carolina, that not an act of violence would take place, not a drop of blood would be shed. He would, therefore, throw the responsibility of any contingent violence on the gentlemen who were the reputed friends of the President. It was very well known that, at the last session, when this subject was disposed of, he had himself stated on this floor every principle which was contained in the ordinance of South Carolina. He had declared that the act of the last session was unconstitutional, and that the South would not be satisfied with it. From the indications around him he was at a loss to decide whether he had been right or wrong.

The Senator from Pennsylvania had said that there was no novel feature in this bill, except that which authorized the President to establish floating custom-houses. The bill provided that in case of any unlawful assemblage, that is, that if some half dozen sailors were to assemble together, and thus give color to the idea of an unlawful assemblage, and if this were to be near the custom-house, the President, having no greater love for South Carolina than he had for any northern State, might have resort to force. Another exceptionable provision in the bill was that which gave the power to the officer to keep possession of the goods which he may have taken, until the amount of the duties should be paid down in hard dollars. The State of South Carolina and the United States stood in relation to each other as two travellers who may have encountered each other on a hedge. If both would agree to keep the right, they might pass easily; but if they would come in opposition, the stronger would pass over the weaker. Now, the Committee on the Judiciary had given to the President power, whenever his collectors, his agents, or his minions asked, to call out the whole military force, to ride rough-shod over the liberties of the people. If the Senator from Pennsylvania wished to give an opportunity to Congress to pass any act which would have the effect of conciliating South Carolina, why did he object to the most remote day which was named?

Mr. KING regretted to see that gentlemen appeared anxious to rush into a debate on the subject at this time. For himself, he was prepared to give the question all the consideration which it demanded. It was one of vital importance. He was ready to give the National Government of the country, and the President who presides over it, such power as would be necessary to uphold and enforce the laws; but, at the same time, he was disposed to withhold his vote for any proposition which, in his judgment, interfered with the rights of the States or those of the people, or which would place in the hands of the President power which the constitution never intended. He was not prepared to say whether the bill went to that extent, and therefore wished to have time to make up his mind. He had, however, hoped that action elsewhere would have calmed the disquietude of the South, and that a returning sense of justice on the part of those who had forced the protective system on the country, would have prevented the necessity of clothing the President with the extraordinary power conferred by this bill. He feared, however, that there was now but little hope, either from the other House or from this, in reference to this matter. The discussion on this question, therefore, must come—it seemed perfectly clear that that must be the case.

He considered that the subject ought not to be postponed to so distant a day as would defeat any action on the subject. We owed it to ourselves, to the country, to the administration, to give the matter a proper, a fair examination, and by the yeas and nays to decide the question. He rose principally to say he should vote against the postponement to Monday week, because he believed that gentlemen could come to the discussion as well prepared in a shorter period as they would by deferring the subject to a longer time. If he could believe that any events would occur to render this discussion unnecessary, he would be willing to put it off for a month to give time for such events to interpose; but he believed that no delay would be long enough to prevent it altogether. He should vote against the motion for Monday week, and most assuredly against the proposition for Thursday, as being altogether too short a postponement. We should, by fixing on the earliest day, be precipitated into the subject, and go into a discussion before a single document could be examined. He was astonished when the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILKINS] made his proposition. He should give his vote for the proposition made by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY:] for by that time the Senate would, in all probability, be prepared to enter upon the subject.

The question on the longest day being first in order, was taken and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Poindexter, Rives, Tyler.—9.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Benton, Brown, Buckner, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Holmes, Johnson, Kane, King, Knight, Naudain, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Waggaman, White, Wilkins, Wright.—37.

So the motion was negatived.

Mr. WILKINS then withdrew his motion for Thursday.

The motion made by Mr. CLAY was then agreed to.

So the bill was postponed till Monday next, and made the special order for that day.

POWERS OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. CALHOUN then rose and said, that not agreeing with the chairman of the Judiciary Committee that the measures proposed in the bill were of an ordinary character, and such as were sustained by precedents, but, on the contrary, fully according in the declaration of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. POINDEXTER] that it would, in fact, be a repeal of the constitution should it receive the sanction of Congress, he had risen to offer three resolutions, with a view of testing the principles on which the bill rested.

He had drawn them with great care—with a scrupulous regard to the truth of every assertion they contain, which, he believed, no one who valued his character for candor could contradict, and that no impartial jury in christendom could, on an issue, refuse to render a verdict in their favor; and he had been equally scrupulous in making no deductions but what were sustained by the clearest and most demonstrative reasoning.

Mr. C. said that, though the bill was couched in general terms, and made applicable to all the States; and though it referred, apparently, on its face, to cases only of insurrection, or lawless resistance of individual force, yet it would not be denied that it was intended to be applied particularly to the case of South Carolina, and with the intention not of putting down the lawless combinations of individuals in that State, but the authorized opposition of the people of South Carolina to an act which they conscientiously believed unconstitutional and oppressive, and, as such, exercising the right which belongs to her in the last resort, as a sovereign member of the confederacy, she has declared to be null and void. Whatever resistance, then, may be made in the State of South Carolina is a resistance by the State itself, authorized by her sovereign authority, and not the resistance of a lawless combination of individuals. It is to put down this resistance that the measure now before the Senate has been reported, and in this character it is wholly unprecedented; there is no example of the kind to be found on our statute book.

Here, then, (said Mr. C.,) is presented the great—he would say the awfully important question—has Congress the right to pass this bill? There are two views of our constitution, going back to its fundamental principles; one contained in the proclamation and the message of the President, which have given birth to the bill, and the other the ordinance and proceedings of the people of South Carolina. As the one or the other of these views may be correct, the bill must be pronounced to be constitutional or unconstitutional. If it be true, as stated by the President, that the people of these United States are united on the principle of a social compact, as so many individuals constituting one nation; if they have transferred to the General Government their allegiance; if they have parted with the right of judging, in the last resort, what powers are reserved and what delegated; then, indeed, the States are without sovereignty, without rights; and no other objection can be made to the bill but what might be made to its expediency. But if, on the other hand, these positions are utterly false; if, in truth, the constitution is the work of the people forming twenty-four distinct political communities; if, when adopted, it formed a union of States, and not of individuals; if the States have not surrendered the right of judging in the last resort, as to the extent of the reserved, and, of course, of the delegated powers; then, indeed, there is not a shadow of foundation in the constitution to authorize the bill; but, on the contrary, it would be wholly repugnant to its genius, destructive of its very existence; and involved a political sin of the highest character—of the delegated acting against the sovereign power—of the creature warring against the creator.

In making these assertions, Mr. C. said he had the authority of the President of the United States himself. He had tacitly acknowledged that if the views of the constitution on which the State of South Carolina has acted be correct, then neither this nor any other measure of force could be adopted against her. On no other principle could the long and elaborate argument (and false, he was compelled to say, as long and elaborate) contained in the proclamation and in the message be explained. Well might the President feel that unless the doctrines on which South Carolina had acted could be successfully resisted, it would be impossible for the Government to adopt any measure against her: which presented the great and solemn question, are they true or not? on which he proposed to make a few remarks, with the intention that the Senate might duly and deliberately reflect on them in the short interval between this and Monday next, (the day fixed for the discussion of the bill.)

The great question at issue is, where is the paramount power? Where the sovereignty in this complex, but beautiful and admirable system (if well understood) is lodged? for where the sovereignty is, there too must be the paramount power. A few plain, simple, and incontrovertible positions will determine this point. That the people of the States, as constituting separate communities, formed the constitution, is as unquestionable as any historical fact whatever. It stands upon the most durable and unquestionable record—as much so as the records of any court in the universe; and that the Union, of which the constitutional compact is the bond, is a union between States, and not between a mere mass of individuals, rests on authority not less high—on the constitution itself, which expressly declares, in the article of ratification, that it shall be binding between the States ratifying the same—words more explicit, he would say technical, could not be devised; yet, as certain as these facts are, they cannot be admitted without admitting the doctrines for which South Carolina contends. They, by the most certain and direct deduction, conclusively will show where the paramount power of the system is—where its sovereign authority resides.

No one will pretend that the sovereignty is in the Government. To make that assertion would be to go back to the Asiatic idea of government—it is scarcely European, as the most intelligent writers in that section of the globe long since traced sovereignty to a higher source. No, the sovereignty is not in the Government, it is in the people. Any other conception is utterly abhorrent to the ideas of every American. There is not a particle of sovereignty in the Government. If, then, it be in the people, which cannot be denied, unless by extinguishing the lights of political science for more than two thousand years, the only possible question that can remain is, in what people?

Powers of the Government.

[SENATE.]

In the people of the United States collectively, as a mass of individuals, or in the people of the twenty-four States, as forming distinct political communities, confederated in this Union? The facts already published decide this question, and prove the sovereignty to be in the people of the several States. No such community ever existed as the people of the United States, forming a collective body of individuals in one nation; and the idea that they are so united by the present constitution, as a social compact, as alleged by the proclamation, is utterly false and absurd. To call the constitution the social compact, is the greatest possible abuse of language. No two things are more dissimilar; there is not an expression in the whole science of politics more perfectly definite in its meaning than the social compact. It means that association of individuals, founded on the implied assent of all its members, which precedes all Government, and from which Government or the constitutional compact springs; and yet, the President, in the daring attempt to put down our federal system, has ventured to confound things so totally dissimilar. The sovereignty, then, is in the people of the several States, united in this federal Union. It is not only in them, but in them unimpaired; not a particle resides in the Government; not one particle in the American people collectively.

The people of the States have, indeed, delegated a portion of their sovereignty, to be exercised conjointly by a General Government, and have retained the residue to be exercised by their respective State Governments. But to delegate is not to part with or to impair power. The delegated power in the agent is as much the power of the principal as if it remained in the latter, and may, as between him and his agent, be controlled or resumed at pleasure. Now mark the consequence.

No one can deny that the act of the sovereign binds the citizen or subject. The latter is not individually responsible for the act of the political community of which he is a member, and to which he owes allegiance. The community only is responsible. This is a principle universally recognised; but without regarding a principle so obvious—formed upon the highest sense of justice—this bill proposes to make the citizen of South Carolina individually responsible for the sovereign acts of the State to which he owes his allegiance! An outrage, more than barbarian, upon the fundamental principle of political institutions, as has ever been recognised by all people so far advanced in civilization as to be formed into political communities. None can doubt that the convention of the people of South Carolina is the true organ of her sovereignty. According to our American ideas, sovereignty, instead of lying dormant in the mass of individuals composing a State, and instead of being capable of being called into action by a revolutionary movement only, has a known, organic, and peaceable means of action. That means is a convention of the people. Through its instrumentality all of our constitutions, State and Federal, were formed and ratified. Through the same authentic voice the people of South Carolina spoke in her late ordinance; which, as far as her citizens are concerned, is not less obligatory than the constitution itself.

It is to see that, under this aspect of the subject, this bill presents a question infinitely beyond that of the tariff or its constitutionality, of qualification, or whether the Supreme Court is the tribunal appointed by the constitution to decide questions in controversy between the State and Federal Governments. It sweeps away the whole of these questions. It may be admitted, to illustrate this, that the tariff is constitutional; that the Supreme Court is the authority appointed by the constitution to judge questions in conflict between the State and Federal Governments; and yet this bill cannot be justified. High authority of the court may be, its powers are but delegated powers; it makes a part of the Government itself; and, like every other portion of the Government, is destitute of the least particle of sovereign power. As delegated powers may be resumed by the sovereign delegating the same, such a resumption may be a breach of compact—a violation of the faith of the State; but, even in that case, the State, as a community, and not its citizens individually, is liable. The State, as a community, can break no law. It can, as a sovereign body, be subject to none. It may pledge its faith; it may delegate its powers; it may break the one and resume the other; but the remedy, in such cases, is not hostile enactments; not law, by which the citizens individually are made responsible—as the bill most absurdly and preposterously proposes; but open force—war itself—unless there be some provision of a remedial and peaceful character provided in the compact.

I am not now (said Mr. C.) about to discuss the question of using force on the part of the Federal Government against the State. That question is not now before the Senate; but, should it be presented in any stage of this proceeding, I stand ready to prove that this Government has no right even to resort to force. The illustrious men who framed our constitution were too wise and patriotic to admit of the introduction of force; in constituting a federal system, they had too profound a knowledge of the human heart, too deep an insight into history, not to perceive that the introduction of force into such a system must necessarily lead to a military despotism. The fabric is too delicate to stand its rude shock. They devised, as a substitute, a far more effectual and peaceful means—one much more consonant to the advanced progress of political science and civilization. He alluded to the provision by which all contests for power between the Federal Government and the States may be virtually decided in a convention of the States. That is the true, wise, and constitutional means of terminating this controversy. Let the States be convened in convention; let the stockholders, if he might be permitted so to express himself, of this great political partnership be called together, that all conflicts of power between the directors and any portion of the stockholders may be determined in conformity to the provisions prescribed in the charter of association.

If, then, in a case supposed, (where, for the sake of the argument, the constitutionality of the tariff is conceded, and with the same view the authority claimed for the Supreme Court acknowledged,) there would be no right to pass this bill of pains and penalties on the citizens of South Carolina for adhering to their allegiance to the State, how much stronger must be the objection to its passage when we advert to the fact, that it is not a case of resumption of power delegated to the Government, but the defence of reserved powers against unconstitutional encroachment. So far from conceding the constitutionality of the tariff or the powers claimed for the Supreme Court, not only the State of South Carolina, but all the Southern States, believe it to be not only unconstitutional, but highly oppressive; and that the Supreme Court, so far from being the tribunal appointed to decide political controversies, is limited by the constitution itself to cases arising in law and equity, and, of course, where the parties are amenable to its process.

Mr. C. said that he could not but perceive in the bill its self-evidence that there was, on the part of its authors, an internal feeling of the force of these arguments; they have not made it directly applicable to the case of South Carolina, nor to the case of a State opposing, on her own sovereign authority, what she believes to be an unconstitutional act of the Federal Government. If there be guilt, South Carolina alone is guilty. Why, then, make the provisions of the bill applicable to all the States? Why make it the general and permanent law of the land? The other States have not been even the abettors in the mighty struggle of South Carolina to maintain the constitution and liberties of the country. She has been discountenanced even by her sister States immediately interested in the issue! Why, then, commit the injustice of including them in its penal enactments? Why disguise the real intention, that is to coerce a sovereign State, exercising her constitutional right of judging, in the last resort, of her reserved rights, with a view of protecting her citizens against the encroachments of the Federal Government? Why not meet this mighty issue boldly and manfully? Why confound the movements of a State with riots, mobs, and insurrections? But one reason can be assigned. A conscious instinct of the palpable injustice and absurdity of such a bill. Mr. C. said, that viewing the bill on its principles, he conceived it a virtual repeal of the constitution, as much so as if it was expressly drawn on its face with "Be it enacted by the authority of the Senate and House of Representatives, that the constitution be, and the same is hereby repealed." Should it pass, it will effectually and forever put down our beautiful federal system, and rear on its ruins a consolidated Government. The sovereignty of the States would be forever submerged—that sovereignty which constituted ours a federal system, and the loss of which would make it a consolidation.

The issue is now before us; the decision cannot be much longer delayed; the rejection or the passage of this bill will probably decide it forever. Let no one suppose that, in deciding this great question, our system will stop at mere consolidation; it is but a stage in the certain progress to military despotism, and that the most odious and oppressive; as, in proportion to the independent free spirit of the people, must be the sternness of the despotism necessary to hold them in subjection. But two modes of political existence can long endure in our country; the one that formed, by the framers of our admirable constitution, a federal system, uniting free and independent States in a bond of union for mutual advantages, and to be preserved by the concurrent assent of the parts; or a government of the sword. The choice is before us.

Mr. C. said that he had drawn the resolutions which he was about to propose, for the purpose of bringing the principles of this bill distinctly before the Senate; and that he had accompanied them with the few remarks which he had made, with a view of calling the solemn attention of its members to the mighty consequences which he conscientiously believed to be involved in its passage. He conceived it to be impossible to adopt the resolutions and to pass the bill, and that it was equally impossible to deny the facts on which they rest, or reject the conclusions deduced therefrom.

Mr. C. concluded by submitting the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the people of the several States composing these United States are united as parties to a constitutional compact, to which the people of each State acceded as a separate sovereign community, each binding itself by its own particular ratification; and that the Union, of which the said compact is the bond, is a union between the States ratifying the same.

"Resolved, That the people of the several States, thus united by the constitutional compact, in forming that instrument, and in creating a General Government to carry into effect the objects for which they were formed, delegated to that Government, for that purpose, certain definite powers, to be exercised jointly, reserving at the same time, each State to itself, the residuary mass of powers, to be exercised by its own separate Government; and that whenever the General Government assumes the exercise of powers not delegated by the compact, its acts are unauthorized, and are of no effect; and that the same Government is not made the final judge of the powers delegated to it, since that would make its discretion, and not the constitution, the measure of its powers; but that, as in all other cases of compact among sovereign parties, without any common judge, each has an equal right to judge for itself, as well of the infraction as of the mode and measure of redress.

"Resolved, That the assertions that the people of these United States, taken collectively as individuals, are now, or ever have been, united on the principle of the social compact, and as such are now formed into one nation or people, or that they have ever been so united in any one stage of their political existence; that the people of the several States composing the Union have not, as members thereof, retained their sovereignty; that the allegiance of their citizens have been transferred to the General Government; that they have parted with the right of punishing treason through their respective State Governments; and that they have not the right of judging in the last resort as to the extent of the powers reserved, and, of consequence, of those delegated; are not only without foundation in truth, but are contrary to the most certain and plain historical facts, and the clearest deductions of reason; and that all exercise of power on the part of the General Government, or any of its departments, claiming authority from so erroneous assumptions, must of necessity be unconstitutional, must tend directly and inevitably to subvert the sovereignty of the States, to destroy the federal character of the Union, and to rear on its ruins a consolidated Government, without constitutional check or limitation, and which must necessarily terminate in the loss of liberty itself."

The resolutions were ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate then proceeded to consider the bill to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, &c.

Mr. EWING rose to continue his remarks, but yielded to a motion for adjournment.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 23.

MR. CALHOUN'S RESOLUTIONS.

The resolutions offered yesterday by Mr. CALHOUN were then taken up for consideration.

The resolutions having been read,

Mr. MANGUM said, he did not perceive that any benefit could result from the discussion of these resolutions at this time. There was other business of importance before the Senate, to the immediate action on which the disposition of that body pointed. With a view, therefore, to save the time of the Senate, and to bring the whole subject under consideration together, he would move to postpone the further consideration of the resolutions until Monday.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed his acquiescence in the motion. He had no desire to anticipate the discussion on the bill. He merely desired to have an opportunity of being heard at an early period on the subject of his resolutions.

Mr. GRUNDY expressed a hope that the gentleman from North Carolina would, for a moment, withdraw his motion, in order to give him an opportunity to present an amendment to, or rather a substitute for, the original resolutions. His substitute might then be printed, and the whole might be taken up together. He would, after offering his amendment, acquiesce in any motion for postponement.

Mr. MANGUM withdrew his motion.

Mr. GRUNDY then moved the following as a substitute for the original resolutions:

"Resolved, That, by the constitution of the United States, certain powers are delegated to the General Government, and those not delegated nor prohibited to the States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

JAN. 25, 1835.]

Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

"2. Resolved, That one of the powers expressly granted by the constitution to the General Government, and prohibited to the States, is that of laying duties on imports.

"3. Resolved, That the power to lay imposts is by the constitution wholly transferred from the State authorities to the General Government, without any reservation of power or right on the part of the State.

"4. Resolved, That the tariff laws of 1828 and 1832 are exercises of the constitutional power possessed by the Congress of the United States, whatever various opinions may exist as to their policy and justice.

"5. Resolved, That an attempt on the part of a State to annul an act of Congress passed upon any subject exclusively confided by the constitution to Congress, is an encroachment on the rights of the General Government.

"6. Resolved, That attempts to obstruct or prevent the execution of the several acts of Congress imposing duties on imports, whether by ordinances of conventions or legislative enactments, are not warranted by the constitution, and are dangerous to the political institutions of the country."

Mr. GRUNDY moved that the resolutions he had offered be printed.

Mr. WEBSTER suggested that the motion, to be correct in point of form, should be to postpone the whole subject till Monday, and in the mean time to print the amendment.

Mr. MANGUM then varied his motion to embrace the two objects, and the motion for postponement was then agreed to.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill to distribute, for a limited time, the proceeds of the public lands. The question being on the motion of Mr. POINDEXTER to amend,

Mr. EWING concluded the remarks which he had commenced on Monday. (Given entire above.)

Mr. HILL next rose, and said: The bill originally reported, after giving to the seven new States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Alabama, Missouri, Mississippi, and Louisiana, besides the five per cent. to which they are entitled by compact, entered into when they were severally admitted into the Union, and twelve and a half per centum upon the nett amount of all the sales of public lands, divides the residue of the nett proceeds of the public lands among the twenty-four States of the Union, according to their respective federal representative population, to be applied by the Legislatures of the said States to such objects of education, internal improvement, colonization of free persons of color, or reimbursement of any existing debt contracted for internal improvements, as the said Legislatures may severally designate and authorize. It grants, besides, to the new States of Mississippi, Louisiana, and Missouri, one half million of acres each; to Indiana, one hundred and fifteen thousand two hundred and seventy-two acres; to Illinois, twenty thousand; and to Alabama, one hundred thousand acres of land, lying within their own limits, the nett proceeds of the sales of which to be applied to objects of internal improvement within those States.

The amendment submitted by the Committee on Public Lands provides that the public lands heretofore offered for sale at one dollar and twenty-five cents the acre, and remaining unsold, shall, after the thirteenth of June next, be offered at private sale at one dollar per acre. The second section of the amendment provides that any head of a family, or single man over twenty-one years of age, or any widow, may demand and receive from the register and receiver a written permission to settle on a tract of land not exceeding one quarter-section, and that the person so applying, if he or she shall forthwith settle thereupon and cultivate the land for five consecutive years, and shall have paid down the sum of fifty cents per acre, shall be entitled to receive a patent therefor from the United States. I am not yet prepared to say whether or not the amendment proposed is the best disposition, consulting the great interests of the Union, which can be made of the public lands; but I must protest against the principles which are involved in the bill proposed to be amended.

The original proposition presents itself as a direct appeal to the cupidity of the several State Governments, in which the people are supposed to have a nearer interest than in the General Government; it is an invitation to take and eat of the forbidden tree, with the assurance, "thou shalt not surely die."

The friends of a high tariff in the old States are supposed to advocate the bill, while the opponents of a high tariff in the old States oppose it. The interest of the tariff and anti-tariff States, so far as relates to the reception of the dividend proposed, must be the same. Money must be as acceptable to the State of Georgia as to the State of Massachusetts. Why, then, does not Georgia seek the same disposition of the public lands as does Massachusetts? Georgia well knows that the proceeds of the public lands, abstracted from the treasury, creates the necessity of raising, by taxation on the consumption of the country, an equal amount; and Massachusetts, in the same thing, fancies that this additional taxation goes so much for the protection of that class of her citizens who have invested capital in various manufactures.

The idea is altogether fallacious, that the great mass of the people of this country can be benefited by the division of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States. So long as the legitimate expenditures of the National Government exceed the amount of revenue raised from any other than public property, so long will such a division of the avails of the public lands among the several States lessen the burdens of the people not at all. We will see what will be the operation of this dividend on the State of New Hampshire.

It will be admitted by all to be bad policy to raise money in any Government for the purpose simply of distributing it among those who have originally contributed it. The expenses of collection and distribution, and the interest or use of the money raised during the term of the whole process, are so much dead loss. The distribution of the avails of the sales of the public lands, so long as it is necessary to raise money by impost or otherwise, is still worse in principle than the taxation and distribution to which I have alluded. It is worse to New Hampshire and to all the States on the seaboard; because, while those States receive less than their proportion from the public lands, they pay more than their proportion of the taxes on imports to support the Government.

In the distribution of three millions of dollars, the proportion of New Hampshire will be about sixty thousand. This sixty thousand dollars, augmented by the expense of collection, and the greater portion of duties paid by consumers on the seaboard than by those living far in the interior, who consume less, will bring upon her an additional tax of at least one hundred thousand dollars; so that for every sixty cents received she pays out a dollar in new taxes. If an individual in his own private affairs were to engage in such a speculation as this, he would be set down as a fool.

But it is not the loss from the speculation itself that I so much deprecate—it is the demoralizing effect the dividend must have on the healthy action of our State Governments. Where a State has incurred an enormous debt in attempting to make internal improvements in unproductive roads and canals, the application of the dividend might be well applied to discharge the interest upon an interminable burden which has been thrown upon such

Public Lands.

State, and, when thus applied, would no longer be a subject of controversy; but in a State like New Hampshire—a State which has been too poor to run herself millions in debt on splendid projects of roads and canals—a State whose hardy yeomanry have contrived to make tolerably convenient roads and to improve the navigation of their rivers without either running the State, as such, in debt, or asking Congress for appropriations—in New Hampshire this appropriation of sixty thousand dollars annually—if, indeed, the whole proceeds of the public lands shall hereafter give her this as a dividend—would go to turn our State Government topsy-turvy.

The State would never consent that any portion of this dividend should go for the purpose of colonizing free blacks in Africa. But if it was to be applied for objects of internal improvement, there would be an annual scrambling in the Legislature that would keep up a constant warfare between the different sections of the State. The West there would have an interest in making improvements, which would carry away the business from the East; the extreme North would turn her roads towards the State of Maine, and the South would draw them towards Massachusetts; while the only seaport and commercial capital of the State would consider that she had a claim that all the money should be extended to bring the whole business of the State into her lap. The result would be, that the strong would combine and deprive the weak of their proportion of the benefits; that these benefits would be unequal; that new expedients would be resorted to, to give the appropriations a different direction; and that the State would be kept from year to year in a turmoil. Thousands of dollars of the dividend would be expended in useless legislation, in contriving ways and means to secure some portion of the money.

Projects of improvement would be started, involving a greater expenditure than the land fund would warrant. Some bridge, or road, or canal, which had been begun and under estimated—for what project of this kind, in its incipient state, was ever estimated at half its cost?—must be completed: the land fund from Congress fails. The State must hire money, or raise additional sums to carry the improvement on. Where credit is good, as that of a city, corporation, or State, loans may be effected, if not in this country, in Europe; and posterity may have entailed upon it a perpetual tax to pay the annual interest on money applied to such improvements as will not afford even a sufficient income to pay for their own repairs.

Is the land dividend applied to purposes of education? It will then be a matter of dispute whether it shall go to a high school or a common school, to a college or an academy; to prepare the pupil for the pulpit or the bar; for surgery or physic; or whether males exclusively, or females, or both, shall be entitled to its benefits.

If, Mr. President, the amount of dividend was so much real gain to a State, the inconveniences that might arise from State legislation on this subject were not worthy to be named. But when it is considered that the State has to contribute its full share, and to pay a larger tax to fill the vacancy which the abstraction of this dividend has produced, "Folly, with her cap and bells," could not appear more ridiculous than this project.

Are the State Governments to be reduced to abject dependence on the treasury of the nation? Are they to depend on the breath and the favor of the two branches of Congress? Are they to come here crouching for the means to enable them to educate their children, or to complete some great public improvement, at the same time they are taxed in what they eat, drink, and wear, to fill up that vacuum in the national chest which has been produced by the donation? Do you call this a gift—a favor to any State?

It has become evident to my mind that we must either confine the legislation of the Federal Government to the defined objects of the federal constitution, or present that continued collision between the National and State Governments which must end in consolidation, anarchy, and ultimate dissolution. I am of those, Mr. President, who believe that Congress is no less potent under the powers expressly granted to it by the people of the States, than the Legislatures of the States are by the powers granted them by the people of each State. Rightly practised upon, there is a beauty and a harmony in our constitution, forever assuring the liberties of the people.

The framers of the constitution never intended that the National Government should raise money to be distributed among the State Governments, any more than they intended that the common funds of the General Government should be dissipated in splendid projects of internal improvement. When Virginia ceded her title to the present States and territory north of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi, as a "common fund" to discharge the debts of the revolution, could it be believed it was the intention of the terms of that compact that at any future time the avails of those funds should be paid over directly by the General Government to the States of Massachusetts and Connecticut? What was the State of Massachusetts in every year deriving much public revenue from the public land within her limits; the sums secured to the treasuries of Massachusetts and Maine the present year for these public lands amount to nearly three hundred thousand dollars. This fact is announced in the messages of the Governors of those two States to their Legislatures at the present session.

Are Massachusetts and Maine attached to the union of these States? and can they insist that three millions of the common fund, collected from the avails of the public lands, shall be distributed among the States in the very year that they are deriving from the sales of the public lands within their limits a greater amount than what would be their share of the dividend? Does Connecticut insist on another annual slice to herself, who has a common school fund of between one and two millions of dollars derived from public lands, which she claimed beyond her limits subsequent to the revolution? Cannot these three States be satisfied with that disposition of the lands which are left to the whole United States, that leaves them a common fund to pay the expenses incurred by the General Government in their purchase, survey, and management, or to relieve the people of other burdens? Are these States not willing that the public lands should at present go to pay the million of dollars that are taken from the treasury to pay their revolutionary pensioners? Do they wish to tax the whole consumption of the Union, the food and clothing of the whole people of the United States, to pay their pensioners of the revolution, and at the same moment snatch from the treasury, for their own benefit, the common fund set apart to pay the debt of the revolution?

This project for dissipating the avails of the public lands, I am happy to say, did not originate with either the Senators from Massachusetts, Maine, or Connecticut; but if the bill passes, it must pass by the votes of those Senators.

There is not one of the original States south of the Potomac which supports this bill. Does not the bill do great relative injustice to those States? Is the present a time to impose greater burdens on the people of the South than the ordinary expenses of the Government require? They consider this measure as intended for no other purpose than to fix permanently on them an additional tax to the amount of their proportion of three millions of dollars; nay, sir, if it is intended in this additional tax of three millions to afford "protection" to the great manufacturing capitalists of the East, including the raised price of the articles protected, it may be the means of imposing on the people of the South their annual proportion of a tax of six, or ten, or even fifteen millions of dollars.

Can it be denied that the protection which has been

JAN. 23, 1833.]

Public Lands.

held out as the greatest beauty of the "American system"—that protection which involves the palpable contradiction of cheapening the article to the consumer, and at the same time keeping up the profits of the manufacturer—can it be denied that this protection is a principal object of the bill under consideration? Why will gentlemen at this time insist on a measure which adds fuel to the flame already glaring upon us in the South? Why will they insist on a new construction of the constitution—a construction which Virginia and the whole South have combated from '98 down to the present time—as a means of dissipating more funds of the Government, that further burdens may be imposed? Is this a time to make further innovations on the constitution? Is this a time to commence new projects? If gentlemen have a real attachment for the Union, they will now manifest that attachment by frowning on every measure calculated to increase the discontents of any portion of the Union.

The extinction of our national debt presents this nation in an attitude to excite the admiration of the world: there is probably on record no other instance of the kind. Now is the favorable time to put that practical construction upon the constitution which shall confine the Government within its acknowledged limits, and leave full scope for the States to act in their several spheres. It will be impossible that this Government shall go on, if Congress shall permanently assume powers which the framers of the constitution never intended to grant; such, for instance, as the right to make unlimited appropriations for internal improvements, for roads, bridges, and canals, by which the people of the several States are to be bought up with their own money. If this power be contested, as I trust it will be, successfully, what shall we say of the right of Congress to divide any portion of the common funds of the country among the States for the same object?

A most decisive objection to the division of the proceeds of the public lands proposed by the bill, is its inequality. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has insisted that the public lands are the common property of all the States—that each of the States is entitled to its full share. But in a different part of his argument, he has told us that an equal proportion to the seven new States would be one-sixth, and that the bill gives to these seven States, besides the five per cent. allowed them by the law already existing, nine hundred and sixteen thousand of the three millions of dollars—nearly one-third of the whole amount! And this is not all: half a million of acres of land are to be granted to three of these new States, in addition to the seventeen per cent. which they already have over and above the old States.

It will be remembered that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands were not as much during the year 1832, as they were in 1831. In the last named year, they amounted to $3,557,023 76. In the first three quarters of 1832, they were $1,904,467 57, being a proportion of half a million less than in the preceding year. Now take the last year as the rate for five years to come, and let it be borne in mind (as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BERRILL] has assured us) that it now costs the treasury nearly a million of dollars a year to discharge the public obligations on account of Indian treaties, and half a million more to manage these public lands—how much more than the sum actually drawn out of the treasury for the management and purchase of the public lands will be divided among the old States, as their part of the proceeds of the sales? Very little, if any. And will it not be a glorious operation—worthy of renowned statesmen—to tax the people of the United States two or three millions of dollars for the purpose of dividing that sum in a most unequal and unjust ratio between the several States?

"The King of France, with twenty thousand men, march'd up the hill, and then march'd down again."

After the money has been paid into the treasury, I can see no difference between the avails of the sales of the public lands, and the money collected by impost. It is said, that by the constitution Congress have power to dispose of the public lands without any restriction, and that, if they can thus dispose of the lands, they can in like manner dispose of the avails of the lands. I presume those who believe that we have so much money in the treasury that we cannot deal it out too liberally, would make no difference between the money brought into the treasury from import duties, and that from the avails of the public lands. They would as readily distribute the one as the other among the several States. It does appear to me, that the lands, in the first instance, ought to bear the expense of their own purchase and management; and that, until they do this, the avails of the public lands are as all other money paid into the treasury—that we have the same authority to dispose of all that we have of a part.

We may grant lands or money for public improvements in the vicinity of other lands, owned by the United States; and this has been liberally done by Congress, and expended for cutting and grading roads for military purposes, or for the purpose of facilitating settlements. But whenever the lands have been taken up, and the country has become so much settled as that the inhabitants are able to make their own roads, the United States should make no more grants. I would even submit to have the lands, belonging to the United States, situated in any State, taxed as similar lands are taxed in the hands of individuals, if needs be. I would, at any time, at a fair price, sell out the lands to the States in which they are situated. I would, where it will at all facilitate settlements, reduce the price of public lands. I might even consent, as a matter of expediency, if the constitution would admit of it, by the common consent of all, to divide the lands among the several States, under regulations which should prevent improper speculations; but never would I place the public lands in a position tempting the cupidity of the several State Governments, and leading them to ask, as a favor from the General Government, what the General Government has no right to give.

It is said that, as the public debt has been paid, the National Government has no further occasion for the public lands; that as they were granted for the specific purpose of discharging the debt of the revolution, and that debt being now paid, the avails of the lands should go back to the several States. If the debt of the revolution has been discharged, how much have the public lands done towards it? They have scarcely yet paid the expenses of purchase and management. The revolutionary debt has been discharged by taxes drawn directly from the pockets of the people. Nay, sir, the debt has not yet been discharged: millions are yet to be paid annually to revolutionary pensioners, for which the people of the United States must be taxed if this fund is diverted from the treasury. And even when the last man of the revolution shall have paid the debt of nature, this land fund, until it shall make up the whole amount of revolutionary debt for which impost and other duties have been laid, will be as sacred a pledge to the public treasury for the discharge of that debt as it ever has been.

It is said, if some disposition be not immediately made of the public lands, the States in which they are located will claim and take possession of them; that they will be strong enough in Congress in a few years to appropriate them for their own benefit. Of this I have no fears. The new States of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee are already with the old States in opposition to this project of the States taking to themselves all the lands within their limits; and it will be but a few years before Louisiana, Mississippi, Indiana, Illinois, and even Missouri, will have the same interest in preventing such a disposition of the public lands as have the elder States. Continue to dispose of the public lands within their borders for a few years, and each of these States will look to their interest in the vast regions of the West and North as of greater moment than what shall remain within their limits. There never will be danger of the new States uniting to wrest from the Union their property in the public lands.

It has been said in debate, [by Mr. CHAMBERS,] that this bill has been hailed in all parts of the country as a measure of justice, and that it "is a just and equal distribution." Just so far, and no farther, has this bill been applauded as the "American system," and the desire to keep up the duties on articles of consumption at the highest point have found favor. The Legislature of Vermont, in the fear that her iron manufactures will not be protected if an enormous duty shall not be continued on that article, necessary for the comfort and the sustenance of the poor as well as the rich, has passed resolutions in favor of this land bill. An attempt was made to steal through the Legislature of New Hampshire resolutions to the same effect the last evening of its last session; but the resolutions were voted out of the House by nearly two to one. The legislators of that State had not forgotten that their predecessors, so long as June 22, 1821, had resolved that "any partial appropriation of the public lands for State purposes is a violation of the spirit of our national compact, as well as the principles of justice and sound policy."

How "just and equal" the distribution by this bill is, may be gathered from the fact that seven of the Western States receive in cash nearly double the proportion of the old States. They come here to drive a great bargain. The "bounty" of the State of Mississippi, besides her advanced dividend in cash, is half a million acres of land—equal at least in value to six hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. The State of Mississippi "thanks" the honorable Senator who framed the bill for giving her so much; yet Mississippi wants more, if the Senator, in the plenitude of his great kindness, will yield to her more: and what does not the measure owe to the State of Mississippi for the favor it has received in this House? Surely, if Mississippi has been liberally patronized in the bill at the expense of her elder sisters, she has paid for it. I think it was said [by Mr. POINDEXTER] if this measure should be delayed three years, "the bargain to Mississippi would not be worth a brass farthing;" the best lands would, before that time, be all selected, and the remainder would not be valued at ten cents the acre.

Mississippi will have driven an excellent bargain for herself if she obtains the boon offered her by the bill the present year; if it be delayed three years, she will then be no better off than her sister States—the excellent Choctaw or Cherokee lands will then all be taken up. But what right has Mississippi to claim an extraordinary favor as to the lands? She does not admit that reducing the price of public lands will assist the poor; she says it operates not hardly on the new States that large sums are brought from them into the treasury from the sales of public lands—not worse upon them than if individuals came among them and purchased stocks of horses, cattle, or any thing else.† Yet she comes here to claim bounties over and above the other States, two to one in a dividend of cash proceeds of the public lands, and a setting out of half a million of acres of the best lands besides.

Gravely it is urged here that the abstracting of the nett proceeds of public lands from the treasury will make no difference in the amount of taxes on imports. I grant that it will not, if the splendid policy prevails which has been urged on us with so much vehemence during the present and the last sessions. There is no conceivable amount of taxes that will not be swallowed up, if not in bills for roads and canals, in harbor and light-house bills, and bills for the improvement of the navigation of rivers, or for the benefit of the District of Columbia. A hundred millions a year would scarcely suffice if all the expenditures asked for internal improvements shall be granted. A Virginia gentleman, not of this House,‡ tells the Eastern members of Congress that our true policy is, "to keep the tariff as high as possible, and to throw off the whole treasury surplus on internal improvements." If this policy shall be adopted, I concede that three millions of dollars, the amount of the sales of the public lands taken from the treasury, will make no difference in the taxes on imports.

Mr. President, the sentiment and voice of the State I represent, as expressed by the present Legislature—and that is but the echo of the sentiment of her Legislature and Chief Magistrate§ in the year 1822—is, "that the constitution of the United States has not vested in Congress the right to adopt and execute, at the national expense, a system of internal improvements;" "that the tariff of duties on imports ought to be so modified, if possible, a due regard being had to all the interests of the country, that the receipts from them and the other sources of revenue into the treasury of the United States shall not greatly exceed the ordinary annual expenses of the Government."

"Protection of American industry"—"the protective system the settled policy of the country," and other cant phrases of similar import, are the talismanic words which have led on this Government to the verge of dissolution. If the onerous taxation imposed by the tariff laws of 1824 and 1828 ever can protect American industry, all the good is to come hereafter, for none of it has yet arrived. The effect of those two laws has been oftener to paralyze than to protect American industry. The true protection to American industry is to lessen as much as possible the expenses of the consumption of labor; and these expenses can be lessened in no way more effectually by the Government than by reducing the duties on every consumable article. When was there a time in which good workmen, as batters, shoe-makers, saddlers, harness-makers, blacksmiths, carriage-makers, cabinet-makers, joiners, and all other trades requiring skill in those who work at them, and perform the chief of all the labor, did not meet with encouragement in this country? Has the business of any of these been bettered by a severe tariff? Some of them have had a protection of twenty-five or thirty per cent. by the late tariff laws; but nobody could see that they were any better off after than before such laws passed. They have undoubtedly been injured, in common with all the other producing classes, by severe taxation on their articles of consumption. A wealthy carriage-maker in Connecticut annually exports carriages to a large amount to Mexico, at a great profit; but his profits and the value of the labor he employs would be even greater if his carriages were not enhanced by the heavy duties on iron, lace, cloth, varnish, &c. which enter into their composition.

What is the intention of protecting the article of woollens? Is it not to shut out foreign woollens? Why do not the owners of manufactories encourage American manufactures, by their personal example? Are not nine out of ten of the rich manufacturers of the North clothed in British and French woollens? Are there less foreign woollens worn now than there were prior to the tariff laws of 1828? The only difference seems to be, that the poor and laboring people, who purchase all their woollen clothing, cannot obtain it as cheap in proportion as they do other articles. Is it any protection to a laborer who supports a family of children, that a yard of woollen flannel costs twice as much as it should cost? The protection which the great mass of the consumers, both North and South, most desire, is, that the tariff may be reduced to the exigencies of the Government; and this is the only "settled policy of the country" to which they will ever willingly submit.

Sir, the bill on your table has for its object a prevention of the reduction of the tariff; it is intended to create a necessity for continuing an amount of taxation on imports equal to the money divided. It comes before us at a time the most inauspicious; it is calculated to lash and exasperate the discontents of our brethren of the South, who are really oppressed beyond the people of the North so far as onerous and severe taxation on imports go to operate on them. So equivocal is this term "protection," when applied to our tariff, that it is really a matter of doubt whether the manufacturer or the consumer of the article manufactured is protected. At one time it is said that the article has been reduced in price by the competition at home, which the shutting out competition from abroad has encouraged. If this were true, why do we find all the prominent protected articles still imported? and if none were imported, what benefit does it create to the manufacturer? How can reduced prices protect him? We are told that if the duty shall be taken off, the price of the article will be raised. This is as much as to say that the duty taxed does not enter into the price of the article. If not, where is the protection afforded by the tax? To cap the climax of the absurd dogmas relating to "protection," it is said the manufacturers will be ruined by a reduction of those duties, which neither contribute to raise the price or shut out of the market the foreign article coming in competition with the articles they shall manufacture.

An idea seems to prevail, pretty extensively, that no essential interest of the country can be injured if the high tariff is continued on all foreign articles coming in competition with those which can be manufactured in our own country. This is a great mistake; for by so much as any particular article of manufacture is protected by the imposition of such duties, does the consumer of that article have money drawn directly from his pocket, without any equivalent whatever. If the duty does not shut out entirely the imported article, the whole amount of the duty enters into the price paid by the consumer; the price of protection is paid only to the country so far as it is paid on the imported article; the additional price paid to the home manufacturer is of no benefit whatever to the treasury, and, by a mere arbitrary act of legislation, takes the money from the man who has earned it, to give it to another who has not earned it. Such is the absurdity, the injustice of what is called the protective system. If it is in any degree the protection contended for by the manufacturers, certainly it is the most rank and foul injustice to those who are compelled to pay the bounty to the manufacturers; it is such injustice as fully justifies the South in protesting against the system, and such, being equally pernicious to their interests, as will bring down the consumers of the North to unite in prostrating the system.

But, from the best lights I have been able to obtain on this subject, I have good reason to believe that both the South and the North have been somewhat mistaken as to the extent of the operation of the tariff. As it thus far has notoriously failed to protect the laborers and mechanics employed in the manufactories; as neither the tariff of 1824 nor that of 1828 prevented the failure of nearly every small manufacturer at the North; as goods manufactured in foreign countries, and even wool raised in foreign countries, have been introduced into this country as extensively since those goods were protected by the high tariff as they were before; so it may be said that the tariff has not afforded that protection which had been promised by its friends. For the same reason has it neither operated so much to the injury of the South, who have not without apparent cause complained of it. The South has not been more injured, than the North has been benefited, by the operation of the tariff.

It is for the reason that this tariff system is a system of deception both to the North and to the South, holding out to the one a protection and advantage which they never realize, and seeming to oppress and injure the other beyond their ability to endure, that I am in favor of making the import duties on all imported articles as equal as possible, and of bringing all of them down to that lowest point at which an economical administration may place it. This is the American system which alone will restore harmony to the country; this is that "settled policy of the country" which ought now to be established, which the intelligent yeomanry of the nation will have established, and will not again soon suffer to be disturbed.

I have seen resolutions (introduced by A. H. Everett, late minister to Spain) which have just passed the Senate of Massachusetts, without debate, deprecating any diminution of the tariff—a Senate, every member of which is of one political party. These resolutions are from the same mint as have been other proceedings of the same party in that State, which were intended to break up the foundations of the Union. They falsely predict the "ruin and bankruptcy of thousands" of their citizens, if the tariff shall be reduced, and that the "whole prosperity of the country will be materially affected;" they say it will be improper for Congress even to consider of the subject, while South Carolina "threatens to secede from the Union," and that now to proceed to this subject would "wear upon the face of it the aspect of submission." They even go so far as to say that a reduction of the tariff would be such "a gross and palpable abuse of power in the Government, as would justify the States and citizens aggrieved by it in any measures which they might think proper to adopt for the purpose of obtaining redress!" Here is nullification threatened from another quarter, if Congress shall at this time dare to equalize the revenue system, so that it shall operate equally on all parts of the country, and bring down the tax on imports to the wants of the Government. The same resolutions mention the "unexpectedly large and satisfactory majority" by which the tariff bill of July, 1832, passed. The report which accompanies these resolutions says: "It (the tariff bill of last summer) was adopted by an unusually large and gratifying majority, composed of the moderate men of all parties;" that it was made with "much labor and caution;" that it "was constructed on the professed principle of compromise, with a view of satisfying, by every reasonable concession, the discontents of the South."

You must well recollect, Mr. President, the kind spirit of concession the "moderate men" exhibited when the tariff bill of last summer passed this House. Were we not then told—was not the Senator from Pennsylvania nearest me [Mr. WILKINS] then reproached from Massachusetts (by Mr. WEBSTER,) with having secured protection for the iron of his own State, while, consenting to that small reduction on woollens which had passed the House of Representatives by a "gratifying majority, composed of the moderate men of all parties," he had forever prostrated the woollen manufactures of the North? Were not both the Senators from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILKINS] and New Jersey [Mr. DICKERSON] who were on the Committee of Conference between the two Houses, accused of having deserted and betrayed the great manufacturing interests, by consenting to the bill as it had actually passed?

As a commentary on the ruin predicted of the woollen interest in Massachusetts, I will say, that on my way here I passed through that State. On an inconsiderable stream of water, since I had passed the year before, a canal had been dug, carrying the channel of water some hundreds of rods out of that which nature had formed; a brick edifice, some hundred or more feet in length, and three or more stories high; a large brick store, (full of goods,) and other buildings, had just been erected. I was surprised to find that this new and extensive establishment, erected principally since the Senator from Pennsylvania had "betrayed and sacrificed the woollen interest" of the North, was a woollen establishment, and was owned by a gentleman or gentlemen of Boston, who understood their own interests quite as well as the gentleman who represents their interests on the floor of Congress. The owners of this extensive factory were well aware not only that the duty on woollens had been reduced, but they knew that the general sentiment through that part of the country was, that woollens must and would be further reduced. All this did not prevent them from investing their capital in a new and extensive woollen establishment. They will tell you they had rather the duties on woollens would remain as they are; but, if they be candid and ingenious men, they will likewise admit to you that a substantial permanent protection of twenty or twenty-five per cent. duty will be quite as sure a protection as a protection of fifty per cent. operating as a bounty on smuggling, and actually bringing millions of foreign woollens into the country without the payment of any duty whatever.

I have noticed the resolutions of Massachusetts to show you that we have a class of men at the North who not only act in a spirit calculated to goad on the South to resistance and civil war, but who are ready now, as they were in the days of the Hartford Convention, to justify "any measure which they may think proper to adopt for the purpose of obtaining redress," and who would actually place the country in that dilemma, where to take any step will bring down upon this Government the vengeance of one or other section of the Union. It seems to have been the design of the ultras on both hands—and in this, up to the present time, there has been a wonderful concert—that nothing should be done calculated to soothe and satisfy the country.

Mr. President, the bill under consideration is intimately connected with the tariff. The people of the North, a large majority of the people in the State which I represent, abominate that system which makes an increase of the public burdens indispensable; they do not want such protection as can be given them only at the expense and to the injury of others. They had rather see their large manufacturers come down to a level of the lowest protected interest, than to see the Union endangered by the imposition of unequal burdens. They will support now, as they supported during the embargo and war, the revenue laws; they will not consent that South Carolina now, any more than Massachusetts in 1809 and 1815, shall nullify the laws. They will disdain to be bribed into high taxation by an annual douceur to their State treasury, for granting which, in the spirit of vassals, the several States will be bound to "thank" and kiss the hand that bestows it.

For myself, Mr. President, I had rather the few thousand dollars which I possess in a manufacturing establishment should be sunk to the bottom of the sea, than to see—not the Union rent in twain, for that "must and will be preserved"—but a spirit of hostility between the different sections of the country engendered and perpetuated in the repeated attempts of the stronger to take advantage of the weaker. To the threats of any State holding herself in a menacing attitude towards this happy Union, believing, as I may, that she has been impelled by politicians whose motives are any thing but commendable, I would not yield an inch; so neither would I be prevented from prosecuting a course of right and justice to other patriotic States, because such a process would disarm the refractory even of a pretext for doing wrong. The bill for dividing the proceeds of the public lands, inasmuch as it will furnish occasion for continuing millions of taxes on imports which might otherwise be dispensed with, inasmuch as it is one of the means to keep up a system calculated to promote public discontent, and even threatens bloodshed and civil war, has my decided disapprobation.

Mr. MOORE moved that the Senate do now adjourn.—Lost—yeas 16, nays 23.

Mr. BUCKNER then moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow, in order that the Senate might proceed to the consideration of executive business. Also lost—yeas 17, nays 24.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, then said, that having on a former occasion given his views in opposition to the original bill, and in favor of the principle embraced by the amendment under consideration, he should not have thought it necessary to submit any additional views at this time, except for the very wide range and extraordinary course which had been pursued in the prosecution of this discussion; and even now, said he, I would not think myself excusable, were I to occupy more than a few moments of the time of the Senate.

But (said Mr. M.) there have dropped from gentlemen on both sides of this question some pointed remarks, in reference to the position which the new States occupy, connected with it, which I think deserve a passing notice.

The honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY,] who, upon this, as upon other occasions, has made an able effort, and addressed to the Senate an argument, which, in the main and general, I heard with great pleasure and satisfaction, yet, I think, in that portion of his argument predicated upon the supposed demand made by the new States for the surrender of the public domain within their limits, he has been disingenuous, and done great injustice (unintentionally, I have no doubt) to the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent. [Here Mr. GRUNDY rose and asked leave to explain, and stated that he had no design to apply his remarks to the State of Alabama particularly.] I am aware (said Mr. M.) that the gentleman's remarks were general; similar remarks have been made by others, and I have thought it my duty to exonerate the State from any censure cast upon her from any quarter. Upon a former occasion, I expressly disclaimed, in behalf of my constituents, any such views or inclination whatever; it was, therefore, with regret that I heard this expression of censure from several gentlemen for this supposed heresy.

Mr. President, this measure has been characterized by others as intimately connected with the mis-called American system. True, this has been denied, and pains taken to show it has no such connexion. But I am compelled to think we have great reason to believe the position to be well founded, though much labor has been bestowed to disguise its true character. Sir, it proposes to continue the same rate of taxation (for I can call it by no other name) as regards the public lands, upon seven of the new States, for the purpose of raising annually three millions of dollars to be distributed among the whole twenty-four States; and by a ratio which does great injustice to the new States, notwithstanding the outward show of liberality it exhibits.

Sir, I object to the terms of distribution. Why adopt the arbitrary ratio of representation in the popular branch of the National Legislature? Why not say that each State shall have an interest in this fund according to their representation on this floor? This would not do more than equal justice to the new States, who, having been recently admitted into the federal family, are more destitute of means and resources, and of course have more claims upon the General Government for that liberality which a dutiful offspring would have a right to expect from a benign parent.

Mr. President, I must be permitted to say, that I think the opposition to the liberal provisions in favor of the new States come with a very bad grace from the quarter in which it has emanated. It emanates from a quarter from whence there have been no liberal contributions to what gentlemen have been pleased to call "a common stock," while Georgia has transferred to the United States a territory, out of which two of the new States, and magnanimous Virginia that out of which three or four of the new States, have been composed.

Sir, much importance has been attached by certain gentlemen to the pecuniary advantages which the new States will derive from the passage of the bill as originally reported. To my mind, this is altogether illusive and deceptive; for the little benefit the new States would receive from this distribution would be a very poor compensation and a contemptible consideration for the continual drain and eternal draw which will be made upon them for such large sums of their circulating medium, to which there will be no end if our sister States become interested. One of the greatest evils the new States have complained of, has been this means of robbing them of all their circulating medium, through the land offices, into which it is paid, and transferred from thence into the public treasury here; but, sir, pass this bill, and my constituents will be fortunate if they are not sued by those who will then claim an interest in our soil in actions of ejectment, trespass, &c., for various offences, even for cutting down a timber tree, or bee tree, which they do not hesitate to do, whilst this domain belongs to our Government, with impunity.

My constituents have presented no application here for any portion of the public revenue for the purposes contemplated by the bill. Sir, they wish the waste and unappropriated lands settled; they wish to count soldiers, citizens, and freeholders, in the place of barren and sterile acres of public land; they think it is better for a community to boast of a free, a happy, and brave people, than to boast of millions of acres of land, or millions of dollars in the treasury, for which there is no demand, and which, in all probability, will be appropriated to illegitimate and unconstitutional purposes. Sir, those whom I have the honor to represent believe the prosperity of a nation to exist in the happiness of its citizens; and its strength, in a great measure, in the firm attachment of the people to the Government under which they live; and we believe the proposition we support is best calculated to promote these beneficent ends.

Again, sir: I am averse to a measure which is designed to place my constituents in a partnership transaction, which will require them to furnish all the capital stock, and receive only five shares; while another partner, Pennsylvania, for instance, will receive twenty-eight shares, and New York forty shares, out of the proceeds of this transaction. Sir, there are too great odds and advantages against us in this concern.

But we are called upon "to say whether we want the public lands given away, in order to promote our population?" Sir, this is not our proposition: but I will say that I would, with great cheerfulness, support a proposition that would give every citizen who is destitute one-quarter section of land, on the condition that he would cultivate and improve it; and I have no hesitation in declaring this policy is founded in prudence and wisdom. Other Governments have pursued it to great advantage. No other Government except this has ever made the public domain a source of revenue; and surely we have as much inducement to be liberal to our pioneers and hardy sons of the forest as any other Government on earth. If we had pursued a policy like this, it would have given a more dense population on the frontier, by which facilities would have been afforded in the transportation of troops and the munitions of war, support of the troops, &c., and would have saved much of the treasure which this Government incurred, during the late war, in its prosecution. It would have saved also much of that million of dollars recently paid for subduing the hostile Indians on our north-western frontier, by the strength in the increased population which would have been attached to that point; and what is more, it would have saved some of the lives of our valuable fellow-citizens who have fallen victims to their cruelty.

But we are required to furnish evidence "that the price of the public lands is too high, and ought to be reduced."

Sir, is it not notorious that our citizens are leaving our territory daily, and going to a neighboring province, where they obtain better bargains, and where there are greater inducements to emigration? And is it not also a fact equally well known, that your table is now groaning with memorials and petitions from citizens of the new States, asking the reduction and the graduation of the price of the public lands? And is this no evidence?

But this is not all. In 1828, under a call made by the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] upon the proper department, your public officers were required to furnish a statement showing the quantity, quality, and average value of the unsold and unsaleable public lands, the length of time they have been in market under our own laws, or subject to be given away by foreign sovereigns. This duty has been performed under official responsibility, in a response which contains much important and interesting information. Sir, we have heard the result from the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. POINDEXTE,] as regards that State; it shall be my province to recite some of the most important results connected with the State of Alabama only. And, Mr. President, I will venture the opinion that you, sir, will not be a little surprised at a portion of this information. Would you believe it, sir, that a portion of this public domain, which gentlemen estimate so high, has been offered for one hundred years by foreign sovereigns to their subjects as a gratuity, annexing no other condition except that they should inhabit and cultivate it; and after having been picked and culled for this length of time, under these favorable conditions, it has been in market under our own laws at the minimum price of one dollar and twenty-five cents for twenty years longer? I allude to the lands in the St. Stephen's land district. And yet "this is no evidence that the price is too high." Again, sir: from this document it appears that out of the entire aggregate amount of thirteen millions of acres, (I do not notice fractions,) only six hundred thousand are deemed of the first quality. And the average value of this has been estimated at forty cents per acre; the remainder of the thirteen millions of acres, including every acre from all the other land districts, (four out of five,) have been put down as of the 2d and 3d quality, and the average value at five cents per acre; and some of this has been in market for twenty-two years. And yet, sir, we are told "these refuse lands ought not to be reduced in price."

Sir, if these facts fail to inspire faith, I fear gentlemen would not believe though an angel were to descend from heaven and record its truth.

But, Mr. President, one word in reply to some of the arguments of the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] who "deprecates the passage of this amendment, as being calculated to produce ruin and incalculable mischief in its immediate effect, in producing a depreciation of all the real estate in the country."

Sir, I recollect in 1819—'20, when the bill, having for its object the reduction of the price from two dollars to one dollar and twenty-five cents, was pending before Congress, a certain combination of individuals in the country in which I live, consisting of moneyed capitalists, usurers, some who then held appointments in the land office, land speculators, and the Shylocks of the country, who had engrossed large quantities of the best land, and driven the honest farmers in many instances from the places they had selected as homes, and which they had rendered valuable by their own labor—these, and these alone, were the men who then denounced the passage of the bill to which I have referred; they denounced it as being calculated to depreciate the value of all the real estate, and even went so far as to say "it would be a palpable fraud upon those who had purchased under the two dollar system." Nevertheless, Congress in their wisdom passed the bill, and it received the universal approbation of all the honest and farming class of the community. So it was with the forty acre law; this was repudiated by some of the same class of men, but no act connected with the land system has given more general satisfaction. And so it will be if we can succeed in maturing and obtaining this measure; it will be hailed by all the real yeomanry of the country as promotive of their best interest and that of the community. I speak particularly with reference to the section of country from which I come.

But, sir, if it would not be deemed arrogant, I would submit it to the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] and the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] whether, in opposition to our amendment, they do not strike a fatal blow at the most important interest of their constituents? Sir, it is admitted on all sides that this amendment is calculated to encourage emigration to the new States; that it must throw a great influx of population in the Mississippi valley; in fact, one of the grand objections urged against it is, that it will invite a population from the North and from the East, and transfer that population to the West and Southwest. Well, sir, is it not obvious that, in the same ratio in which you increase the population in this quarter, you open here new and additional markets for the surplus produce in which these States abound? Surely, sir, these honorable gentlemen are fully as unfortunate in not being able to discover their own interest, as they have heretofore imagined we were destitute of the forecast sufficient to discover the blessings we were to derive from their favorite and most sacred measure—the tariff. Mr. President, it will not be denied that much of the surplus productions from the grain-growing States find a ready market among my constituents; their horses, mules, pork, bacon, salt, flour, whiskey, and cotton bagging, upon which we are compelled to pay a tax amounting to protection and bounty. But, sir, to the citizens in the Mississippi valley, where they have water transportation down stream all the way, the constituents of these honorable Senators are indebted not only for a market for such articles as I have enumerated, but for every thing that is eatable, even potatoes, chickens, turkeys, &c.; and yet they deprecate a measure calculated to increase the population in this quarter. Surely, sir, this must be a short-sighted policy.

But it has been intimated "that our system will apply with as much propriety to a flour seller as to the land system."

Well, let us try the case: Suppose one of the honorable Senator's constituents owns a large quantity of flour, say some six or eight boat loads; he gets on board of one a supercargo, and it is shipped to market; he immediately sells out all of the first quality at an advanced price; but having sold this, he finds he cannot sell the inferior at the same price; would the honorable Senator advise his constituents to hold this up for "future generations," because it will not command the price at which he has been fortunate in selling that of the first quality? I presume he would not. So, in this case, the Government is a large landholder; has sold out all of the first rate land to the most wealthy class of her citizens; these will not purchase inferior lands, because they do not wish to cultivate such, and because they know they are not worth the same price at which they have purchased lands of the first quality. But there are a large number of our fellow-citizens, who, though poor and indigent, are worthy and respectable; these have not been able to purchase the high priced lands, but are able and willing to purchase the inferior, provided you will put the land at a price corresponding with its quality and value, and also corresponding with their ability to pay. Now, I am of opinion it is both the interest and duty of the Government to sell its inferior lands to its citizens of this description upon the terms proposed, and thereby give them a permanent interest in the country; as much as it was the interest of the flour merchant to reduce the price of his inferior flour in order to get it off his hands.

But, Mr. President, what has been the example of other States who have sold their public domain? Have they adopted the means calculated to screw from their citizens the last possible cent for them, or have they not pursued a more just and liberal policy? Kentucky, sir, so much celebrated for the fertility of her soil, (and justly, too,) sold her public lands to her citizens at forty cents per acre, and I am now told even lower than this. Tennessee began at twenty-five cents, and graduated first to twelve and a half, and then down to one cent. And strange, Mr. President, to tell, sir, even the State of Maine, whose citizens enjoy all the rich blessings which flow from the protecting principle, has sold her public domain to her own citizens as low as three cents per acre, notwithstanding her representatives think the pine barrens, marshes, swamps, &c. which have been picked and culled for twenty-two, and some for one hundred and twenty-two years, are worth one dollar and twenty-five cents. We doubtless ought to acknowledge some obligations to gentlemen for entertaining so exalted an opinion of the value of our lands, and the ability of our citizens to pay for them.

Mr. President, we are purely an agricultural people, doomed to suffer under the influence of that system imposed upon us by (I will not say "a mercenary majority," because gentlemen take exceptions to that term, but I will say by) an unkind, an ungenerous, and a tyrannical majority: which system transfers the burdens of the Government to us, and all its favors and blessings to our opponents, and demands of us to pay them a bounty, a protection, for every thing we either drink, eat, wear, or use in our agricultural pursuits. We appeal to their justice, liberality, and magnanimity, now that we present a fair subject for legislation, when they have an opportunity of mitigating and alleviating our burdens somewhat, "to do unto us as they would that others should do unto them."

No one else now rising to address the Senate, Mr. FORSYTH asked for time to send for his colleague before the question was taken.

Mr. MANGUM moved that the Senate now adjourn.

The yeas and nays being ordered on the call of Mr. CLAY, the question was put, and decided in the negative—yeas 20, nays 21.

Mr. MOORE asked if it would be in order to move a call of the Senate.

The CHAIR stated that he had never known an instance of a call of the Senate when there was a quorum present.

Mr. CALHOUN moved that the Senate now adjourn. But the yeas and nays were asked for by Mr. CLAY, when Mr. CALHOUN withdrew his motion.

Mr. CLAY said that if there was a general understanding that the question should be taken to-morrow, he would himself move to adjourn.

And the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 24.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate again proceeded to the consideration of the bill to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, &c. The question being on the motion of Mr. POINDEXTER to amend,

Mr. BENTON rose in opposition to the bill. He commenced by asking for the reading of the following passages from the last annual message of the President of the United States:

JAN 24, 1833.]

Public Lands.

"Among the interests which merit the consideration of Congress after the payment of the public debt, one of the most important, in my view, is that of the public lands. Previous to the formation of our present constitution, it was recommended by Congress that a portion of the waste lands owned by the States should be ceded to the United States for the purposes of general harmony, and as a fund to meet the expenses of the war. The recommendation was adopted; and, at different periods of time, the States of Massachusetts, New York, Virginia, North and South Carolina, and Georgia, granted their vacant soil for the uses for which they had been asked. As the lands may now be considered as relieved from this pledge, the object for which they were ceded having been accomplished, it is in the discretion of Congress to dispose of them in such way as best to conduce to the quiet, harmony, and general interest of the American people. In examining this question, all local and sectional feelings should be discarded, and the whole United States regarded as one people, interested alike in the prosperity of their common country.

"It cannot be doubted that the speedy settlement of these lands constitutes the true interest of the republic. The wealth and strength of a country is its population, and the best part of that population are the cultivators of the soil. Independent farmers are every where the basis of society, and true friends of liberty.

"In addition to these considerations, questions have already arisen, and may be expected hereafter to grow out of the public lands, which involve the rights of the new States and the powers of the General Government; and, unless a liberal policy be now adopted, there is danger that these questions may speedily assume an importance not now generally anticipated. The influence of a great sectional interest, when brought into full action, will be found more dangerous to the harmony and union of the States than any other cause of discontent; and it is the part of wisdom and sound policy to foresee its approaches, and endeavor, if possible, to counteract them.

"Of the various schemes which have been hitherto proposed in regard to the disposal of the public lands, none has yet received the entire approbation of the National Legislature. Deeply impressed with the importance of a speedy and satisfactory arrangement of the subject, I deem it my duty, on this occasion, to urge it upon your consideration; and, to the propositions which have been heretofore suggested by others, to contribute those reflections which have occurred to me, in the hope that they may assist you in your future deliberations.

"It seems to me to be our true policy that the public lands shall cease, as soon as practicable, to be a source of revenue, and that they be sold to settlers, in limited parcels, at a price barely sufficient to reimburse to the United States the expense of the present system, and the cost arising under our Indian compacts. The advantages of accurate surveys and undoubted titles, now secured to purchasers, seem to forbid the abolition of the present system, because none can be substituted which will more perfectly accomplish these important ends. It is desirable, however, that, in convenient time, this machinery be withdrawn from the States, and that the right of soil, and the future disposition of it, be surrendered to the States, respectively, in which it lies.

"The adventurous and hardy population of the West, besides contributing their equal share of taxation under our impost system, have, in the progress of our Government, for the lands they occupy, paid into the treasury a large proportion of forty millions of dollars, and, of the revenue received therefrom, but a small part has been expended amongst them. When, to the disadvantage of their situation in this respect, we add the consideration that it is their labor alone which gives real value to the lands, and that the proceeds arising from their sale are distributed chiefly among States which had not originally any claim to them, and which have enjoyed the undivided emolument arising from the sale of their own lands, it cannot be expected that the new States will remain longer contented with the present policy, after the payment of the public debt. To avert the consequences which may be apprehended from this cause, to put an end forever to all partial and interested legislation on this subject, and to afford to every American citizen of enterprise the opportunity of securing an independent freehold, it seems to me, therefore, best to abandon the idea of raising a future revenue out of the public lands."

The reading being finished, Mr. B. proceeded to address the Senate in support of the views presented by the President, and in opposition to the scheme of distribution contained in the committee's bill. He should commence his speech, he said, by exposing and correcting an error of most enormous magnitude, as he termed it, into which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. CHAMBERS] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. POINDEXTER] had each fallen with respect to the President's plan for disposing of these lands. They had supposed that there was no difference between the plan of the President, and that of the committee, so far as the amount of future revenue was concerned; that both plans proposed to strike the lands from the revenue system, and that it was immaterial, in that point of view, which of them should be adopted. Mr. B. undertook to affirm, and would quickly prove, that this supposition was a grand mistake; that there was a palpable difference in the words of the two plans, and an immense difference to the revenue in their results. He stated the words of the President, which, he said, were to sell the lands at prices which would reimburse the treasury for the expenses of managing them, and defray the cost of purchasing them from the Indians; the committee's plan was to divide the whole proceeds of the land sales without first deducting the amounts expended under these two important heads of expenditure; the difference between the two plans would be in truth and reality about two millions, but in practice at least three millions, and probably six.

Mr. B. took up the printed estimate of appropriations for the service of the year 1833, and referred to pages and figures to justify his statement. At page 43, the sum of $250,000 was estimated for surveying the public lands; at the same page the sum of $49,654 for surveyors general, and their clerks; at pages 7 and 8, the sum of $62,658 for the general land office in this city. The compensation to the registers and receivers, about one hundred in number, was not taken into the estimate, but was easily calculated. Their salaries, at $500 each, would be $50,000; their commission, at one per cent. each on three millions of dollars, would be $60,000; and their per diem attendance on the public sales, at $6 per day each, would be $—more; in all, about $480,000 for the expenses of administering the land system alone; and this expense on the increase, from the annual establishment of new land offices. The other head of expenses related to the acquisition of the lands, under treaty stipulations, from Indians; and stood thus: For annuities, and various treaty stipulations, $392,862; for removing and subsisting the Indians from the lands they had ceded within the limits of the States to their new homes west of the Mississippi, the sum of 474,000 dollars. These two items make 866,862 dollars, and are found at page 45 of the estimate; but since that was drawn up no less than eleven new treaties had come, adding $110,000 per annum to the annuities and other standing charges, and requiring about $430,000 for other immediate payments to be made this year. These united sums would be about $1,400,000, and this exclusive of the expense which might be incurred during the year in holding treaties with the Indians for further purchases of their lands. Mr. B. said that he had shown an expenditure of about two millions payable on the management and acquisition of the public lands for the present year, and that without going into any of the far-fetched charges which the Senator from Mississippi had supposed must be brought in to make up this amount, as he had mentioned it on a former day. He had not included the expense of the Indian Department, an item of $145,300, for what might be called the diplomatic intercourse of the United States with the Indians, in keeping up commissioners, superintendents, agents, sub-agents, interpreters, making presents for good-will, defraying expenses of visits to military posts and the seat of Government. He had included nothing but what strictly and rigorously occurred under the treaties for purchasing the lands from the Indians, and managing them; this amounted to two millions of dollars for the present year, and could not be much less for many years to come, as many of the annuities were permanent; others had fifteen to thirty years to run, and the expense of new treaties was not yet done with. This amount, or whatever it might be, more or less, the President intended should be paid out of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands; the bill under consideration proposed that the proceeds of the land sales should be divided, without first deducting these expenses; that they should be thrown upon the custom-house. And here resulted a real difference of two millions to the revenue in the results of the two plans.

Mr. B. held two millions to be the difference in truth between the two plans, but that the difference in fact and practice would be infinitely greater; and he went into proofs and statements to show that this practical difference would certainly be three millions, and probably six. That it would be three millions at least, he showed to be admitted and declared by the Committee on Manufactures, who brought in the distribution bill, and made the report in its favor at the last session. That committee assumed three millions of dollars to be the annual product of the lands; and going upon the assumption, whether true or false, that three millions were to be abstracted from the revenue for distribution, the high tariff party, who had still the federal legislation in their hands, would take care at all events that three millions of duties on imposts should be retained to supply its place. This they would do upon their avowed principles, without concealment or disguise; but what they would do in reality may well be inferred from a knowledge of their policy, and from the declarations made on this floor, in the discussion of this bill, that the proceeds of the lands in a few years will be six millions, and in a few more twelve millions. These six millions and twelve millions are then the sums which the high tariff gentlemen will fix their eyes upon as coming from the lands, and consider as the measure of the corresponding amount which must be kept up on duties.

Having shown that upwards of two millions of dollars would be payable this year on account of the management and acquisition of the lands, Mr. B. proceeded to compare it with the amount receivable from the lands, and argued that this amount would not be sufficient to meet the expenses upon them. The average receipts of the public lands, from the opening of the sales, had been about a million—say forty millions in as many years. Twice in that time they had risen to three millions, and had immediately afterwards declined. In 1819 they were at three millions, and in three years afterwards at less than one. Two years ago they were at three millions, last year at two; this year unknown, but estimated at two. The average of the last ten years is about a million and three quarters; and when it is considered that there are but few new lands to come into market, that the mass of what is now upon hand is the refuse of ten, twenty, fifty, and even a hundred years' picking under the sales and entries of the United States and the donations of the Kings of France and Spain, it cannot be expected that future sales, unless the price is graduated to the quality, so as to bring the inferior lands into market, will equal those which are past, or pay the expenses fairly chargeable on the lands. A reduction of the price, so as to bring the inferior lands into market, is absolutely necessary to make them pay their expenses; and this is precisely what the President has recommended. He proposes to sell their lands for prices which will reimburse the Government for its expenses; and this is all they ever did do, and more than they will hereafter do unless the price is reduced.

To put this question in a still more convincing point of view, to vanquish all opposition to the President's plan, to show the enormity of the policy which would quarter the lands and the Indians upon the custom-house, and to satisfy every candid man that the lands ought to defray the expenses of the treaty stipulations which they had created, Mr. B. said he would take an inside view of a pair of those treaties—one from the South and one from the North—and show the amount of the charges which they had brought upon the Federal Government, and the cause for which these charges were incurred. He alluded to the States of Mississippi and Indiana—States in which recent treaties for the acquisition of Indian lands had been made, and from each of which States there was one Senator who had heretofore advocated the policy of throwing the expenses of these acquisitions upon the custom-house revenue. He took first the Choctaw treaty, made at Dancing Rabbit creek, in September, 1830; a treaty made exclusively for the purchase of land, and for which the United States had agreed to give: 1st. An annuity of $20,000 for twenty years, which was $400,000: 2. To pay for the education of forty young Choctaws for twenty years, which was now costing the United States $9,100 per annum, making the sum of $182,000 for the whole time: 3. To pay $2,500 a year for twenty years for schoolmasters in the nation, making $50,000: 4. To defray the expenses of removing the nation (19,000 souls) to their new homes west of the Mississippi, $475,000: 5. To furnish subsistence to the nation for one year after removal, at an expense of $608,000. 6. To furnish uniform dresses and swords to ninety-nine chiefs, and pensions to the principal ones, say $40,000. 7. To furnish 2,100 blankets, 400 looms, a rifle and hunting equipments to each warrior; say $15,000: 8. To pay for Choctaw cattle, $12,000: 9. To furnish blacksmiths, millwrights, axes, ploughs, hoes, wheels, cards, iron, steel, &c. &c. for sixteen years, the amount not known; and, in addition to all this, to allow about 1,400 reservations to be selected out of the ceded lands, and sold by the Indians for their own benefit. This treaty, Mr. B. repeated, was made in the fall of 1830; the Indians were to commence removing the next fall, and complete their emigration in three years. They were, therefore, not yet out of the ceded country, and almost the whole of the stipulated payments remained yet to be made by the United States. Was it right—he put it to the candor of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. POINDEXTER] to answer the question—was it right to throw the burden of this expensive treaty upon the custom-house revenue, and take the money which would be received for the lands to be divided among the populous States of the Atlantic sea-board? He [Mr. B.] apprehended that the ceded territory, after deducting the reservations, paying the treaty stipulations, and the expenses of surveying and selling, would never reimburse its cost; still it ought to be bound for the cost as far as it would go, and was actually so bound; for the eighteenth article of the treaty contained a lien upon the land for its payment, and a stipulation against any construction of the words of the treaty to the prejudice of the Indians.

The treaty of the last summer with the Pottawattamie Indians for lands in Indiana was next examined by Mr. B. He said it was purely and simply a sale of land from that tribe to the United States; and, in consideration of that sale, the United States became bound as follows: 1. For the three additional annuities to the different bands of the tribe; one of $20,000 for twenty years; one of $15,000 for twenty years, and one of $15,000 for twelve years, making the whole sum to be paid in annuities $933,000. 2. Assumption of debts to traders, $117,000. 3. Delivery of merchandise to the value of $247,000. 4. Stipulations for education, farming implements, mills, pensions to chiefs, iron, steel, salt, expenses of removal, &c. &c., to an amount which cannot now be ascertained; and, 5. In addition to all this, reservations to the extent of two hundred and seventy sections of land, (175,200 acres,) which would doubtless be taken out of the best of the ceded territory, and greatly diminish the value of the cession. The Senator from Indiana, best acquainted with the value of the ceded territory, [Mr. Tipton,] frankly declared to the Senate, when the treaty was under consideration, that the land was not worth the money to be given for it. The Committee on Indian Affairs was of that opinion, and in a moneyed point of view—as a bargain between the United States and the Pottawattamies—would have advised its rejection. But the State of Indiana was concerned; and to relieve her from the presence of an inconvenient population, to allow full scope for the extension of her laws and the spread of her own population and improvements, the treaty was reported for ratification. Here, then, was another acquisition of land which can never pay its own debt; and Mr. B. put it to the candor of the Senator from Indiana, who had favored the distribution bill, to say whether it was right that this disadvantageous treaty, thus solely ratified for the benefit of his own State, should be thrown upon the custom-house, to aid in keeping up a high tariff to inflame and exasperate the South?

Mr. B. went on to say, that these two treaties, the contents of which he had just examined, were fair specimens and accurate averages of the treaties which had been made for several years past with the Indian tribes east of the Mississippi. The time had gone by when William Penn purchased domains for a few beads and blankets; the time had gone by when this Federal Government instructed its commissioners to allow but a cent an acre for the land which they purchased from the aborigines; the time had gone by when the United States was a land speculator upon the Indian tribes; the tables were turned, and the Indians were now speculators upon the United States. Within the last ten or a dozen years a new state of things had sprung up; a morbid sensibility to Indian wrongs had been excited; missionaries had gone among them to stimulate excessive appropriations for schools, of which they would have the application, without accountability to the United States; politicians had encouraged them to resist the jurisdiction of the States; and then princely revenues must be given to them to induce them to go off quietly and avoid the conflict. These causes had enabled the Indians to have what they pleased for their land; and they had generally pleased to have a great deal more than it was worth. So notorious and inveterate had this spirit become, that the present administration had found it cheaper and more economical to become the trustee rather than the purchaser of Indian lands; to receive their cessions in trust, to be sold for their benefit, turning over the whole proceeds to them, with the deduction of expenses, rather than go on in the old way of buying and selling for profit. On this plan a treaty had just been concluded with the Chickasaw Indians; and as it was an era in our Indian intercourse, and exhibited this administration in the high character of renouncing the character of land speculator on Indians or white people; and had been communicated to Congress in the report of the Secretary of War, (Gov. Cass,) he would ask for the reading of so much of the Secretary's report as related to it.

The Secretary of the Senate then read as follows: "General Coffee has succeeded in concluding a treaty with the Chickasaws, which will lead to their location in the West. The basis of this treaty is different from any heretofore assumed in our negotiations with the Indians. The whole value of the country ceded is assigned to the Chickasaws, and the United States become, in fact, trustees to make the necessary arrangements for their benefit.

"It is stipulated that the ceded territory shall be surveyed and sold, and the whole proceeds, deducting only the actual expenses applied to the various objects enumerated, connected with the temporary subsistence, removal, and permanent establishment of the Indians. A residuary fund is to be vested in some productive stock, and the income to be annually appropriated for the public and private objects stipulated in the treaty. A country for the residence of the tribe is to be procured by themselves, and it is probable they will be able to make a satisfactory arrangement for that purpose with the Choctaws, a kindred people, who are in possession of a much larger district than is required by their numbers.

"No pecuniary benefit will result to the United States from this treaty, but, should it be ratified, it will constitute an important era in our Indian relations. It will probably lead to the establishment of the principle, that, in future cessions of land, the full value shall be secured to the grantors, with such deductions only as may be necessary to carry into effect the objects of the treaties. The advantages to be derived by the United States from these arrangements will be limited to the removal of the Indians from their present unsuitable residences, and to their establishment in a region where we may hope to see them prosperous, contented, and improving. And it cannot be doubted but that a course so consistent with the dictates of justice, and so honorable to the national character, would be approved by public sentiment. Should we hereafter discard all expectation of pecuniary advantage in our purchases from the Indians, and confine ourselves to the great objects of their removal and re-establishment, and take care that the proceeds of the cessions are appropriated and applied to their benefit, and in the most salutary manner, we should go far towards discharging the great moral debt which has come down to us, as an inheritance, from the earlier periods of our history, and which has been unfortunately increased, during successive generations, by circumstances beyond our control. The policy would not be less wise than just. The time has passed away, if it ever existed, when a revenue derived from such a source was necessary to the Government. The remnant of our aboriginal race may well look for the full value, and that usefully applied, of the remnant of those immense possessions which have passed from them to us, and left few substantial evidences of permanent advantage. One great objection to a removal, which has been urged by the most discreet Indians, and by many of our citizens, who are honestly seeking their improvement, is the prospect, judging by the past, that their location west of the Mississippi would be temporary, as they would be soon pressed for new cessions, and would yield, as they have heretofore yielded, to successive applications for this purpose. Although the nature and objects of their removal, and the spirit of the act of Congress which introduced the system, are opposed to such attempts, still the apprehension is entertained, and has proved injurious. Probably no course would better satisfy them upon this subject than the introduction of a principle, which would secure to them the full value of the property, under all circumstances; thus lessening the probability, in their view, of any wish on our part to acquire it, and insuring on theirs, if not the power and disposition to retain it, at least the means of converting it to the greatest advantage."

Mr. B. resumed. He held this arrangement with the Chickasaws to be the best for the United States which had been made for years past with Indians east of the Mississippi. He held it better for the State of Mississippi itself than any that had been made, or could be made, upon the old principles; that it would promptly give to the State all the land within the limits of the treaty for taxation and settlement, and that at graduated prices, adapted to the real value of the various qualities, from richest to poorest. But this exposition was foreign to his purpose. He had asked the reading of the Secretary's report for the purpose of showing that there were to be no more speculations in lands, neither by the Indians on the Government, nor by the Government on its citizens. Formerly, the Government speculated on both; of late, the Indians have got the upper hand; the white people alone were still the victims of speculation to their Government; but this treaty with the Chickasaws, and the new line of policy which it opens, will save the citizens from speculation. The Government will no longer have any interest in the sales; the Indians will sell, and sell quickly, for what the land is worth—for what it will bring—to save the payment of taxes, to acquire a fund to be invested in stock which will yield an annual interest; while the unsold lands will yield nothing, would rise nothing in value, and would suffer from depredations on the timber, which no laws, courts, or agents could prevent.

Mr. B. showed how vain were all the calculations upon the public lands as a source of revenue, or as a fund for distribution. He reminded the elder Senators of what they had heard from an eminent statesman from New York, [the late Mr. RUTUS KIRK,] that the public lands ever had yielded any revenue to the Government; and of the declaration of another eminent statesman, [Mr. MACON, of North Carolina,] that the public lands would be a curse to the Government, and appealed to the whole body of the Senate to say if they were not, at that moment, feeling the truth of both sentiments. No revenue had been derived from the lands in the forty years that Indian titles had been extinguished for a trifle, and the first choices of the lands to be sold; now the Indian titles cost more than the lands were worth; nearly all the new lands were gone; the refuse of innumerable pickings and cullings remained alone to be sold; and the extraction of revenue from them had become as chimerical and ridiculous as the philosopher's attempt to extract sun-beams from cucumbers. The thing was impossible before the new system was fallen upon of receiving the lands as trustee for the Indians, and selling them for their benefit. This new system put an end to the idea of revenue or distribution. It extinguished the bill before the Senate. It left nothing for it to feed upon. It cut it up root and branch. The President was right. His views were wise, patriotic, and statesman-like. He was for settling the new States. He was for multiplying the yeomanry of the country. He was for elevating every cultivator of the soil to the noble and independent rank of a freeholder. He considered freemen as the greatest riches which the country could possess. He was for using the public land paternally, beneficently, wisely, patriotically, as every Government upon the face of the earth, except that of the United States, had always used its vacant soil, by dealing it out cheaply and liberally to settlers and cultivators. For this he was denounced by some, but he would be blessed by others. Millions of voices will rise from the forests of the West, and crown him with honor and gratitude, while the curses of those who want to wring money from the hard hand of the farmer, to divide it among themselves, will be lost in the acclaim of universal benedictions.

The view of the case which he had taken, Mr. B. thought, ought to be conclusive of the fate of the bill, and cause its decisive rejection. He had made it clear, as he hoped and believed, that the President's plan was right; that all idea of profit from the lands ought to be given up; that they ought to be sold to settlers for reimbursing their cost and expenses to the Government; that it would take all they were really worth to do this; that reduced prices, so as to bring the inferior lands into market, were necessary to enable enough to be sold to pay the cost and charges upon them; and that it was the height of injustice and impolicy to take the proceeds of the lands for distribution, without deducting their expenses, and to throw the lands and the Indians upon the custom-house, preventing a reduction of the tariff, and inflaming those discontents of the Union, which it should be the aim of every friend of the Union to allay. Mr. B. thought these views ought to be sufficient to put an end to this bill; but, lest they might not be, he would go on to present another view of it, which, on the principles of its authors, on the ground assumed by themselves in debate, ought to be conclusive of its fate.

He alluded to the payment of the public debt. The advocates of this bill, taking their position upon the assumption that the debt of the revolution being paid, and the lands which had been granted by the States, and pledged by Congress to the redemption of that debt, being released from their pledge, they had a right to consider them as a sort of surplus fund, and to do what they pleased with them. This assumption of the extinction of the public debt, though true in the sense understood by the donors of the land; and by the body of the American people, was untrue in the sense of the term as used by the friends of this bill in the support of other bills. The funded debt of the revolution is indeed paid; but another debt of the revolution has been created by Congress which had not yet been provided for by the levy of unascertained millions. He referred to the revolutionary pensions. Upwards of $5,000,000 will be payable this year on that head; namely, $4,417,655, under the act of the last session, and $931,000 under former acts; making together the sum of $5,348,655. This enormous pension debt, according to the argument of all those who created it, is a debt of the revolution; and it can be no offence to any person to say that the authors of the pension debt, and the supporters of the distribution land bill, are one and the same party, known to all persons as the high tariff party. The period of paying this new debt cannot be foreseen. It becomes greater instead of less. Twelve months ago, the number of pensioners was twelve thousand; they may now be stated at thirty-six thousand, and increasing every day. Upon the principles of the distribution bill, and according to the arguments of its supporters, the division of the land fund should not be made until this new debt was paid. But a new and a strange system of logic has been adopted. Because the lands paid nothing towards the extinction of the true revolutionary debt, they shall pay nothing towards the liquidation of the new one! Because the custom-house has paid the whole of the old debt, and has supported the Government besides, it shall now pay the whole of the new debt, and be saddled in the bargain with the expenses of administering the lands, and purchasing them from the Indians! Could any thing be more iniquitous than this? more false to its own professed principles? more at war with the professions of its supporters? more calculated to exasperate all the States which are asking for a reduction of the tariff, and which are to see their demands answered by throwing an additional burden of three millions upon the customs, which will be made the pretext for keeping up six millions of duties, and may be the cause of preventing any reduction of the tariff, not only at this session, but for years to come?

Mr. B. had hoped that this bill would not have been renewed at this time. There were grave reasons why it should not be. This was an expiring Congress; the last session of the last Congress under the census of 1820, just ready to give way to the new and full representation of the people, founded upon the census of 1830, and to whom it more properly belonged to talk of settling a question of this magnitude. The new States, so vitally affected by this bill, had a right to expect its postponement until they were fully represented; and could not regard this proceeding in any other light than as taking an undue advantage of them, in the moment of their weakness, and before their new strength could be brought into action. The Southern States, so anxious for a reduction of the tariff, had certainly a right to expect that, if there was no reduction of duties, there certainly should be no act to fasten and perpetuate their burdens upon them. But there was another reason which he chiefly relied upon to keep off this bill at the present time; it was the alarm which it created among our red brethren of the forest, recently translated to the west of the Mississippi, under the pledges of this Government that they were to remain forever undisturbed in the new homes provided for them in that remote region. These people are now in the greatest state of alarm and apprehension. They dread a new encroachment of the whites—a fresh demand for cessions of land. The report of the Secretary of War, just read at the table, states the existence of this alarm. Whence its origin? Whence the dread that this Government is to break its faith in the pledge for an undisturbed possession in the very moment of giving that pledge? It is in this bill, and in that report of the Committee on Manufactures of the last session of Congress, in which every acre of the land pledged forever to the Indians for their permanent home is claimed as the property of the United States; its quantity calculated at near a billion of acres! its value computed at a billion and a quarter of dollars! and the whole claimed as a fund for distribution among the whites! in the division and enjoyment of which they were to be employed for five hundred years! No wonder they are alarmed; and that alarm being now known to the supporters of the bill, also known as the friends of the Indians in the Georgia controversy, it might have been expected to produce that postponement of this measure, which the rights of the new States, and the sufferings of the old ones, have in vain solicited. But the expectation is vain. The bill is not delayed; it is pressed; it is pushed; an impatient majority calls for its enactment; the high tariff party are united for it, and as ardent for the spoils of the West as they have been for those of the South. The West must defend itself. The rules of debate have not yet been altered so as to stifle discussion, though attempted to be so altered at the last session in behalf of the Bank of the United States. The minority can still speak; the Senators from the young States can still plead the cause of their constituents; and it becomes their duty to proclaim, from this elevated theatre, the evils of a measure which they may not be able to arrest by their votes.

Mr. B. then went over many prominent objections to the bill, briefly touching upon those which had been dwelt upon by other speakers, and enlarging upon those only which had been least attended to.

He first looked into the constitutional power of Congress to do what this bill assumed to do, namely, to exercise unlimited power over the disposal of the public lands, and the application of their proceeds. This unlimited and irresponsible claim of power over this particular species of property he exposed, and exploded at once, by reciting the very next words in the clause relied upon. The advocates for the claim rested upon the clause in the constitution which authorized Congress to dispose of the territory of the United States, and to make all needful rules and regulations concerning it. Mr. B. showed that the very next words after territory were "other property," so that all the power conferred by the clause over the public lands was also conferred over every other species of property. Private lands acquired from individuals in payment of debts, forts, ships, arsenals, navy yards, munitions of war, houses for the public service, buildings of every kind—all came under the clause of "other property;" and, according to this new version of the power of Congress, might be divided out, given away, or sent to the black colony in Africa, according to the will and pleasure of a majority in any Congress for the time being. Bank stock was property; the United States held seven millions of that stock in the Bank United States. Why not divide it out? Why not put it into the land bill? It would make a division worth having: a million of dollars for New York; six hundred thousand dollars for Pennsylvania; four hundred thousand dollars for Ohio; and a few farthings for such petty corporations as Missouri and Delaware. Money was property; and it was "other property," for it was not land; then why not assume an unlimited and irresponsible power over all the money in the treasury, and deal it out also in a distribution bill? There will be six or seven millions of surplus this year; what a dazzling prize it would make, added to the Bank stock! Two millions for New York; a million and a quarter for Pennsylvania; eight hundred thousand for Ohio! What Senator could venture to vote against such munificence to his State, to his empty-coffered State, loaded with internal improvement debt, and grinding her people with taxes to pay it? It would acquire a bold Senator not to give the vote; and a population of heroic virtue not to dismiss him if he did.

Mr. B. scouted this doctrine of unlimited power over the public lands. He was astonished that any Senator from the West should broach a doctrine so derogatory and so insulting to the new States. According to this unlimited power, not only the proceeds of the lands might be distributed, but the lands themselves. The entire territory of the new States might be bestowed as fiefs of the empire, held in perpetuity by owners in fee, and nothing but tenants admitted to reside in the States. They might never be disposed of at all; Congress might hold them as a reserved treasure, too precious to be used by the present generation; thus defrauding the State of its taxes and population. Congress was the trustee, and not the owner of the lands. It was her duty to dispose of them, and to dispose of them for objects known to the constitution. The lands ceded by the States were given not for division, but for the payment of the public debt; and Congress showed this to be its sense of the gift by immediately pledging them to that object; those acquired from France and Spain were immediately pledged by Congress to the same object. These pledges showed the sense which successive Congresses entertained of their duties, as well as their powers over this property. The grants of land to the new States, and the five per centum of the proceeds of the sales, so often mentioned, all turned upon a different principle—on the principle that the Federal Government being a great landholder in the new States, and paying no taxes, working on no roads, free from all the contributions of other landholders for the improvement of the country, and deriving benefit from their improvements, was bound to contribute, in proportion to her means, to the same objects. The expressions caught at in the President's message, to justify an unlimited assumption of power over the lands, would justify no such thing. Their import is shown by the context, by what immediately follows, and recommends them to be sold for the settlement and improvement of the country, and for the reimbursement of their cost and charges.

Mr. B. trusted that he had shown the fallacy and absurdity of this assumption of unlimited power over the disposal of the public lands; he next undertook to show the unconstitutionality of dividing the lands, or the proceeds, among the States. He held that there was no difference between dividing out the lands themselves, and the money which was received from them; and no difference between dividing this money, and any other money that was found in the treasury. He knew of but two ways for Congress to find its powers in the constitution: first, by an express grant; secondly, by an implication derived from an express grant, and founded in necessity and propriety for the execution of the grant; and he utterly denied that there was an express grant to make this distribution, or any grant of power whatever to which the distribution could be necessary and proper.

Sir, said Mr. B., the primary conception of this bill—its distributive principle—is unconstitutional; its specific enactments, and selection of objects for the application of the distribution, are so many separate, distinct, and accumulated instances of constitutional violation. The assumption of State debts was a new and portentous attack upon the sanctity of that instrument; the more dangerous, because it carried a corrupt temptation along with it. States in debt could only consult their necessities, not the constitution, when the means of paying their debts were exhibited to them from the federal treasury. The practice once begun, it would be immaterial for what purpose the debt was created. The present assumption is for a class of debts which the wildest latitudinarian never pretended could come under the federal expenditure. It is internal improvement, not national, but local, to the State in which they were made; such as a State Legislature directs for the benefit of counties, parishes, and sectional divisions of its territory. The appropriation for general education was a new attempt to violate the constitution at a point at which it had been successfully defended for forty years. The application of the federal funds for the support of a free negro colony on the coast of Africa was now for the first time seriously attempted. It implied the right of Congress to apply those funds in the emancipation of slaves; for the right to remove, and provide for the free blacks, could only be appurtenant to the right to make them free. It implied the right to stretch the constitution of the United States over the continent of Africa; to make it cover two continents, and two distinct races of people; to make it what the enchanted tent was in the Arabian Nights—a thing so small that it might be held in the palm of the hand, and yet so expansible that it might be stretched over the court and army of the Great Mogul.

Passing from these constitutional objections, which he barely enumerated, Mr. B. went on to dilate upon those which applied to its policy and expediency. At the head of this list, he placed the peculiar character, or composition, of the bill itself. It was a compound of ingredients, containing something to suit every palate. Lands and money, roads and canals, free schools and high schools, relief to debtors, emancipation and colonization of slaves! Such was the cargo with which it was freighted! It came into the Senate chamber, with money in every clause, to pay its way through, as the souls of the damned arrived on the banks of the river Styx, with money in hand to pay their passage into hell. The surly Charon never refused a soul that had the money; in this polite assembly, so munificent a bill cannot be turned out of doors. Gentlemen might turn themselves out of doors if they did. A hue and cry might be raised against them if they deprived their constituents of such large douceurs. It was easy to see how such a bill must operate upon the imagination of members; seduction on one hand, terror on the other. To accept the allotted portion might be to pierce the constitution, like the robe of Cæsar, with the stabs of twenty daggers; to reject it, might be to jeopard the occupation of these curule chairs, so dear to the possessors, and so hardly regained when one time lost. It was wrong to put members to choose between such alternatives. It was legislative duress. Morality condemned it; purity recoiled from it; Senatorial dignity should repel it.

Mr. B. next proceeded to lay open the true character of the bill, which, he said, had been smuggled into the Senate under a false name, and covered with a veil—a veil too thin to hide its woolly head and iron heart. It was a tariff bill! calculated to keep up the scale of high duties, and to inflame the discontents of the country. Its high tariff character was proved by its origin, for it emanated from the Committee on Manufactures; it was proved by its supporters, for every high tariff Senator was for it; it was proved by its effects, for its passage would put an end to the bill for the reduction of duties. Far and wide, in Congress and out of Congress, it is hailed as a high tariff measure, as a part of the American system! and to be defended and supported by all the advocates of that system. All the high tariff States are for it. Their Legislatures have adopted it. Their memorials to Congress enforce and demand it. Listen to one of them. Let the Secretary read the last that came in—the memorial from the Vermont Legislature.

The Secretary read:

"Whereas there exists in the country an organized and powerful opposition to the system of protection to domestic industry and enterprise, usually denominated the 'American system,' which has heretofore been considered the settled policy of the Government: and whereas a proposition for the reduction of the tariff duties, to an extent destructive to the leading interests of this portion of the Union, was made by the head of the Treasury Department, sanctioned by the Executive of the General Government himself, at the last session of Congress, which proposition may be renewed under the same auspices: Therefore—

"Resolved, The Governor and Council concurring herein, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives be requested, to oppose any and every modification of the tariff laws which shall have any tendency to weaken or destroy their efficiency as a system of protection to domestic manufactures in their various branches.

"Resolved, The Governor and Council concurring herein, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives be requested, to aid in procuring appropriations for such works of internal improvement as shall, in their opinion, be of general and national importance.

"Resolved, The Governor and Council concurring herein, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives be requested, to use their endeavors to procure a re-charter of the present Bank of the United States, with such powers and provisions as they shall deem most proper for the attainment of the objects of its institution, and most conducive to the general welfare.

"Resolved, The Governor and Council concurring herein, That our Senators be instructed, and our Representatives be requested, to use their influence and their votes to preserve inviolate the integrity, and resist all encroachments upon the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States, and to ensure the independence of the Judiciary in every department.

"Resolved, The Governor and Council concurring herein, That our Representatives in Congress be requested, and our Senators instructed, to use all honorable endeavors to procure the passage of a law which shall effectually protect our citizens engaged in the manufacture of marble from foreign competition.

"Resolved, The Governor and Council concurring herein, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to sustain, by all proper means, a division of the moneys arising from the sale of the public lands, in accordance with the principles contained in the report made by Mr. Clay to the Senate of the United States, at the last session of Congress."

Mr. B. resumed. Here it is! full and complete proof—

JAN. 24, 1833.]

Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

all the way from Vermont. The land bill fairly incorporated into the American system! Last, but not least, youngest, but not weakest, of the family of the American system! Junior brother to the high tariff, internal improvement, re-charter of the Bank of the United States, supremacy of the Supreme Court, and Georgia missionaries into the bargain, if they had not played out their part in the Presidential election, and gone home, with the pardon in their hands, the month after the election, which they refused to take a year before it.

Mr. B. next objected to the distribution itself, as a fallacy, an illusion, and a deception. It was to divide out certain parcels of money with one hand, and to gather back still larger parcels with the other. Fifty or one hundred thousand dollars were to be distributed to a State from the land fund, and twice or thrice that amount to be taken from that same State in taxes upon salt, iron, blankets, flannels, cotton and woollens, and all the comforts and necessities of life. Two millions were to be distributed from the land fund, and three millions, by the admission of the high tariff party, to be retained in its place, in duties upon imports. A retention of three millions of duties is admitted, but every body knows that a pretext will be found in this retention to keep up the whole surplus revenue. To the high tariff States, then, this distribution is a double bounty: first, in giving them the proceeds of the lands; and, secondly, in giving them six or eight millions of additional bounties on manufactures. To the anti-tariff States it is delusive bait—insidious cheat—to beguile them with farthings while plundering them of pounds.

Mr. B. remarked upon the preliminary distribution of 12½ per cent. to the new States, as a falsification of the whole argument on which the bill rested. That argument was, that the lands belonged to all the States; that all were equally interested in them; that this was a broad-bottomed, equal, comprehensive, universal system of exact justice to every one, in opposition to partial and interested legislation in favor of a few; and immense credit was arrogated to themselves, by the authors of the bill, for the impartiality of their conduct in this heroic vindication of universal rights. This was the argument; and what is the fact? Why, a preliminary distribution of 12½ per centum to a few States, and then an equal distribution of the remainder, making, as these very champions of exact and universal justice themselves declared on this floor, a division of one-third of the whole amount to the seven new States! Thus the argument is falsified; and from under this falsification the truth peeps out, that this preliminary distribution is a bribe to the new States to induce them to take the bill—a bribe with their own money, to induce them to submit to the pillage and devastation of the high tariff States!

Mr. B. denounced the bill as unfair, partial, and unjust, in several particulars. First, in not admitting Georgia and Virginia, the two great donors of land to the Federal Government, to the preliminary division of 12½ per cent. on the sales made of the lands which they had bestowed upon the Federal Government. Secondly, in admitting Maine, Massachusetts, and Connecticut to come in for an equal share with other States, without accounting for the proceeds of the lands which they had retained, and were now selling for their own benefit—lands from which Maine and Massachusetts were now deriving at the rate of three hundred thousand dollars per annum; and the Western Reserve in Ohio, from which Connecticut created her school fund of near two millions of dollars. Thirdly, in putting all the States upon an equality with respect to internal improvement, when it was well known that a few favored States had received millions for that object, and others nothing; and when the plainest principles of justice required the deficiency to be made up to the neglected States before the general distribution should commence.

This bill, so far from making up the deficiencies, in fact, goes on to increase the inequality, by giving the most to those which have had most; stuffing and cramming the States which have been gorged, and dribbling crumbs to those which have been famished.

Mr. B. condemned the rule of distribution—that of population—as false and unjust in its application to a system of internal improvement. The extent of the roads and canals, and not the number of people in the State, was the true rule of distribution in such a case. A large State would require long roads, although it might have but a thin population; a small State would require but a short road, be its population ever so great. Population he admitted to be the true rule of distribution where money was to be divided for individual benefit, and each person was to have his own share for his own purposes; but in the case of roads and canals, the number of people was not only not the true rule, but was the reverse of the true one; for dense population implied a rich level country, where artificial roads were least wanted, and easiest made; thin population, a poor, mountainous country, where such roads are most wanted, and least means for making them. Again: roads and canals will last forever; they are not limited in their use to people of this day; they are for distant ages and remote posterity. If we looked to population at all, it should be to the future, and not to the present; it should be to the States as they would be when their limits were full. This would give the size of the State as the rule of distribution, and would substitute territorial extent for population—a rule which would work peculiarly right in this case, because it would give most to the States which had best right to receive most, and the greatest need for it, namely, to Virginia and Georgia, which gave five of the new States to the Federal Government, and to the new States themselves, which would be so cruelly exhausted to raise the money for the rest.

Mr. B. argued against the sufficiency of the twelve and a half per cent. allowed to the new States. It was an allowance for the damage they were about to suffer from the operation of the bill, and was a most inadequate and insufficient compensation even for the pecuniary damage they would suffer. Counting the pecuniary damage alone, it would require fifty per cent. to make it good. There was fifty per cent., in a moneyed point of view, between the bill and the amendment which was proposed to it; which amendment passed the Senate three years ago, and would pass Congress at this time without the least difficulty, had it not been for this bill. The bill keeps up the price of the land to one dollar and twenty-five cents; the amendment reduces the price to one dollar per acre to general purchasers, and fifty cents per acre to actual settlers. Now, observe the practical operation of the two plans. By the bill, a State will receive twelve and a half cents in the dollar upon the sales within her limits; by the bill she will save twenty-five cents per acre on all the sales to general purchasers, and seventy-five cents per acre on all the sales to actual settlers. Upon a sum of $100,000 the State would receive $12,500; under the amendment, she would save about $50,000. Mr. B. was astonished that Senators from the new States, who voted for this bill, and without whose votes it could never pass, should make such bad bargains for their States. They were entitled to fifty per cent., and could easily get it if they held back for that amount. The high tariff party would take the other fifty with thanks, if they could get no more. They would take what they could get, if it was but five per cent.; for it was all clear gain to them. They would take one per cent. before they would miss the chance. They wanted a finger in the pie; and that finger once in, they knew that they would quickly have the whole pie, dish and all, and the pot in which it was cooked. If these Senators really thought they could make no better bargain, yet there was one thing they could do; they could put off the bargain until the new States were fully represented under the new census, and when they could have a fair chance for their own money.

Public Lands.

But Mr. B. utterly denied that the damage to the new States, from the operation of this bill, could be estimated in money. They were to receive injuries from it of a kind which no pecuniary damages could compensate. At the head of these mischiefs stood the acknowledged fact that the passage of the bill would put an end to all hope for any reduction in the price of the public land. Its bare introduction had entirely changed the temper of Congress, and converted many members, who were the advocates of reduced prices for years past, into decided enemies of that measure, and open advocates for the distribution system. So far from reduction, an increase of the price was certain and inevitable. The clause put into the bill to restrain future Congresses from raising the price of the lands, was an acknowledgment of the danger, and a proof of the futility of the remedy. It was adding insult to injury. It implied that the people of the new States were silly enough to believe that this Congress could bind future Congresses by its laws; that this Congress could tie the hands of its successors, and prevent them from altering the price of the public lands. This cunning clause was put in to delude the Western people, and blind them to their danger; but it will have the contrary effect. It will blind no man; on the contrary, it will open his eyes. He will see that there is such a violent disposition just broke out to raise the price of the lands, that Congress, for the first time in the history of the Government, found it necessary to stipulate against it; and he will know that the stipulation is void; that any subsequent Congress may repeal any part of the act it pleases, and substitute any new enactment that it thinks proper. That the price of the lands would be raised, was certain and inevitable. It might not be done by an act of Congress, but it would be done by an act of the new lords and masters of the West; by sending out agents to bid at every sale, to run up the price of every tract, to sue every farmer that took a stick or a stone from public land, to impound the cattle and hogs that eat the public grass and acorns, and to pursue the women and children who gathered up the rotten wood. That all this would take place, Mr. B. said, could well be known from looking to the laws passed by Maine and Massachusetts for selling grass and rotten timber, and prosecuting trespassers on their public lands. He had once read these acts in the Senate, and had lately seen in the newspapers an instance of the rigorous manner in which they were executed, in the prosecution of a man for two acorns! It could not be supposed that Massachusetts and Maine, when they became joint owners of the federal lands, would be more lenient to the remote settlers of the West than to their own citizens; and thus the price of land might be raised double as high as it was at present, without the formality of an act of Congress.

As a further evidence of the intention of the advocates of the bill to raise the price of lands, Mr. B. referred to the brilliant prospects of future large dividends held out in the argument, namely, that in twenty years they should have six millions to divide; forty years hence, twelve millions, and so on; the sum for distribution becoming greater instead of less for five hundred years to come. Such were the calculations of the friends of the bill; and how are the lands, as they get worse, to produce more? The first choices of the land for forty years past have only averaged one million of dollars per annum; and how could the refuse produce six and twelve times as much per annum, unless it was by running up the prices, either by an act of Congress, or by combinations to bid against the settlers? That the price ought to be reduced, every body knew. Nobody opposes it in the new States but old speculators in public land, and new speculators in land scrip, and some politicians who have taken a crooked view of their own and of the public interest. Reduction, so as to adapt the price to the quality, is the voice of the West; and that voice has been heard on this floor by memorials from Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana. The people of these States know that a reduction and graduation of the prices of the land ought to take place; and they know that Congress knows it; for the official reports of the registers and receivers, showing the inferior quality and low value of the unsold lands, is known by the people of those States to be in the possession of Congress. They know, besides, how fresh lands are selling in the State of Maine, under the laws of that State, and the State of Massachusetts, at the one-half the one-fourth, and the one-tenth of what Congress demands for her refuse lands in the West. Here is a list of actual sales in the State of Maine in the year 1828, which shows the price at which that State disposes of her own land to her own citizens, and contrasts strongly with the conduct of the Federal Government to the new States of the West.

It was not only a reduction of prices which was called for by the West, and which this bill would forever prevent, but donations also. Every Government upon the face of the earth, ancient and modern, republican and monarchical, Christian, Mahometan, and Pagan, had made donations of land to their poorer citizens. The Roman republic always did it, giving a double quantity to fathers of families who had three children, or more; the Mexican and South American republics are now all doing it. Great Britain, though a monarchy, is now doing it on our borders, in Canada. She makes a donation of one hundred and fifty acres of land to poor settlers, with farming implements to cultivate it, seed grains to sow it the first year, and a cow and a calf to commence a stock of cattle. This is the conduct of a monarchy—of that monarchy whose dominion we threw off, assigning as one of the reasons for our doing so, as may be seen in the eighth clause of the Declaration of Independence, that the King had raised the conditions of new appropriations of public lands. How sadly the conduct of the Federal Government contrasts with the liberality, wisdom, and justice of all these nations! How much wiser to imitate their example in making donations to poor settlers! How much wiser to adopt the patriotic recommendation of President Jackson, to abandon the idea of deriving revenue from these lands, and look to the freeholders which may be formed upon them as the true wealth and riches of the country.

The next great injury to accrue to the new States from the passage of this bill, Mr. B. showed would be in putting an end to the grant of pre-emption rights on equitable terms. He stated that an immense number of meritorious citizens, generally of small property and young families, had seated themselves on the inferior qualities of the public lands, on tracts of second or third rate land, such as was not worth the Government price, and had made beneficial improvements with a view to purchase the land when able to do so. The labor bestowed upon this land frequently gave it double or treble the value which it had before; and it had been the equitable policy of Congress, heretofore, to allow pre-emption rights to such settlers, whereby they saved their own labor and improvements.

JAN. 24, 1833.]

Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

The whole of this meritorious class would now be sacrificed; no pre-emption rights would be allowed them; their homes would be put up to the highest bidder; heartless speculators and the agents of the old States would bid against the cultivator of the earth for his own sweat and his own labor, and would turn his family out of the house that he had built, and chase himself away from the fields which he had cleared. A clause in the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands proposed to secure these settlers, and let them have their homes at fifty cents per acre. That clause is vehemently opposed by the advocates of the distribution bill. Not only the clause itself is opposed, but the whole class of citizens for whose benefit it is intended are personally assailed, and represented as knaves who would defraud the Government, and as vagabonds to whom lands would be of no value—men who would get their lands by fraud and perjury, and then part with them for nothing. Surely it was enough to deprive these meritorious settlers of their labor, without depriving them also of their characters. It was wrong, on this elevated theatre, to defame such men in order to deny them justice. It increased the bad opinion which our Northeastern brethren entertained of the Western population, and must operate to the prejudice of the West in all time to come.

Prevention of emigration to the new States was the next great evil to which Mr. B. adverted, and he found in the conduct of the high tariff party, in regard to Western emigration, an exact parallel to that of the King of Great Britain in preventing emigration to the American colonies before the revolution. He quoted the words of the Declaration of Independence: "He has endeavored to prevent the population of these States; for that purpose..... refusing to pass laws to encourage their migration thither, and raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands;" and held that they were just as true of the high tariff party at this time, (which controlled the legislation of Congress,) as they were of the King in 1776. He referred to the memorial of the high tariff national convention, presented at the last session, and to the speeches of the advocates of the distribution bill, for proof of this assertion. They were all united in the idea that emigration to the new States was too rapid; that it ought to be checked; and that keeping up the price of the public lands, denying settlement rights, and refusing donations, was the most effectual way to check it. He denounced this whole scheme of checking emigration as contrary to the rights of freemen, and the means of doing it as unjust and oppressive to the West. Tyranny was tyranny, whether it came from a King or a Congress; prevention of emigration was a violation of the rights of man, whether intended to check the growth of colonies or of States; to furnish old England with sailors and soldiers, or New England with work-hands in factories; and the withholding land from the hand of the cultivator was a violation of the beneficent intentions of God, whether withheld by titled monarchs or joint-stock-manufacturing companies. Two other clauses in the bill he pointed out as insults to the people of the new States, namely, the clause which forbids future Congresses to appropriate less than $80,000 per annum to the survey of the public lands, and the clause which permitted the said future Congresses to reduce the price of the lands. Such clauses, like that against raising the price, could only be bottomed on the supposed ignorance of the Western people—a point on which the framers of the bill would find themselves woefully mistaken. Future Congresses would do as they pleased, without regard to the restrictions or permissions of this one. Why not reduce the price of lands now, instead of putting in a nugatory permission for a future Congress to do so? Why insert such an idle and useless provision, except to delude the people with unfounded hopes, and make them acquiesce in this ruinous bill?

Indignity to the States, and assumed authority over their domestic legislation, was another point dwelt upon by Mr. B. He referred to that part of the bill which required the States to use the distributed fund for certain specified purposes, and employed the imperative word "shall" with respect to that use. It was the language of a superior to an inferior—of an empire to its province—of a State to its county—of a county to its parish. It was the language of the master to his servant; and if any State accepted money on these terms, it accepted the price of its own degradation—the wages of its own submission to federal dictation. If distributions for internal improvement, for education, for State debts, for free negro colonization, or for any other designated object, are to be made, it is not by acts of Congress, but by compacts with the States, that it would be done. The obligation of the new States to apply three per cent. of the proceeds of the public lands to the construction of roads and canals, was an obligation voluntarily assumed by the States in compacts with the Federal Government, and were not regulations imposed upon them by acts of Congress. This bill proposes to add thirteen and a half per cent. to that fund, by law, and to order its application to specified objects. Compacts were the true mode of creating that fund; they are still the true mode of increasing it. It is the only mode which is compatible with the independence of State legislation—Mr. B. would not say State sovereignty—that phrase is the watchword of a new argument; and he would put it to all who contended for the rights of the States to say, if this attempt to impose obligations upon the States by act of Congress, instead of inviting them to assume these obligations by voluntary compacts, is not the most dangerous of all the attempts ever made upon those rights, because covered with the disguise of beneficence, and accompanied by the seductive temptation of money?

Mr. B. commented upon an expression often used in this debate by the friends of the bill; it was the expression "settle;" and referred to the land question, and the internal improvement question, which it was assumed this bill would adjust and regulate. He thought it a very gratuitous use of the phrase. With respect to internal improvement, it proposed no settlement of the question, and could make none. The whole question was left open to Congress to go on forever, as it had done for many years past, with sectional and partial appropriations. A compact with the States, by which Congress would bind itself to make no appropriations for new objects, and the States would bind themselves to apply such limited amount of surplus revenue as they would consent to receive to objects of internal improvement, was the only mode short of a constitutional amendment which could settle it. In another sense, he said the word "settle," as it applied to the lands, was unfounded in fact; for it only proposed an arrangement which was to last for five years; and, so far from settling any thing, would actually bring up the whole subject of disposing of the public lands with the next periodical approach of the Presidential election. He insisted that this was not the Congress to settle the land question. The next Congress would be the proper one, when the new States would be fully represented, and when the people should have had time to read and consider the President's message.

Mr. B. said, it seemed to be taken for granted, that this bill was to pass, and was to be received by the whole Union with unbounded applause. He thought otherwise, both as to its passing and as to its favorable reception. No distribution bill had ever yet got through Congress. Many had been attempted, and all had failed. He instanced the repeated attempts to divide the public lands for education; the attempts to divide five millions of revenue among the States; the proposed distribution of the bank bonus at the last session. The distribution now proposed was infinitely more obnoxious than any, or all put together, that had preceded it, and might share the same fate. The signs were against it. Few voices, and those few entirely of the high tariff school, are raised for it on this floor. All the Senators who opposed it last year have met the approbation of their constituents. The great State of New York did not condemn her late Senator, [Mr. MARCY,] now her Governor, for refusing to take the immense distributive portion which was proffered to her; the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HILL] has not been condemned for rejecting the douceur offered to the granite State; on the contrary, his vote has been sanctioned by an immense majority of the Legislature of the State; the Senator from Indiana, who, opposed the bill, [Mr. TIPPON,] has been re-elected, maugre the 120,000 acres of land, the preliminary division of twelve and a half per cent., and the subsequent pro rata division with the other States. He himself [Mr. B.] had again been honored with the confidence of his State, although it had been carefully spread in all directions that he had deprived her of a gift of 500,000 acres of land, and two large dividends of money. Not a single State had raised its voice in favor of this bill, but those which cried out at the same time for more tariff, and which saw in this bill the three-fold gratification of keeping up at least three millions of unnecessary import duties, checking emigration to the West, and laying that great region under contribution for five hundred years to come.

The duration of this bill was a point to which Mr. B. invoked the attention of the Senate. It had upon its title the feature of limitation; it was to divide for a limited time the proceeds of the sales; and a section in the bill specified this time at five years. But what was the argument in favor of it? Why, that twenty years hence this bill will produce six millions of dollars for division; and forty years hence it will produce twelve millions; and five hundred years hence, Congress would still be engaged in levying money from the new States and giving it to the old ones. Thus, the nominal limitation was a deception—a false light, and a delusive hope, to lure the new States into the power of their adversaries, and to bind them eternally, when pretending to make a mere temporary arrangement for five years only.

Mr. B. had examined most of the obnoxious features of the bill, but there was one feature which could not be passed with the incidental notice which had been bestowed upon it. It was that provision which proposed a donation of land to six of the new States. The brief history of these land donations was in the knowledge and the memory of the Senate. Congress, heretofore, had granted one million of acres of land to Ohio for roads and canals, and nearly half a million each to the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Alabama, for the same purpose. All these grants were made upon the universally understood principle, that the United States, as a great landholder in these States, paying no taxes, working on no roads, and having the use of all the State roads for her mails and troops, was bound to contribute to the general improvement of the country. The reason which applied to Ohio and the other named States, applied with equal or greater force in behalf of Missouri, Mississippi, and Louisiana, each of which had immense quantities of public lands within its limits, and had never received either donations of land, or appropriations of money, for objects of internal improvement. To put these States somewhat on a footing with the others, he, (Mr. B.) at an early period of the last session, had brought in a bill to grant to Missouri half the quantity of land which Ohio had received; the Senators from Louisiana and Mississippi added amendments to make equal grants to their respective States; and in this form the bill received the favorable consideration of the Senate; was ordered to its third reading; was engrossed, and actually read a third time, (see Journal, page 358,) when it was laid upon the table, chiefly by the votes of those who were in favor of the distribution bill, and afterwards taken up by the friends of that bill, incorporated with it, and additional grants allowed to Indiana and Illinois, to make up their quantities equal to half a million each. The distribution bill, thus freighted with the Missouri bill, passed the Senate, was lost in the House of Representatives, and brought forward again at this session with the Missouri bill in it, although he (Mr. B.) had again introduced it as a separate measure. To all this proceeding Mr. B. expressed his strongest condemnation. His bill was a separate measure, resting upon its own merits, no way dependent upon the distribution bill, and entitled to its separate consideration and decision, as the grants to Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois had been separately decided. To put it into the distribution bill, was to entangle it in the fate of a bill with which it had no connexion, and by which it had been delayed in its passage for a year, and might be delayed as much longer. It was also to lay him under the necessity of voting against his own bill, as he could not take it in company with the distribution bill; and thus furnish a topic for electioneering against him in his State—a topic which had been freely used, but without any effect, thanks to the intelligence of the people of Missouri, who quickly comprehended the manœuvre, and thanks to their high spirit, which despised it. The distribution bill is now again depending with all these grants of land in it, and must have an effect upon its passage—perhaps be the means of getting it through. One Senator, at least, the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. POINDEXTER,] who advocates the distribution bill, lays great stress upon this donation of half a million of acres to his own State, and seems to dread the censure of his constituents if he should lose the chance of securing so large a grant, though certainly he ought to be the last person to found an argument of self-alarm on that circumstance, as it was on his own motion that this grant to his State, and the other States, had been incorporated in the distribution bill. Another reason why that Senator should not be uneasy is, the known facts, just mentioned, that these separate grants had substantially once passed the Senate, when the bill containing them was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; that they had afterwards passed as a part of the distribution bill; and the sense of the Senate having been thus shown in their favor, there could be no doubt of their passage in a separate bill; unless, indeed, it was to be admitted that they were put into the distribution bill for the purpose of creating an interest to carry it through—an admission so derogatory to the Senate, that it could not be believed until it was recorded.

Mr. B. made an animated appeal to the Senate against the corrupting tendencies of the distributive system. He rapidly traced its ruinous effect upon the Roman elections, from the small beginning when candidates for the consulship would procure distribution of the public corn to the poorer class of voters, down to the time when the aspirants to the imperial diadem openly bid against each other for the support of the prætorian cohorts, and promised each soldier so many pounds of gold out of the public treasury for his vote. He warned the Senate not to commence such a system in this America. Its inevitable tendency was to run into the gulf of corruption, and to put up the highest office of the republic at auction sale. If the voters once condescended to receive distributions, whether from a public or private fund, the next step would inevitably be to look out for the hand that could, and would, distribute most. Private fortunes, in this country, could not furnish the means of lavishing benefactions on millions of voters; the public funds could alone do it; and he called upon all considerate men to say where the practice would stop, if it once began?

In conclusion, Mr. B. took occasion to present the true question which was now at issue. It was not a question of taking the lands from the old States by the new ones. No such idea existed in the new States. It took no root among the people when brought forward by some individuals four or five years ago. It was then discountenanced, as unfounded in itself, and prejudicial to the new States. To charge the new States with a design to seize upon these lands, in order to justify the old States in seizing upon them themselves, was to aggravate injustice by calumny. The true question was one of the reduction of the price of the lands, and a graduation of the price according to the quality. This is what the new States demand; it is what President Jackson recommends; and it is what the Committee on Public Lands report in their amendment. The question lies between the plan recommended by the President, and the distribution plan proposed by the Committee on Manufactures; between the plan which would make the lands pay their own expenses; which would dispose of them to the people on equitable terms; which would fill the new States with freeholders, and give them in a reasonable time the use of all the territory within their limits for cultivation and taxation, and prevent them from being forever drained of their money to be expended in another quarter; the question lies between this wise, patriotic, and republican plan on one side, and between an unwise, unjust, and anti-republican plan on the other side, to throw the expenses of the lands and the Indians on the custom-house revenue; to keep up many millions of unnecessary revenue on imports, to the discontent and peril of the Union; to fill the new States with tenants, and the old ones with paupers; to make the new States the everlasting tributaries of countless millions to the old ones; and to gorge the high tariff States with the spoils of the West after having long fattened them upon the spoils of the South. This is the question now submitted to the Senate; and if the bill is not driven through at this session, it will be the question before the oppressed part of the American people—a question in which they will have justice and Jackson on their side; and in which victory will be true to them, if they are not false to themselves.

The question being on the fourth and last section of the amendment, directing the Secretary of the Treasury, under certain circumstances, to discontinue and alter land districts—

Mr. BLACK moved to amend the amendment, so as to leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue offices, instead of making it a duty obligatory upon him. This amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question was then taken on the section as amended, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bell, Black, Chambers, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wilkins.—27.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buckner, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Robinson, Smith, Tyler, Waggaman, White, Wright.—17.

The question then recurred upon the substitute reported by the Committee on the Public Lands, (in lieu of the original bill,) providing for a reduction of the price, and granting pre-emptions to actual settlers on the public lands; and was negatived, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buckner, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King, Mangum, Moore, Robinson, Smith, Tipton, White, Wright.—17.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Calhoun, Chambers, Clayton, Dallas, Dudley, Dickerson, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Miller, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggaman, Wilkins.—26.

So the substitute of the Committee on Public Lands was rejected.

Mr. BENTON then moved to amend the bill in the fifth section, by striking out the specific quantities of lands granted to the States named, and inserting a general proviso, that each of the other States named shall have as much land granted as will make each stand on an equal footing with Ohio.

Mr. FORSYTH asked how many millions of acres this amendment would grant away?

Mr. BENTON replied that the number granted to Ohio was one million six thousand acres.

Mr. EWING explained the particular circumstances under which Ohio had received so large a grant.

Mr. HENDRICKS suggested a modification, which was accepted by the mover, and made a few remarks in favor of the amendment.

Mr. CLAY explained his reasons for opposing this amendment.

Mr. KANE briefly supported the amendment, when

Mr. FORSYTH moved (at 5 o'clock) that the Senate now adjourn. Negatived, yeas 21—nays 23.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. BENTON.

Mr. MOORE made some remarks in defence of the proposition.

Mr. BUCKNER then spoke until six o'clock, in favor of the amendment.

After Mr. BUCKNER had concluded,

Mr. SMITH moved that the Senate now adjourn. Lost, yeas 16—nays 20.

Mr. BENTON then addressed the Senate in support of his motion to amend; after which, the question was taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buckner, Dallas, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, Moore, Robinson, Ruggles, Tipton.—12.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Miller, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tomlinson, White, Wilkins, Wright.—26.

So Mr. B.'s amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE moved to amend the bill by requiring that the land granted to the State of Alabama should be applied in aid of the improvement of the navigation of the Tennessee and other rivers.

This motion was supported by Mr. MOORE, and opposed by Messrs. KING and CLAY, and negatived.

Mr. BENTON then moved to amend the bill by inserting, in the second section, a provision, that before any division of the proceeds, there should be a deduction of all the expenses of the administration of the public lands, of contracts made with the Indians, &c. Rejected, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buckner, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Robinson, White, Wright.—14.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Miller, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Wilkins.—24.

Mr. FORSYTH asked if it was the wish of the friends of the bill to push it to a third reading.

Mr. CLAY said it was their wish to do this.

Mr. FORSYTH then moved to amend the bill in the second section by striking out the words "colonization of free persons of color."

Some discussion took place on this question, in which Mr. FORSYTH, Mr. CLAY, and Mr. CHAMBERS took part.

Mr. GRUNDY said, although he had been much instructed by the arguments which he had listened to in the course of the day, still it should not be forgotten that man could not live on speeches alone, and he would therefore move to adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was lost.

The question was then taken on Mr. FORSYTH's amendment, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buckner, Dallas, Dudley, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King, Mangum, Moore, Robinson, Tipton, Waggaman, White, Wright.—18.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Dickerson, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tomlinson, Wilkins.—21.

Mr. MANGUM then moved to strike out all the restrictions on the States, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the question being taken, was decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buckner, Dallas, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King, Mangum, Moore, Robinson, Tipton, White, Wright.—16.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Wilkins.—23.

The bill being then reported as amended, and the amendments concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

At a quarter before eight o'clock, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 25.

CONSTITUTIONAL POWERS.

Mr. CLAYTON rose for the purpose of submitting a resolution for the consideration of the Senate. The gentleman from South Carolina, near him, [Mr. CALHOUN,] had on Tuesday offered resolutions declaratory of the powers of the Government and the States, which had been made the order of the day for Monday next. To these resolutions the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAUNDS] had proposed amendments, which were printed, and were to be moved again whenever the original resolutions should be considered. These amendments, while they declare the several acts of Congress laying duties on imports to be constitutional, and deny the power of a single State to annul them, or any other constitutional law, tacitly yield the whole doctrine of nullification, by the implied admission that any unconstitutional law may be judged of by the State in the last resort, and annulled by the same authority. He dissented from this doctrine; and if he had rightly considered the proposed amendments, it became his duty to place on record his own sentiments and that of the State he, in part, represented, on this most important subject, affirming the just powers of this Government, and repudiating the whole doctrine contended for and asserted in the resolutions of the gentleman from South Carolina. Differing on this subject, as he formerly had in debate here, from the gentleman from Tennessee, he knew no middle ground on which they could meet, no point of concession to which he should be willing to go, short of a full recognition of the true principles of the constitution, as asserted in the resolution he was about to offer. He then submitted the following resolution, which was read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate:

Resolved, That the power to annul the several acts of Congress imposing duties on imports, or any other law of the United States, when assumed by a single State, is "incompatible with the existence of the Union, contradicted expressly by the letter of the constitution, unauthorized by its spirit, inconsistent with every principle on which it was founded, and destructive of the great object for which it was formed;" that the people of these United States are, for the purposes enumerated in their constitution, one people and a single nation, having delegated full power to their common agents to preserve and defend their national interests for the purpose of attaining the great end of all government—the safety and happiness of the governed; that while the constitution does provide for the interest and safety of all the States, it does not secure all the rights of independent sovereignty to any; that the allegiance of the people is rightfully due, as it has been freely given, to the General Government, to the extent of all the sovereign power expressly ceded to that Government by the constitution; that the Supreme Court of the United States is the proper and only tribunal in the last resort for the decision of all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made under their authority; that resistance to the laws, founded on the inherent and inalienable right of all men to resist oppression, is in its nature revolutionary and extra-constitutional; and that, entertaining these views, the Senate of the United States, while willing to concede every thing to any honest difference of opinion which can be yielded consistently with the honor and interest of the nation, will not fail, in the faithful discharge of its most solemn duty, to support the Executive in the just administration of the Government, and clothe it with all constitutional power necessary to the faithful execution of the laws and the preservation of the Union.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill appropriating, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, &c. was read a third time.

Mr. WILKINS then rose and stated, that last evening, when some of the amendments proposed in the public lands bill were under consideration, several of the Senators were absent. He was willing that in reference to one of these questions a fuller expression of the sense of the Senate should be taken; but he was desirous that the motion he was about to make should not be received as indicating any change of opinion on his part. He then moved to reconsider the vote of last evening, by which the Senate refused to strike out the words "colonization of free persons of color."

Some conversation took place on the point of order, and then on the propriety of the motion; and the question being finally taken, the motion was decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buckner, Calhoun, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Rives, Robinson, White, Wilkins, Wright.—18.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Tyler, Webster.—27.

Mr. FORSYTH then moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to strike out the words "colonization of free people of color." In support of his motion, he said many of the managers of the Colonization Society are well known and distinguished. At their annual meeting there had been an evident wish manifested to turn the attention of the public to the society, and enlist the Government in its behalf. Two of our most distinguished citizens, President Madison and Chief Justice Marshall, had expressed their views in relation to the Society. The former had suggested an appropriation of the public lands to the objects of the society; but he also had doubted the power of Congress to make it, and had proposed that the constitution should be so altered as to confer the power. Mr. Marshall was both in favor of the appropriations, and deemed it now constitutional. But Mr. F. thought there was a general impression on the minds of Congress that the Government does not possess the power. He said the object of the bill was to do indirectly what Congress felt it had not the power to do directly. If the bill pass, what will follow? The Colonization Society has no official or political weight or importance; and what will be the consequences of their sending out fifteen hundred or two thousand colonists to the coast of Africa? Every one may do as he pleases with regard to it in his individual capacity, but I desire that it may not be connected with the Government.

The Senator from Kentucky thinks it will perform wonders. The original object was to get rid of the free people of color; but that can be done without the aid of the Government. Now, sir, there is another project, and a very great one; one that is to command the approval of all—the civilization of Africa. It is thought that this can best be done by means of colonies. But look, sir, at Liberia. Here I have a map of the territorial property, of the sovereign jurisdiction of the Colonization Society of the city of Washington, by the Rev. J. Ashmun. [Here he read some remarks from the map, on the territorial jurisdiction of the society.] Sir, this society goes beyond the European notion of acquiring jurisdiction. European sovereignties obtained it by discovery and purchase; the society by purchase alone; and on this sole ground of sovereignty they were actually exerting their authority over twenty thousand people, and expect soon to exert it over one hundred and fifty thousand—the inhabitants of the territory which they hold, two hundred and eighty miles by thirty, over which their jurisdiction extends. Wars have been waged, and blood has been shed. In the early time of the colony it was attacked by the natives, and three hundred were killed. The agent of the society has waged war; tribes and towns have been conquered; and the spoils divided among the victors. Sir, in most cases of this kind, a claim would have been made on this Government for damages. If the colony were now attacked and destroyed by the resentment which it has provoked, no constitutional power of this Government could hinder its destruction. But if this bill pass, the Government will be involved in its defence. Europe will not allow a colony in Africa thus to grow up and extend, unmolested, while under so feeble prohibition. They will wrest it from the society, unless Government interposes. This bill is a commitment of the Government to protect the colony against all the world. The powers of Government were granted for no such purpose. Mr. F. concluded by saying, that he would dwell no longer on the subject, and that he would not believe that it was the wish of Government to do indirectly what it could not do directly.

Mr. TYLER remarked that there were two other propositions quite as obnoxious to the constitution as the one which had been noticed. Conferring on States the power and the means of internal improvement, and an appropriation, through States, to education, he considered as equally unconstitutional. If one was stricken out, he was in favor of erasing the whole. He preferred that discretionary power of appropriation should remain in the States. He moved to strike out the words designating the three specific objects of appropriation.

Mr. FORSYTH withdrew his motion.

Mr. CLAY asked a division of the question, so as first to consider the general question of recommitting at all.

Mr. FORSYTH inquired whether it could be divided, under the circumstances of the case.

The CHAIR decided that it could. A brief discussion ensued, until Mr. CLAY read from the rules a confirmation of the decision of the President.

On the question of recommitment, there were yeas 20, nays 23.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he rose to move the postponement of the bill until the first Monday in December next. In making this motion, he felt that the subject was one of very deep interest. In proposing to postpone it until the next session, he wished to be understood as intending to intimate a desire on his part to use whatever influence he might have to adjust a question which had already produced considerable agitation, and which must continue to increase, until it became permanently settled.

He could not yield his assent to the mode which this bill proposed to settle the agitated question of the public lands. In addition to several objections of a minor character, he had an insuperable objection to the leading principle of the bill, which proposed to distribute the proceeds of the lands among the States. He believed it to be both dangerous and unconstitutional. He could not assent to the principle, that Congress had a right to denationalize the public funds. He agreed that the objection was not so decided in case of the proceeds of lands, as in that of revenue collected from taxes or duties. The Senator from Ohio had adduced evidence from the deed of cession, which certainly countenanced the idea that the proceeds of the lands might be subject to the distribution proposed in the bill; but he was far from being satisfied that the argument was solid or conclusive. If the principle of distribution could be confined to the proceeds of the lands, he would acknowledge that his objection to the principle would be weakened.

He dreaded the force of precedent, and he foresaw that the time would come when the example of the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands would be urged as a reason for distributing the revenue derived from other sources. Nor would the argument be devoid of plausibility. If we, of the Atlantic States, insist that the revenue of the West, derived from lands, should be equally distributed among all the States, we must not be surprised if the interior States should, in like manner, insist to distribute the proceeds of the customs, the great source of revenue in the Atlantic States. Should such a movement be successful, it must be obvious to every one, who is the least acquainted with the workings of the human heart, and the nature of Government, that nothing would more certainly endanger the existence of the Union. The revenue is the power of the State, and to distribute its revenue is to dissolve its power into its original elements.

All must see and deplore the conflict of interest which had grown up under the system. In the West, there is the great question of the public lands. In the South, that of free trade. In the East, the tariff, or the protection of those interests which have grown up under the existing system of taxation. So there must be added a question of a more general nature, but not much less important. He referred to the currency. The most unthinking must see that these great distracting questions endangered the existence of the Union itself. He knew not that it could survive their shocks, but was satisfied that its security would require an early adjustment.

As to the particular question under consideration, he, individually, would prefer an adjustment founded on the application of the proceeds of the lands to opening the great arteries of inter-communication between the parts of the country, in which the States where the lands are situated are more particularly interested. But in the present state of things, that would be impossible. The whole South, and particularly the State which he had the honor to represent, had insuperable constitutional objections, which ought to be respected. They could not be overcome but by an amendment of the constitution. He had been of opinion, for several years, that the wisest course, under our existing difficulties, would be to convene the stockholders—to call a meeting of the States in convention—the very power which formed the system, and which alone had adequate authority to terminate these dangerous conflicts. He feared, however, that the course was too rational to be adopted; that passions and prejudices were too strong, at this moment, to act deliberately on this great subject. Still, he did not despair—time and reflection might do much; and as there could not be much danger from a delay of a few months, he had made the motion to postpone the subject until the commencement of the next session, when he would be prepared to use his hearty co-operation to bring the subject, if possible, to a satisfactory adjustment.

Mr. CLAY objected to the postponement. He saw no sufficient reason for it. The Senate had been occupied for weeks in carrying the bill thus far; and if it were now postponed, there was no prospect that December next would present circumstances any more favorable for its passage than those of the present time. If the Senate should wait for a convention of the States, as suggested by the Senator, for a meeting of the stockholders of the public lands, he feared it would be long, very long, before this bill would pass. [Mr. CALHOUN assented.] The Senator thinks that the Union cannot be preserved under such evils as this bill is calculated to bring upon the country. Sir, I believe it is impossible to destroy the Union. It is bound together by every consideration of principle and mutual advantage. The suggestion of the Senator itself requires that the bill should go on this session. It is felt every where that no question is of more importance than the public lands; and it is becoming every day more and more important. Sir, I congratulate you, the Senate, and the country, that an amicable, propitious, and just settlement is in prospect, of this great question.

Mr. C. inquired how this question would be settled next December? By appropriating the whole land revenue to the purpose of internal improvement? But the Senator himself had said that such an adjustment of the question would never be acquiesced in by the South. What new mode of adjustment does he propose? Sir, let us take these great and important questions one by one, and dispose of them in succession, without confusion. The subject of the public lands is now before us; let us settle it now. This bill may merge itself in internal improvement; and if it pass, it may also settle that other great question. Every consideration of peace and harmony urge us to allay divisions now, and, above all others, the passage of this bill.

The Senator says the bill is unjust. I should like to hear from him in what respect it is unjust. He says it is dangerous. Sir, we will endeavor to place this subject on safe ground. Both last session and this, particular care was taken to restrain the scope of the bill. It cannot be applied to a distribution of the general revenue. But even if it could, the precedent is already established. The practice of such distribution of the general revenue has been coeval with the Government. I hope there will be a general acquiescence of the Senate in the passage of the bill, that it may go to the House to meet its fate. I regret any disposition unnecessarily to retard its progress.

The question of postponement resulted as follows: Yeas 21—Nays 24.

The bill was then passed by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bell, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Poindexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tomlinson, Waggonman, Wilkins—24.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benfon, Black, Brown, Buckner, Calhoun, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Rives, Robinson, Smith, Tipton, Tyler, White, Wright—20.

MONDAY, JANUARY 28.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The Senate, agreeably to the order of the day, proceeded to the consideration of the resolutions offered by Mr. CALHOUN, in reference to the powers of the General Government when in conflict with those of the States.

The resolutions were read, and also the resolutions moved by Mr. GAUNDX by way of amendment or substitute therefor. When

Mr. MANGUM rose and stated, that it was on his motion, some days ago, that these resolutions had been postponed, and made the order for to-day. The motives which had governed him, in making the motion at that time, operated on him at this moment to make a further postponement. He could not perceive that there was any good which was likely to arise, either to the country, or to the individual State which was immediately concerned, from the present discussion of the momentous principles which were involved in these resolutions, and the only effect of which would be to create an excitement mischievous in its tendency, and the issue of which could not be anticipated. It had been his hope that before this time there would have been a salutary action of the other branch of the Legislature, which would have dispensed with the necessity of any hasty action of this branch on a subject of such vast importance. With a view to the restoration of tranquillity, he had hoped that the measure now pending in the other House would have been by this time brought to a happy result; and that by this result the discontents which, in a particular manner, existed in one State of the Union, and which, in a less degree, prevailed in many others, would have been conciliated and soothed into harmony. He was aware that, in a certain quarter, there was a strong disposition to press upon the public mind, and to bring to a conclusion, the vital question which now agitated the people. But having, as he believed he had, accounts of the movements in that quarter, on which he could place the most implicit reliance, he entertained the belief that there was no ground to apprehend any dangerous movements. He still continued to hope, for he yet preserved his confidence in the good feeling, the justice, and the conciliating disposition of Congress, that the bill now pending in the other House would be passed without further delay, and that thus tranquillity would be substituted for the discontents which were now so prevalent; and cherishing this hope, he intended now to move to postpone the further consideration of these resolutions and the amendment until Thursday next, and to make them the special order for that day. He would state at this time, that if there should have been no special action in the House upon this subject before that time, he should then be induced to move a further postponement of the resolutions for a few days. He therefore expressed his hope that they who were understood to be the personal friends of the Executive would make exertions to bring the matter to a peaceful issue, by urging the progress of the bill which was now pending; and that they would not, by pressing, at this moment, topics of so momentous a character, evince a disposition to prevent the other branch from having ample time for full deliberation and discussion. He did not intend, by his motion, to cut off debate, or to prevent the final action of Congress on the resolutions, as well as on all the great subjects which had now been submitted for legislative deliberation. He would now move the postponement which he had indicated; and he appealed to the gentleman from South Carolina to accede to his proposition, and still to evince a disposition to trust that the sense of justice, and the love of peace and of union, would operate in Congress with such force, that all these exciting questions would be settled to the satisfaction and happiness of all. He then moved to postpone the further consideration of the resolutions and amendments, and to make them the special order for Thursday next.

Mr. FOOT suggested to the Chair that there had been offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] another set of resolutions, as an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, which were also ordered to be printed. He asked for the reading of these resolutions.

Mr. CLAYTON rose, and requested the Senator from North Carolina to withdraw his motion to postpone, in order to allow him the opportunity of offering, by way of amendment, the resolutions which he had already laid on the table.

Mr. MANGUM withdrew his motion.

Mr. CLAYTON then moved to amend the amendment offered by Mr. GRUNDY, by inserting the resolutions which he had laid before the Senate on Friday last. He expressed his entire acquiescence in the motion to postpone; and one of his reasons for this acquiescence was, that, standing among the resolutions, if this subject were now to be taken up for discussion, it must, of necessity, give way at one o'clock to the special order of the day; and he wished that a debate so important in its character should be uninterrupted.

Mr. MANGUM now renewed his motion to postpone. In doing this, he expressed a hope that the gentleman from South Carolina would not suppose that he had any desire to give the go-by to his resolutions, or to prevent them from being submitted for the solemn deliberation of the Senate.

Mr. WEBSTER then rose and said, that, for one, he was disposed to allow the gentlemen from South Carolina to select their own time for the consideration of these resolutions; and, so far as they were concerned, he would be entirely unwilling to interrupt any arrangement which might be made between the Senator from South Carolina and the gentleman from North Carolina. But if he rightly understood the motives by which the Senator from North Carolina had avowed himself to be actuated, the very same motives which now operated upon him to move the postponement of these resolutions, might, in ten minutes more, when the special order should be taken up, induce him to move also the postponement of the bill. He perceived that he did not misunderstand the object of the honorable Senator; and if that gentleman should make such motion in reference to the bill, he, for one, would be found voting in opposition to the motion. It was his wish to go at once into the consideration of these important topics, and not to shun or to postpone the discussion. He would himself prefer that the resolutions and amendments should be made the special order of the day, so that they might be taken up and discussed in connexion with the bill itself, and thus the widest range of debate would be opened. But in that view, also, he had the utmost disposition to defer to the wishes of the gentleman from South Carolina. Should it be the desire of that gentleman that the subjects be taken up for consideration separately, and apart, he would at once yield his own inclinations. - But he could not consent to postpone the discussion of the bill until Thursday. If the gentleman from South Carolina desired to postpone the consideration of the resolutions, and to go at once into deliberation on the provisions of the bill, that gentleman should have his vote in carrying his wishes into effect.

Mr. CALHOUN suggested that perhaps the object of all might be accomplished, were the gentleman from North Carolina so to modify his motion, as merely to postpone the further consideration of the resolutions until to-morrow. He understood the Senator from North Carolina as signifying his assent to this suggestion.

But before he resumed his seat, he had to make a request of the Senator from Tennessee, as an act of justice—a sheer act of justice—which he had a right to claim at his hands, that he would withdraw the amendment which he had offered as a substitute for his resolutions. The State of South Carolina, acting in her sovereign capacity, and in defiance of the rights reserved to her by the constitution, had found it necessary to annul an act of Congress. The President of the United States, considering the State as a mere mass of individuals, assuming to exercise rights to which they were not entitled, had recommended to Congress the adoption of certain measures; and to this recommendation the Committee on the Judiciary had responded. He, standing there as one of the representatives of the State of South Carolina, most unworthy to represent her at such an awful crisis, had submitted a series of propositions, with a view to bring the true question at once before the world. He had drawn up these resolutions with the utmost care, and with the most scrupulous attention to the meaning of the language; he had not admitted a proposition which was not true—he did not intend to say merely which he did not think to be true, but which was not actually true. This, then, was the plea in bar which he had put in on the part of South Carolina. He had interposed between the President of the United States and the State of South Carolina this plea in bar.

He had interposed the constitution between South Carolina and the bill which had been reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, at the recommendation of the Executive—a bill which he viewed as worse than an abomination—a bill to create a dictator, to erect a military despotism, and, let it be disguised as it might, to make war upon a sovereign State. As the plea of South Carolina in bar against this bill, he had interposed that sacred—did he say sacred?—No, no, that despised instrument, the constitution, in the hope that it might arrest the step of unhallowed power, and bring back the measures of the General Government to the limits of constitutional right. And how had he been met, when he put in their plea? Instead of being met by a plain and manly denial of the facts stated in his resolutions, another plea had been put in, in opposition to his; and the result was, that they must be both considered in conjunction with each other, and that thus, his propositions would not be disposed of in reference to the single principles which they declared.

There never was an individual, however culpable, who, standing in the situation of a common culprit, whatever the nature of his crime, was not allowed, as a matter of right, to put in his own plea. But, in this case, the plea of a sovereign State of the Union was overlaid by another plea, with a view to prevent a judgment on its merits. He demanded, therefore, of the Senator from Tennessee to withdraw his amendment, in order that the question might not be subjected to embarrassment and difficulty, but that it might be taken on the facts laid down in the resolutions, and with a view to the argument by which those facts were to be sustained—facts and arguments which were so clear that no one could entertain a doubt respecting them. He concluded with a request that the Senator from Tennessee would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. GRUNDY said that he never in his life had felt an unwillingness to do an act of justice; but that the conclusion as to what was an act of justice, must, in some degree, be decided by his own judgment. The gentleman from South Carolina had introduced certain resolutions which coincided with the particular views of the State which he represented.

Mr. CALHOUN explained—which stated the views on which the State of South Carolina had acted; and which, if true, must be received as a complete bar to the bill.

Mr. GRUNDY resumed, stating that he had introduced his views, differing from those of the gentleman from South Carolina, in the shape of an amendment to the original resolutions. He considered this course as strictly parliamentary, notwithstanding the objection which had been urged against it on the ground of justice; and on this ground a demand was made upon him to withdraw his amendment. He could not comply with this demand at the moment, but he was willing to take the subject into consideration; and if the debate on the resolutions were postponed, he should then have more time allowed him for reflection. While he was up, he begged leave to say a word upon another subject. This measure, which had emanated from the Committee on the Judiciary, on the recommendation of the President, had been called a repeal of the constitution, as tending to the destruction of our confederacy, and erecting a military despotism on its ruins. Such was not the fact. The bill was a pacific measure; its object was to prevent any mischievous collisions, to prevent brothers from shedding their brothers' blood, and engaging in hostile strife to the dismemberment of the Union. Instead of denouncing this bill as waging war with South Carolina, it would be much wiser to go at once into deliberation upon the bill, and to examine what its provisions were. The committee who had reported it were of the opinion that they could demonstrate that, instead of having any of the injurious consequences which had been charged against it, it would have the effect of preventing the collisions which were apprehended, and of preventing the citizens of the State of South Carolina from coming into hostile conflict with the citizens of any other State. He thought it would be much better to go at once into the consideration of the subject, and determine whether or not the committee had mistaken their course, and had adopted measures which would lead them from their object. This would, in his opinion, be the proper mode of action for the Senate. He would wish to see the resolutions made the order of the day for this day; they would then be taken up in conjunction with the bill, and both the subjects would be discussed together. Such seemed to him to be the most correct course. But he would not be drawn further into the debate, but would avoid, as he always had avoided, premature discussion.

Mr. CALHOUN replied. He stated that he was aware that the course of the Senator from Tennessee was a parliamentary course, but he was compelled to withhold his assent to its justice. When the original resolutions and the amendment were under consideration together, it would be out of order to separate the motion to strike out and insert. That motion was indivisible; and it was his wish to have the propositions distinctly and separately considered. As to the provisions of the bill, he would only say—God deliver him from the operation of such a bill! It offered peace, while all its provisions looked to a state of conflict. It proposed to arm the President with all the military and naval power; and it further proposed to close the courts of justice of the State. It thus trampled the State of South Carolina in the dust. The peace which the bill offered was peace coerced by power. If the gentleman from Tennessee was really desirous of peace, if he was sincere in his wish to allay the prevailing discontent, the way to his object was a plain and an open one. In his message, at the commencement of the session, the President had declared the existing tariff law to be unjust and oppressive, and that it ought to be modified to the scale of the necessary expenditures of the Government. The State of South Carolina had asked nothing beyond this. If Congress should repeal the existing law, and reduce the scale of duties, or if they were to separate the principle of protection from that of revenue, and adopt the latter, then he believed that there would no longer be heard any complaint from South Carolina; but that she would cheerfully acquiesce, and bear her share of the public burdens. These were the two modes by which the existing discontents could be allayed, and harmony and security might be restored. He hoped that, on reflection, the gentleman from Tennessee would withdraw his amendment. But if he would not consent to do this, he (Mr. C.) should, at a proper time, move an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, of which he would now ask the reading.

The amendment was then read; after which, it was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRUNDY said he desired to ask permission of the Senate to make one declaration now, which he hoped would be remembered here and elsewhere. The gentleman from South Carolina had said to-day, and the colleague of that gentleman had made a similar declaration some days before, in a way which he was sure they had not intended, that if Congress would repeal the existing tariff law, there would no longer be any discontent in South Carolina. Now, he wished to say, that he had never given the least aid in passing the tariff law, and he was perfectly ready now to go into an examination of the law, and to make almost any modifications in the scale of duties, although he might not, perhaps, be able to go quite so far as the gentleman from South Carolina would go. And he wished now distinctly to say, that when he raised his voice for the measures which had been recommended and reported, it would not be because he was in favor of the tariff. No, he abhorred the tariff. But it was in behalf of the Union, and to perpetuate the peace and happiness of all the States, that he should desire to be heard advocating these measures. Whenever, therefore, it should be urged against him that he was not laboring to bring down the tariff to the scale which was recommended by the President, and to remove the oppression of its provisions from the shoulders of any State of the Union, it would be an unjust charge. It had been remarked by the gentleman from South Carolina, that the bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary closed the ports of South Carolina. To that remark he would answer, by asking if South Carolina had not legislated the United States out of the limits of that State? The object of the bill was to bring back the United States within the jurisdiction of the State by a constitutional process only. The committee might have gone, perhaps, too far; but such was their object.

Mr. CALHOUN said that the gentleman from Tennessee had asked, "Had not the State of South Carolina legislated the United States out of her limits?" He would answer, No! not in the slightest degree. The State of South Carolina had done nothing more than to resort to the exercise of her delegated powers, for the purpose of preserving her reserved rights. She had looked to no object beyond the defence of her reserved rights; and what were the means which she had resorted to for the protection of these rights? Did she resort to force? No. She had done nothing more than to meet process by process, and in this peaceful mode to offer the resistance which it was her duty to make. And after she had done this, up rose the monstrous giant of the United States, with his hundred arms, and, stepping forward, declared that he would put down that resistance by the interposition of his superior strength.

Mr. WEBSTER then obtained the floor. Nothing, he said, could have been more irregular than the whole of this debate, and he could not avoid the expression of his surprise that the Senators should have gone so far from the question. The question before Senate was simply as to the time to which the resolution should be postponed, and on this unimportant question gentlemen had shown a disposition to rush at once into the discussion of the general subject. If Senators were disposed to act, as there seemed to be some indications that they would, on a notion of policy, that the first and most effectual mode of injuring a measure was to give it a bad name; that the first principle of attack was to controvert beforehand, and to raise, previous to the discussion of the bill, a cry which might operate on its progress, and afterwards provoke its echo throughout the country; then they had a right to pursue the course which was thus indicated. But he, as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, who had reported the bill which was the special order for this day, could not remain silent in his seat while the gentleman from South Carolina charged him with having assisted, and been art and part in making a bill, which he had designated as worse than an abomination—a bill to create a dictator, to establish a military despotism, and the like. He denied that such was the fact, and he proposed, at a proper time, to try conclusions with the gentleman on this point. He wished in no degree to avoid such a conflict. Nor did he intend to utter any denunciations against opposition to the bill. Whenever it should become necessary, he would be ready to assign the reasons which had induced him to give his assent to the bill. But he would ask, why was this discussion to be precipitated? Why was it not postponed until the proper time for bringing it on? A bill to create a dictator, to establish a military despotism, reported by one of the standing committees of the Senate, and he a member of that committee! He called on the gentleman from South Carolina to prove the allegations he had made. He called on him to sustain the grave charge which he has thus thrown out in the face of the country.

The gentleman from South Carolina had laid it down, and with an air of sincerity which he did not intend to depreciate, that the resolutions which he had offered contained indubitable facts. Now he (Mr. W.) disputed these facts, and he would take issue with the gentleman from South Carolina on that point. [Mr. CALHOUN:—I will meet it.] He denied that they were facts, and he should be happy to meet the gentleman from South Carolina on that head. But when that gentleman threw out the idea that no one could deny his propositions, he took a very bold ground, and narrowed down the power of denial within very confined limits. To assert such a position was, in fact, a declaration of his own infallibility. The author of Hudibras made his hero see truth. He (Mr. W.) did not pretend to have had this personal acquaintance with truth; but, if to a mind as humble as his, the features of truth were ever exhibited, he was not able to identify them in the propositions of the gentleman from South Carolina. But there would be a proper time to go into this discussion. He wished to see that time arrive, and he was prepared to proceed immediately with the discussion of the bill. Whenever the discussion should come on, he should feel it incumbent on him to show that there was no provision, no principle contained in this bill, which was not in strict conformity with the constitution, and in harmony with other measures which had been adopted by the Government. And if it were proper on this occasion to use what was called the argumentum ad hominem, he should also be ready to show that there was not a provision contained in this bill, with the exception of part of the first section, which had not, at some time, received the sanction of South Carolina herself. But of that he should have something to say at a proper time. He had risen, intending only to say that these points ought not to be discussed beforehand, and that this bill ought not to be placed in a worse situation than a common criminal. The right of the criminal it was, to be heard first, then tried, then judged of. He claimed for this bill that it should be first heard, then tried, and then judged of; and not that it should be judged of without trial or hearing. He repelled the charge that the bill was to create a dictator, to establish a military despotism, and to repeal the constitution, and crush a sovereign State. This was, indeed, a high sounding indictment; but he called on the Senate to try it, and not to receive it as proved without a trial.

Mr. CALHOUN said that if he possessed the wit of the author of Hudibras, he would not think of employing it on so solemn an occasion. It was no part of his policy, it was not his intention to give to the bill a bad name in advance for the purpose of enlisting prejudices against it. While acting in defence of her rights, the State of South Carolina had been cruelly denounced as setting herself up in wanton hostility against the General Government, as exciting rebellion, and intending to break down the Union; and her sons had been stigmatized as traitors. It was not so. The gentleman from Massachusetts had said that, saving the first section (a prudent reservation) all the provisions in the bill had at some time received the sanction of South Carolina. It was not so. To the peculiar perceptions of that gentleman such may appear to have been the fact, inasmuch as he regarded the State as merely a mass of individuals—a body of smugglers, perhaps; but he would be unable to discover, in any one of the acts of the State of South Carolina, a sanction of the right which was now assumed, to put down a sovereign State by force.

Mr. WILKINS then moved to lay the resolutions and amendments on the table, for the purpose of proceeding to the special order of the day; but having withdrawn his motion,

Mr. POINDEXTER rose to ask the Chair whether it would be in order to move an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, the object of which was to include in the motion to postpone the various resolutions; a motion also to postpone the consideration of the bill itself. If such an amendment would be in order, he would now move it.

The CHAIR decided that the motion would not be in order.

Mr. POINDEXTER then said that he would not go into the consideration of the principles which were involved in the resolutions. Such examination would be now out of place, and would be calculated to produce a premature excitement throughout the country. Whenever the bill should come up for discussion, he should hold himself prepared to sustain the opinions he had advanced—that the bill, as it had been reported, was a repeal of the constitution, and an investment of despotic power in the President of the United States.

But this was not the question before the Senate. What was the question? A string of resolutions were before the Senate, which went to the fundamental principles of the constitution, and to their practical operation. A discussion upon these important points would therefore be, in its character, a debate tending to the settlement of first principles. Then there was a bill which, although general in its features, was reported with a mental reservation, that its operation was to be confined to one State only. He asked the gentleman from Massachusetts, why it was, that, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, he had not looked the mischief full in the face, and reported a measure simply to punish the refractory State? Why was the bill so constructed as to pervade the whole Union, with such a reservation, when no one would deny that the sole intention was to operate against South Carolina? He asked, if on its face it was a bill the provisions of which were limited to South Carolina? Certainly not. It is a measure of a permanent character, co-extensive with the confederacy; and as such he intended to consider it. Every gentleman ought to see the excitement which prevailed throughout the country, and that the Union of the States was endangered. To prevent such a catastrophe, he would direct all his efforts and his vote. What was the fact? The President had, in his opening message, told Congress that the duties, as they were laid in the existing tariff law, were onerous and oppressive, and that they ought to be reduced to the standard of the necessary revenue.

The Secretary of the Treasury had carried out the idea of the President, and had recommended a reduction principally on the protected articles. In the House of Representatives there was a bill pending, which had been founded on these views, and it was hoped that this bill would be speedily passed. Thus, then, there was an intermediate and an alternate course which offered themselves for selection. The intermediate course was to modify the existing tariff, according to the recommendations of the President; and to effect which a bill was now on its passage. The ultimate measure was to arm the President with the power to coerce the State of South Carolina into obedience to the existing law. Was it not wrong to discuss the ultimate measure while the intermediate measure was before the House? Suppose that the House were to pass the bill, would there then, he asked, be any reason for the passage of this bill? Certainly not. But suppose that the Senate were to pass this bill, and the bill of the House were also to be passed, this bill would then fall to the ground as of no effect.

It appeared to him that the wisest course of legislation would be to wait and see the conclusion of the measure which was before the House; and if it should be concluded not to carry out the recommendation made by the President at the commencement of the session, then it would be time enough to take up the bill. But the discussion of this bill now would be premature, and only calculated to put the country in a blaze, and would destroy all prospect to the end of the session of effecting any modifications in the provision of the tariff. What, then, would be the result? The result would be strife and confusion. It would result in the shedding the blood of brethren by brethren, in the marching of troops from the East and the North, and in what ought emphatically to be called a spinning-jenny war. What reason could be assigned why the Senate should not pause, and see what would be the action of the House? Would they urge the ulterior before they had discovered that the intermediate measure would fail, and, while the other branch was engaged in the modification of the tariff, clothe the Executive with authority to execute the hostile provisions of this bill? It would, in his opinion, be a salutary course to postpone the further consideration of the whole subject until Thursday, or even Monday; and by that time it might be known what had been done with the bill by the House, and what was the prospect of a settlement of this question without further distraction of the country.

Mr. MANGUM said that, at the instance of the gentleman from South Carolina, he would modify his motion so as to stand a motion to make the resolutions and amendments the order for Thursday. They could then be discussed in conjunction with the bill.

Mr. FORSYTH said he should wish to understand the motion and its effect—which subject would stand the first for discussion on the special order?

Mr. WEBSTER—The bill.

Mr. FORSYTH—Then I am satisfied.

The CHAIR then decided that the bill would have precedence on the special orders, and come up the first for discussion.

Mr. CALHOUN remarked, that the effect of the adoption of the bill would be the destruction of the resolutions.

Mr. WILKINS said, if there was any doubt on the subject of precedence, he would move to lay the resolutions and amendments on the table.

The CHAIR repeated, that there could not be any doubt but that, in point of fact, there was but one special order, and that was the bill.

Mr. CALHOUN said, that if he had any control over the resolutions, he would wish that they should be laid on the table, so that they might be subject to a motion to take them up at any time. He would merely add that he felt as deep a conviction, in his own mind, of the truth of the propositions contained in his resolutions, as of the fact that the gentleman from Massachusetts was now sitting in his chair.

Mr. WEBSTER—I do not doubt it.

On motion of Mr. WILKINS, the resolutions were then laid on the table, together with the various propositions of amendment.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

The Senate then took up the following bill, reported by Mr. WILKINS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, on the 21st instant.

Be it enacted, &c. That whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, or unlawful threats and menaces against officers of the United States, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President, to execute the revenue laws, and collect the duties on imports in the ordinary way, in any collection district, it shall and may be lawful for the President to direct that the custom-house for such district be established and kept in any secure place within some port or harbor of such district, either upon land or on board any vessel; and, in that case, it shall be the duty of the collector to reside at such place, and there to detain all vessels and cargoes arriving within the said district until the duties imposed on said cargoes, by law, be paid, in cash, deducting interest according to existing laws; and in such cases it shall be unlawful to take the vessel or cargo from the custody of the proper officer of the customs, unless by process from some court of the United States; and in case of any attempt otherwise to take any vessel or cargo by any force, or combination, or assemblage of persons, too great to be overcome by the officers of the customs, it shall and may be lawful for the President, of the United States, or such person or persons as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces, or militia of the United States, as may be deemed necessary for the purpose of preventing the removal of such vessel or cargo, and protecting the officers of the customs in retaining the custody thereof; and also for the purpose of preventing and suppressing any armed or riotous assemblage of persons resisting the custom-house officers in the exercise of their duties, or in any manner opposing the execution of the revenue laws of the United States, or otherwise violating, or assisting and abetting violations of the same.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States shall extend to all cases, in law or equity, arising under the revenue laws of the United States, for which other provisions are not already made by law; and if any person shall receive any injury to his person or property for or on account of any act by him done, under any law of the United States, for the protection of the revenue or the collection of duties on imports, he shall be entitled to maintain suit for damage therefor in the circuit court of the United States in the district wherein the party doing the injury may reside, or shall be found. And all property taken or detained by any officer or other person under authority of any law of the United States shall be irrepleviable, and shall be deemed to be in the custody of the law, and subject only to the orders and decrees of the courts of the United States having jurisdiction thereof. And if any person shall dispossess or rescue, or attempt to dispossess or rescue, any property so taken or detained as aforesaid, or shall aid or assist therein, such person shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be liable to such punishment as is provided by the twenty-second section of the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, approved the thirtieth day of April, anno Domini one thousand seven hundred and ninety, for the wilful obstruction or resistance of officers in the service of process.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That in any case where suit or prosecution shall be commenced in a court of any State against any officer of the United States, or other person, for or on account of any act done under the laws of the United States, or under color thereof, or for or on account of any right, authority, or title set up or claimed by such officer, or other person, under any law of the United States, it shall be lawful for the defendant in such suit or prosecution, at any time before trial, upon a petition to said court, setting forth the nature of said suit or prosecution, and verifying the said petition by affidavit, which said petition and affidavit shall be presented to said court, or to the clerk thereof, or left at the office of the said clerk, to remove the said suit or prosecution to the circuit court of the United States then next to be holden in the district where the said suit or prosecution is commenced; and, thereupon, it shall be the duty of the said State court to stay all further proceedings therein; and the said suit, or prosecution, upon presentment of said petition or affidavit, on leaving the same as aforesaid, shall be deemed and taken to be removed into the said circuit court; and any further proceedings, trial, or judgment therein, in the said State court, shall be wholly null and void; and on proof being made to the said circuit court of the presentment of said petition and affidavit, or of the leaving of the same as aforesaid, the said circuit court shall have authority to entertain jurisdiction of said suit or prosecution, and to proceed therein, and to hear, try, and determine the same, in like manner as if the same had been originally cognizable and instituted in such circuit court. And all attachments made, and all bail and other security given upon such suit or prosecution, shall be and continue in like force and effect, as if the same suit or prosecution had proceeded to final judgment and execution in the State court. And if, upon the removal of any such suit or prosecution, it shall be made to appear to the said circuit court that no copy of the record and proceedings therein in the State court can be obtained, it shall be lawful for said circuit court to allow and require the plaintiff to proceed de novo, and to file a declaration of his cause of action; and the parties may thereupon proceed as in actions originally brought in said circuit court; and on failure of so proceeding, judgment of non pros. may be rendered against the plaintiff, with costs for the defendant.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That in any case in which any party is, or may be, by law, entitled to copies of the record and proceedings in any suit or prosecution in any State court, to be used in any court of the United States, if the clerk of said State court shall, upon demand, and the payment and tender of the legal fees, refuse or neglect to deliver to such party certified copies of such record and proceedings, the court of the United States in which such record and proceedings may be needed, on proof, by affidavit, that the clerk of such State court has refused or neglected to deliver copies thereof, on demand, as aforesaid, may direct and allow such record to be supplied by affidavit, or otherwise, as the circumstances of the case may require and allow; and thereupon, such proceeding, trial, and judgment may be had in the said court of the United States, and all such process awarded, as if certified copies of such records and proceedings had been regularly before the said court.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, whenever the President of the United States shall be officially informed by the authorities of any State, or by the circuit and one of the district judges of the United States, in the State, that, within the limits of such State, any law or laws of the United States, or the execution thereof, or of any process from the courts of the United States, will, in any event, be obstructed by the employment of military force, or by any other unlawful means, too great to be overcome by the ordinary course of judicial proceeding, or by the powers vested in the marshal by existing laws, it shall be lawful for him, the President of the United States, forthwith to issue his proclamation, declaring such fact or information, and requiring all such military and other force forthwith to disperse; and, if, at any time after issuing such proclamation, any such opposition or obstruction shall be made, in the manner or by the means aforesaid, the President shall be, and hereby is, authorized promptly to employ such means to resist and suppress the same, and to cause the said laws or process to be duly executed, as are authorized and provided in the cases therein mentioned by the act of the twenty-eighth of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, entitled "An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for that purpose:" and, also, by the act of the third of March, one thousand eight hundred and seven, entitled, "An act authorizing the employment of the land and naval forces of the United States in cases of insurrection."

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That in any State where the jails are not allowed to be used for the imprisonment of persons arrested or committed under the laws of the United States, or where houses are not allowed to be so used, it shall and may be lawful for any marshal, under the direction of the judge of the United States for the proper district, to use other convenient places, and to make such other provisions, as he may deem expedient and necessary for that purpose.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That either of the justices of the Supreme Court, or a judge of any district court of the United States, in addition to the authority already conferred by law, shall have power to grant writs of habeas corpus in all cases of a prisoner or prisoners, in jail or confinement, where he or they shall be committed or confined on or by any authority or law, for any act done, or omitted to be done, in pursuance of a law of the United States, or any order, process, or decree of any judge or court thereof; any thing in any act of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding. And if any person or persons to whom such writ of habeas corpus may be directed shall refuse to obey the same, or shall neglect or refuse to make return, or shall make a false return thereto, in addition to the remedies already given by law, he or they shall be deemed and taken to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction before any court of competent jurisdiction, be punished by fine, not exceeding _____ dollars, and by imprisonment, not exceeding _____, or by either, according to the nature and aggravation of the case.

Mr. MANGUM moved that the further consideration of the bill be postponed to and made the special order of the day for Thursday next; and upon this motion asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bibb, Black, Brown, Calhoun, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Poindexter, Rives, Smith, Troup, Tyler, Waggaman, White—15.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Forsyth, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Holmes, Johnston, Kane, Knight, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, Wilkins, Wright—30.

Mr. WILKINS rose in support of the bill. The position, said he, in which you, Mr. President, have placed me in relation to this body, imposes on me the duty of introducing the present bill to the Senate, and of explaining its provisions. In my mode of discharging this duty, I do not consider myself as the representative of other gentlemen on the committee; those gentlemen possess a competence, far beyond mine, to explain and defend the power of the General Government to carry into effect its constitutional laws. The bill is founded upon a message from the President, communicated on the 16th inst., and proposes to sustain the constitutionality of the doctrines laid down in that admired state paper. In the outset of the discussion, it is admitted that the bill points to an afflicting state of things existing in a Southern State of the Union; it is not to be disguised that it points to the State of South Carolina. It is not in the contemplation of the committee who reported this bill to make it assume, in any way, an invidious character. When the gentleman from South Carolina threw out the suggestion that the bill was invidious, he certainly did not intend to impute to the committee a design to give it such a character. So far from being invidious, the bill was made general and sweeping, in its terms and application, for the reason that this course was thought to be more delicate in regard to the State concerned. The provisions of the bill were made general, for the purpose of enforcing every where the collection laws of the Union.

The bill presents three very important and momentous considerations: Is there any thing in the circumstances of the country calling for legislation on the subject of the revenue laws? Is the due administration of those laws threatened with impediments? and is this bill suited to such an emergency? He proposed to consider those points, but in a desultory manner. He never shrunk from any moral or political responsibility, but he had no disposition (to use the words of the Senator from North Carolina) to "drum on public sensibility." Neither he nor the State which he represented had any influence in bringing up these questions, but he was prepared to meet the crisis by his vote.

It is time (continued Mr. W.) that the principles on which the Union depends were discussed. It is time that Congress expressed an opinion upon them. It is time that the people should bring their judgment to bear on this subject, and settle it forever. The authority of Congress and of the people must settle this question one day or other. There were many enlightened men in the country, men whose integrity and patriotism nobody doubts, who had arrived at opinions in this matter very different from his own. The Senator from South Carolina knows (said Mr. W.) the respect in which I hold him; but I am unwilling to take his judgment on this question as the guide of mine; and I will not agree that the Union depends on the principles which he has advanced. He has offered a document as a plea in bar; if it be established, then a bar is interposed between the powers of the Government and the acts of South Carolina.

The bill is of great importance, not on account of its particular provisions, but of their application to a rapidly approaching crisis, which they were intended to meet. That crisis was in the control of this body, not of any branch of the Government. He would ask the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. POINDEXTER] what authority he had to say that the passage of any bill reducing the tariff would avert the enforcement of the ordinance of South Carolina? He was unwilling to consider that Senator as the representative of the unlimited authority and sovereignty claimed by the State of South Carolina. He would now present to the Senate a view of the position in which South Carolina had placed herself, in order to justify the committee in reporting the bill under consideration. It was not, sir, for the purpose of establishing a military despotism, nor of creating an armed dictator, nor of sending into South Carolina military bands to "cut the throats of women and children," that the committee framed the bill. If any thing can ever establish a military despotism in this country, it is the anarchy and confusion which the principles contended for by the Senator from South Carolina will produce. If we keep together, not "ten years," nor tens of thousands of years, will ever bring the country under the dominion of military despotism. But adopt the principles of South Carolina—break the Union into fragments—some chieftain may bring the fragments together, but it will be under a military despotism. He would not say that South Carolina contemplated this result, but he did say that her principles would lead to it. South Carolina, not being able longer to bear the burden of an oppressive law, had determined on resistance.

The excitement raised in the State gave to the party a majority in the Legislature of the State, and a convention was called, under the provision of the State constitution authorizing its amendment. The convention met, and passed what is called the ordinance, establishing new and fundamental principles. Without repeating it, he would call the attention of the Senate to some few of its provisions. It overthrew the whole revenue system. It was not limited to the acts of 1828 or 1832, but ended with a solemn declaration that, in that State, no taxes should be collected. The addresses of the convention to the people of the United States and of the State of South Carolina used a tone and language not to be misunderstood. They tell you it is necessary for some one State to bring the question to issue—that Carolina will do it—that Carolina had thrown herself into the breach, and would stand foremost in resistance to the laws of the Union; and they solemnly call upon the citizens of the State to stand by the principles of the ordinance, for it is determined that no taxes shall be collected in that State. The ordinance gives the Legislature the power to carry into execution this determination. It contains within itself no seeds of dissolution; it is unlimited as to time; contains no restrictions as to application; provides no means for its amendment, modification, or repeal. In their private, individual capacity, some members of the convention held out the idea which had been advanced by some members of this House, that if the tariff law was made less oppressive, the ordinance would not be enforced.

[Mr. POINDEXTER here remarked, that he said that any new tariff law, even if more oppressive than the law of 1832 were passed, the ordinance would not apply to it.]

If the terms of the ordinance are considered, (continued Mr. W.) there is no possible mode of arresting it; so sure as time rolls on, and four days pass over our heads, the ordinance, and the laws emanating from it, will lead to the employment of physical force, by the citizens of South Carolina, against the enforcement of the revenue laws. Although many of the most influential citizens of Carolina protested against the idea that any but moral force would be resorted to, yet the excitement and determined spirit of the people would, in his opinion, lead speedily to the employment of physical force. He did not doubt that the Senator from South Carolina abhorred the idea of force; no doubt his excellent heart would bleed at the scene which it would produce; but he would refer to a passage in the ordinance to prove that it was the intention of its framers to resort to force. Mr. W. here read the third paragraph of the ordinance.

"And it is further ordained, that it shall not be lawful for any of the constituted authorities, whether of this State or of the United States, to enforce the payment of duties imposed by the said acts within the limits of this State; but it shall be the duty of the Legislature to adopt such measures and pass such acts as may be necessary to give full effect to this ordinance, and to prevent the enforcement and arrest the operation of the said acts and parts of acts of the Congress of the United States within the limits of this State, from and after the 1st of February next; and the duty of all other constituted authorities, and of persons residing or being within the limits of this State, and they are hereby required and enjoined, to obey and give effect to this ordinance, and such acts and measures of the Legislature as may be passed or adopted in obedience thereto."

Does the shadow follow the sun? Even so surely will force follow the attempt to disobey the laws of South Carolina. In the last paragraph of the ordinance is this passage:

"Determined to support this ordinance at every hazard,"—and this declaration is made by a courageous and chivalrous people—"we do further declare that we will not submit to the application of force, on the part of the Federal Government, to reduce this State to obedience." This attempt, said Mr. W. is not made by this bill, or by any one. "But that we will consider the passage, by Congress, of any act authorizing the employment of a military or naval force against the State of South Carolina, her constituted authorities or citizens, or any act abolishing or closing the ports of this State, or any of them, or otherwise obstructing the free ingress and egress of vessels to and from the said ports, or any other act on the part of the Federal Government to coerce the State, shut up her ports, destroy or harass her commerce, or to enforce the acts hereby declared to be null and void, otherwise than through the civil tribunals of the country, as inconsistent with the longer continuance of South Carolina in the Union."

Force must inevitably be used in case any attempt is made by the Federal Government to enforce the acts which have been declared null and void. The ordinance clearly establishes nullification as the law of the land.

[Mr. MILLER: Will the Senator read a little further?]

Mr. W. finished the paragraph, as follows:

"And that the people of this State will thenceforth hold themselves absolved from all further obligation to maintain or preserve their political connexion with the people of the other States, and will forthwith proceed to organize a separate Government, and do all other acts and things which sovereign and independent States may of right do."

They stop with nullification; but one step further on the part of the Government brings down secession and revolution.

Mr. CALHOUN—It is not intended to use any force, except against force. We shall not stop the proceedings of the United States' courts, but maintain the authority of our own judiciary.

Mr. WILKINS—How can the ordinance refer to any laws of the United States, when they are excluded from any operation within the limits of the State? Why do the laws and ordinance of South Carolina shut out the United States' courts from appellate jurisdiction? Why do they shut the doors of the State courts against any inquisition from the United States' courts? They intend that there shall be no jurisdiction over this subject, except through their own courts. They cut off the federal judiciary from all authority in that State, and bring back the state of things which existed prior to the formation of the federal constitution.

Here nullification is disclaimed, on one hand, unless we abolish our revenue system. We consenting to do this, they remain quiet. But if we go a hair's breadth towards enforcing that system, they present secession. We have secession on one hand, and nullification on the other. The Senator from South Carolina admitted the other day that no such thing as constitutional secession could exist. Then civil war, disunion, and anarchy must accompany secession. No one denies the right of revolution. That is a natural, indefeasible, inherent right—a right which we have exercised and held out, by our example, to the civilized world. Who denies it? Then we have revolution by force, not constitutional secession. That violence must come by secession is certain. Another law passed by the Legislature of South Carolina, is entitled A bill to provide for the safety of the people of South Carolina. It advises them to put on their armor. It puts them in military array; and for what purpose but for the use of force? The provisions of these laws are infinitely worse than those of the feudal system, so far as they apply to the citizens of Carolina. But with its operations on their own citizens, he had nothing to do. Resistance was just as inevitable as the arrival of the day on the calendar. In addition to these documents, what did rumor say—rumor, which often falsifies, but sometimes utters truth. If we judge by newspaper and other reports, more men were now ready to take up arms in Carolina than there were during the revolutionary struggle. The whole State was at this moment in arms, and its citizens are ready to be embattled the moment any attempt was made to enforce the revenue laws. The city of Charleston wore the appearance of a military depot. As a further proof of the necessity of this bill, he would read a printed paper, which might pass for what it was worth.

Mr. CALHOUN. What paper is it? Has it a signature?

Mr. WILKINS. It is a circular, but not signed. Mr. W. then read the paper as follows:

"CHARLESTON, January, 1833.

"SIR:—You will, on receiving this letter, immediately take the proper measures for the purpose of ascertaining at what points depots of provisions, say of corn, fodder, and bacon, can be established on the main roads leading through your district, at suitable stations, say from thirty to forty miles apart. Looking to the event of a possible call for troops of every description, and especially of mounted men, in a sudden emergency, you will ascertain the routes by which they could most conveniently pass through your respective districts, and the proper points at which they may put up after the usual day's march. Having settled this, the next point will be to inquire whether there are any persons at or near those points, who would undertake, on terms to be stipulated, to furnish corn, fodder, and meat, in what quantities, and at what notice? It is desirable that this arrangement should be effected, so as to enable us to command an adequate supply in the event of its being wanted, without actually making purchases at present. If this be impracticable, however, you must then see on what terms purchases can be effected, where, and on what manner the articles can be deposited and taken care of? I will here give you a general outline of my scheme. I will suppose three great routes to be marked out from the mountains towards the sea: one leading from Laurenceville, through Newberry, to Columbia; another from Yorkville and Union, by Winsboro' and Chesterville, to Columbia; and the third from Pendleton, through Abbeville and Edgefield, Burnwell, and Colleton, to Charleston. Along these routes depots would have to be established at intervals of thirty or forty miles, besides separate depots at Camden and some other places. From Columbia these stations would be necessary along the State road to Charleston. But one other route would then, perhaps, be necessary to be provided for, beginning at Darlington Court-house, and ending at Georgetown; one station to be at Kingstree, and another at Lynche's Creek. From all other places some one of these stations might be struck. I present this imperfect outline merely to give you some idea of my general scheme. Your particular attention will, of course, be directed to your own district; and, if you find it necessary, you may call in my aids from the adjoining districts, and such staff officers as you may think proper, and consult with them as to the best method of connecting the districts by some general plan, and favor me with the result.

"Another object to which I would call your early and particular attention, is the state of the arms, public and private, in the hands of the men. Great numbers have been issued from time to time, especially within a few years past. I wish to know how many of them may be relied on in the event of actual service. For this purpose,

SENATE.]

Revenue Collection Bill.

it must be ascertained, from actual inspection or otherwise, how many men in each company have muskets, rifles, or other arms fit for use; and any unfit for use must be repaired. The latter must be collected together and repaired, if it can be effected in your neighborhood; and, if not, they must be boxed up and sent to Charleston; when, after being repaired at the public expense, they will be returned to the companies to which they may belong. To execute the arduous, responsible, and difficult duties imposed by this order, you are authorized to call to your assistance all the officers of the staff within your district; and, if further assistance is wanted, additional officers will be appointed. The travelling expenses of yourself, and such officers as you may employ in this business, will be paid. You will issue the necessary orders in my name, countersigned by yourself as aid-de-camp, to all officers within your district, urging them to do whatever you may find necessary to the prompt and effectual execution of this order. You will, when convenient, call upon the brigadier or major generals, within your district, for their co-operation and assistance, and, generally, adopt all proper measures for the accomplishment of the important objects which I have in view, which may be stated in a few words to be, to secure the means of subsistence, so as to be enabled to bring troops to any given point in the shortest possible time—to ascertain the state of the arms now in the hands of the men—and to have those unfit for use put in complete order. If any other means occur to you of accomplishing, in the promptest manner, these vitally important objects, you will be so good as to suggest them.

"I am, very respectfully, &c.

"N. B. I annex the form of three orders, which you may find it necessary to extend, to enable you to accomplish the objects we have in view. You may modify them as you think proper, and then have copies served on each of the officers, who may be required to execute them within your district. They are not to be published in the papers. Copies of all such orders as you may issue must be sent to me."

Adverting to another circumstance, as tending to show the excitement prevailing in South Carolina against the General Government, Mr. W. said, that in every part of the State, the blue cockade, with the Palmetto button, was generally worn. That bit of ribbon, and the button, were no trifling sign of the military spirit prevalent among the people.

It seemed to him, indeed, from all these facts, known to us, officially and by rumor, that it was impossible to avoid a collision with South Carolina, while her ordinance remained in force; and that those gentlemen who represented that the passage of any bill by us would defeat the ordinance, and prevent a collision, had mistaken the sense of the ordinance, and the intention of the people of South Carolina.

[Mr. MILLER here interposed, and said he had not expressed the opinion that nullification would be abandoned upon the passage of a bill of any character in reference to the tariff. If Congress passed a bill altering the tariff acts of 1828 and 1832, he was of opinion that such act would set aside the ordinance, which was specific in its application to the tariff acts of 1828 and 1832. Even if a bill more oppressive than the existing acts should pass, the ordinance now existing would thereby be defeated, and South Carolina would be under the necessity of assembling another convention, and passing another ordinance.]

Mr. WILKINS found, he said, that he was not far from right. What prospect, then, was there of an abandonment, by South Carolina, of her present position? She offers us but two modes of adjusting the matter in dispute. The first is by the total abandonment of the protective system; by the admission of the whole list of protected articles free of all duty, and raising the whole revenue derived from duties on imports exclusively from the unprotected articles. The consequence of the adoption of this policy would be most fatal and disastrous to the industry of the Northern States. It would put the laboring classes of Pennsylvania on a footing with the paupers of the old world. It would prostrate at once and forever the policy which Pennsylvania had long cherished, which South Carolina had united with her in establishing and maintaining, and under which she was prosperous and happy. The admirable speech made by the Senator from South Carolina, in 1816, in favor of the protective policy, was engraved on the hearts of the people of Pennsylvania. In the dwellings of the farmer, the mechanic, and the manufacturer, it hung upon the wall, by the side of Washington's Farewell Address. He well remembered that speech, for it had a powerful influence on his own mind in relation to the policy of the protective system.

[Mr. CALHOUN here said, I thank the gentleman for alluding to that speech. It has been much and very often misrepresented, and I shall take an early opportunity to explain it.]

Mr. WILKINS—I shall be happy to witness the exhibition of the Senator's ingenuity in explaining the speech in such a manner as to make it accord with his present views. I should not have alluded to it, had not the Senator remarked upon the bill from our committee as a bill "of abominations."

Mr. CALHOUN—It requires no apology.

Mr. WILKINS proceeded to state the considerations which rendered a compliance with the terms proposed by South Carolina improbable, if not impossible. For his own part, he was free to say that he could not bring his mind to assent to so destructive a measure. He spoke only for himself. What were the views of others of this body on this subject he did not know, for he was not in the habit of making inquiries as to the opinions of others on such topics. Much as he loved the Union—much as he deprecated any collision between the State and Federal Governments—much as he was disposed to respect the opinions and wishes of a sister State—he would not himself assent to a total destruction even of incidental protection to our domestic industry. He would, however, go far, very far, even to the sacrifice of much of that protection which we claim as just and necessary; but to the point proposed by South Carolina as her ultimatum, he could not go.

He did not believe that there was any probability of the assent, on the part of Congress, to the first proposition of South Carolina. There was but one other proposition made by South Carolina for the adjustment of this controversy, and that was even less hopeful than the former. It was by the call of a general convention of the States, and the submission to them of an ultimate arbitrament on the disputed powers. Mr. W. was of the opinion that the division of the State representation assembled in convention on the matters in controversy would not differ from the judgment of the representatives assembled in Congress. He did not think it at all probable that the convention would either alter the constitution in respect to the powers of the Government over the subject of revenue, or that the protective laws would be pronounced by them unconstitutional, and null and void. But it was not at all probable that two-thirds of Congress and three-fourths of the States would agree to the call of a general convention. The people were averse to any change in the constitution, and were of opinion that it could not be amended for the better. For his own part, it was his earnest hope, and confident belief, that no change would ever be made in the terms of our admirable compact.

Here Mr. W. yielded to a motion for adjournment, and the Senate adjourned.

JAN. 29, 1833.]

Revenue Collection Bill.

[SENATE.]

TUESDAY, JANUARY 29.
THE COLLECTION BILL.

The subject again coming up—

Mr. WILKINS resumed his remarks on it. He commenced by stating that, on a proper occasion, he should move one or two amendments to the bill, one of which would be to limit some of its provisions to the end of the next session of Congress: the provisions which it contained for amending the judicial system, he presumed, there would be no objection to leaving, as they are in the bill, unlimited.

When the Senate adjourned yesterday, (Mr. W. continued,) I was speaking of the tariff system—of this system for the protection of American industry, which a vast portion of the American people believe to be intimately connected with the prosperity of the country. As a justification of the adherence, as far as practicable, to this system, he had had reference to the conduct of gentlemen from the South in regard to it. At one period, he now added, Maryland had been considered a Southern State, as she was still a slave-holding State: from the chief city of that State, directly after the meeting of Congress, under the constitution of 1787, a memorial was transmitted to Congress, reciting the weakness and inefficiency of the old confederacy, and its inadequacy to protect the manufacturing interests, and rejoicing that we had now a Government possessing all the necessary power to protect domestic industry, and praying the interposition of Congress for that purpose. Another incident he mentioned, which, he said, many members would recollect, of a member of Congress from South Carolina having, in the year 1809, offered a resolution proposing that all the members of Congress should appear, at the commencement of the next ensuing session, clad entirely in clothing of American manufacture. He had already adverted to the agency of the South in passing the tariff law of 1816, and now, said he, let me make a personal reference, in connexion with it, to another gentleman from South Carolina, now a member of this body, [Mr. MILLER;] which reference I make with all possible respect for that gentleman. When the bill of 1816 was under discussion, that gentleman, then a member of the other House, made a motion, deeply interesting to Pennsylvania, and for which I, as one of her sons, feel grateful to him, to raise the duties on hammered bar iron (which the bill proposed to raise from nine to sixteen dollars per ton,) to twenty dollars per ton. Thus amended, the bill passed the House, but the duty was reduced in the Senate to sixteen. On the final passage of the bill, including that and other duties, three members only from South Carolina were present, and they all voted for the bill. Strange revolution of opinion! It is now contended by the same gentleman that a duty of eighteen dollars upon the same article, (two dollars below her own proposition,) as fixed by the tariff of 1832, is so onerous, oppressive, and tyrannical, that the whole country is to be involved in a civil war, if not only that, but every other protective duty be not abolished!

Mr. W. said he had also spoken, yesterday, in justification of the strongest provisions of this bill, of the talked-of resistance to the laws in South Carolina. He had understood the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] the other day, as acknowledging that there was military array in South Carolina, but contending that it followed and did not precede the array of force by the United States.

Mr. CALHOUN said he had admitted that there was military preparation, not array.

Mr. WILKINS said, if we examine the measures taken by the administration in reference to the present crisis, it would be found that they were not at all of that military character to justify the measures of South Carolina which it was alleged had followed them.

Mr. CALHOUN said that South Carolina was undoubtedly preparing to resist force by force. But, let the United States withdraw its forces from her borders, and lay this bill upon the table, and her preparations would cease.

Mr. WILKINS resumed. That is, sir, if we do not oppose any of her movements, all will be right. If we fold our arms, and exhibit a perfect indifference whether the laws of the Union are obeyed or not, all will be quiet! This, I admit, would be an admirable mode to avoid collision and prevent disturbance; but is it one that we can submit to? The moment we fail to counteract the nullification proceedings of South Carolina, the Union is dissolved; for, in this Government of laws, union is obedience, and obedience is union. The moment South Carolina—

Mr. CALHOUN—Who relies upon force in this controversy? I have insisted upon it that South Carolina relied altogether on civil process, and that, if the General Government resorts to force, then only will South Carolina rely upon force. If force be introduced by either party, upon that party will fall the responsibility.

Mr. WILKINS—The General Government will not appeal, in the first instance, to force. It will appeal to the patriotism of South Carolina—to that magnanimity of which she boasts so much.

Mr. CALHOUN—I am sorry that South Carolina cannot appeal to the sense of justice of the General Government. [Order! Order! from one or two members.]

Mr. WILKINS—The Government will appeal to that political sense which exhorts obedience to the laws of the country, as the first duty of the citizen. It will appeal to the moral force in the community. If that appeal be in vain, it will appeal to the judiciary. If the mild arm of the judiciary be not sufficient to execute the laws, it will call out the civil force to sustain the laws. If that be insufficient, God save and protect us from the last resort! But if the evil does come upon the country, who is responsible for it? If force be brought in to the aid of law, who, I ask of gentlemen, is responsible for it to the people of the United States? That is the question. Talk of it as you please, mystify matters as you will, theorize as you may, pile up abstract propositions to any extent, at last the question resolves itself into one of obedience or resistance of the laws—in other words, of union or disunion. Wherein (said Mr. W.) consists our liberty? What is the foundation of our political institutions which we boast of, which we hold up to the world for imitation, and for the enjoyment of which the votary of freedom pants in every country of the globe—what is it? It is that of a Government where the people make the laws, and where the people obey the laws which they themselves have made. That is our system of Government, and by a large majority of the people it is respected accordingly. Why, sir, (said Mr. W.) if you were to carry into effect the ultra doctrine of South Carolina at this moment, repeal your whole protective system, shut up your factories, stop your wheels, extinguish our fires, &c.—nay, ruin us by your legislation—yet would the people of Pennsylvania obey the laws, and abide your decision. But then they would appeal to the people; they would endeavor to bring public opinion to act upon Congress, and bear them back into the right course. They would appeal to moral influence, and to that alone.

I know (said Mr. W.) that the gentleman from South Carolina cannot anticipate the application of force in the case now presented; but I pray him, again and again, to advert to one particular paragraph of the ordinance. There were several cases in which the use of force is referred to in the ordinance, in which Mr. W. admitted the right to use it. If, for example, as in a case supposed, Congress intended to overrun and subdue the State of South Carolina, and overturn their liberties, he admitted the right of resistance by force. But, come down to the contingency in which the ordinance declares that force

Revenue Collection Bill.

shall be used, and it is in the event of the attempt by the United States to enforce the execution of the revenue laws. "Enforce" is the word employed by the ordinance. For the meaning of this word it was not necessary to resort to Johnson or Webster: the law may be "enforced" by execution, by judicial process, by a simple demand of payment of duties by a United States' officer. It needs not the iron grasp of power, the naked sword, or the fixed bayonet, to constitute enforcement of the laws. You enforce the laws every day, and every hour of every day, in the most tranquil state of society. This enforcement of the laws it is which is, after the 1st of February, to be construed into an attempt to put down the people of South Carolina, and to justify the calling forth of thousands upon thousands of armed men to resist it.

Mr. W. here referred to the Charleston Mercury, which he held in his hands, containing the proceedings of a great meeting held at Charleston, South Carolina, on the 21st instant, among which were a number of resolutions, adopting the cockade to which he had reference yesterday, intermingled with notices of "Call to arms!" "Attention, volunteers!" &c.; and one of these resolutions (which he read) declares that the persons assembled at this meeting not only affirm the right of the State peaceably to secede from the Union, but are prepared, if needs be, to peril their lives in the assertion of this claim, &c. Yes, sir, said Mr. W., if not prevented, secession is at hand; for the very moment that the marshal of the district calls out the posse comitatus, and heads that posse to enforce a judgment of the federal court to compel the payment of duties on imports, (after the 1st of February,) then has the contingency occurred of an attempt to enforce the laws; then has secession become the alternative. With regard to secession, Mr. W. went on to cite cases to show the consequences to which the admission of this right in any State would lead, should other States adopt the heresy affirmed by the meeting whose proceedings he had read. This view of the subject he followed by saying, that nullification, unless merged in revolution, was not to be stopped. The honorable member had told the House, that laying this bill on the table, and passing the bill depending in the other House, would put a stop to nullification. But what surety was there even of this? After the 1st of February, nullification, with all its attributes and incidents, was to be in full operation in South Carolina. What would be its political operation? Where would it end? He put this question plainly to the gentleman from South Carolina. A convention of the States was out of the question; an amendment of the constitution was out of the question—where was the contest to end? Why, the laws must be suspended. South Carolina, whilst represented on this floor, (ably as she is, and he hoped long would be,) participating in the making of laws, would be obeying just such of them as she pleased, and no more—cutting and carving with her own sword to suit herself! What a state of things was this!

[Mr. CALHOUN here said, that South Carolina would be content to maintain this contest upon the principle of protection, paying, without objection, whatever taxes might be required to be levied for the purposes of revenue.]

Mr. WILKINS—If South Carolina appeals to the federal judiciary, she can bring up the question of the validity of any part of the revenue laws for decision, by the federal courts. Mr. W. had no doubt of the influence of the Senator from South Carolina over the people of that State, but no one had power to say what course that State would take if the suggestion of the Senator should be adopted. We must take this matter as we unfortunately find it. The merchants of Charleston may import goods free of duty, and the merchants of Baltimore, New York, &c. must pay duties. The people of South Carolina are exempt from all taxation by duties on imports, which is the only taxation known to our laws; and the people of the rest of the Union are compelled to pay taxes. South Carolina participates in the benefits, but not in the burdens of the Government. The ordinance, to this effect, South Carolina is pledged to maintain; and it declares that no power shall prevent free ingress and egress into and from her ports. Every stream of water in the limits of the State, accessible from the ocean, is made a free port. Wherever goods are introduced and landed, all obligation to pay the duties vanishes before the magical influence of nullification.

The State of South Carolina is, quoad the revenue laws, out of the Union. As to the revenue system, our fellow-citizens of South Carolina are gone from us. What, then, is to prevent the goods imported into the State from being distributed into every part of the interior and along the coast? A legalized system would be introduced—he would not say of smuggling, for he would not impute so opprobrious a crime to the authorities of that State; but free ports make free goods, and nullification makes free ports. Well, sir, what will prevent the goods from being sent to other States? Take the marks off from the goods, and they may be sent any where. If nullification exempts goods from duties in South Carolina, it exempts them every where. They are marked "State rights," and the vessel is called "State sovereignty." They will not be imported under the glorious flag of the Union, but under the flag of South Carolina. South Carolina has got her ordinance. Now we shall see how she will put it in execution, how it works practically. It will make general confusion, defeat equality in public burdens, and demoralize the community.

As nullification is now about to go into full operation, what is to stay the hands of South Carolina, and prevent her from executing her present purpose? He was aware of the wide range of discussion which the question connected with this subject would lead to. But this was the time for bringing those questions before Congress for decision. They should decide now, in one way or other. I am young and stout, said Mr. W., and am willing to see the question tried, and to abide the end of it. The whole question comes to a single point. What is the constitutional relation of a single State to the United States? If the Government is merely an "alliance of States, a federal league between several distinct and independent sovereignties, from which any one may withdraw, there is an end of the question and of our bill. For South Carolina, leaning upon her sovereignty and reserved rights, has exercised the power which she claims of obeying and disobeying a law of the Union, just as she may construe it to be constitutional or unconstitutional.

An attempt on his part to throw any additional light on this subject would be as unnecessary as to contribute a drop of water to the ocean. It was enough for him that he had a few well settled principles on this point, which he had always entertained, and which had been acted on from the foundation of the Government to the present time. The constitution was formed by the people. It was adopted by the States, which, like individuals, surrendered a portion of their sovereignty for the security of the rest. Those powers which are thus surrendered, however limited in number, are supreme in extent and application. The second paragraph in the 6th article of the constitution was, as it appeared to him, framed to meet this very case—to meet State legislation, State nullification—to meet the case of State legislation which attempts to overthrow national legislation.

"This constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby.

any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

This supremacy of power was necessary for the general welfare, because it consists in the use of powers which could not be confined to, nor exercised by, any one State. We always had a Union. The great object of the people, from one period to another, has been to render the Union "more perfect." Virginia took the lead in the last attempt, and her statesmen were among its foremost champions. Experience had manifested the want of a supreme power to bear immediately upon the people of the States. The laws of the old confederation bore on the States alone. Hence the constitution begins, "We, the people;" and the conclusion of the 8th section of the 1st article, giving power to Congress "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof," and the emphatic conclusion declaring such laws to be the supreme law of the land, in the aggregate sense of the term.

We owe allegiance both to the United States and to the State of which we are citizens. Are there, sir, any citizens who owe no allegiance to the United States? Have the people of South Carolina abandoned the proud title of citizens of the United States? Has the General Government any power or quality of political sovereignty at all? If it has, that power must be brought to bear directly upon the people of the States, and of each State.

The Government of the United States forms a part of the Government of each State, enters into it, and supplies whatever may be wanting in State powers. You cannot bring about obedience to the laws, if their obligations and binding force are not directly on the people. If the laws are brought to bear on the States, they may wrap themselves up in their sovereignty and their reserved rights, resort to nullification, and, claiming the power to put their veto on the acts of Congress, they may overthrow your whole system of legislation. This doctrine impairs not the sovereignty of the people. The people retain their sovereignty in reference to the United States as well as to their respective States. They act here as well as in their State Legislatures. Whenever you exercise one of your great constitutional powers, the people act here, and are therefore bound by the law which they themselves made. This is the perfection of political institutions. The people make the laws, and the laws govern. The States are secure in their rights, and always were secure. He admitted their original absolute sovereignty; but, as he had said before, they yielded up a portion of that sovereignty for the general good.

This is a constitution of power "granted," as a lawyer would say, "for a valuable consideration." By the grant of these powers, you created the constitution of the Union. You cannot take them back at pleasure. Here are we asked—can the creature be greater than the creator? No. But the creator may be bound by the act of the creature; the principal may be bound by the act of the agent, if the agent acts in pursuance of delegated power, particularly when the interests of third persons are concerned. We say to South Carolina, our prosperity depends upon the permanence of a system which you created; and you cannot take back the power which you gave to your agents to exercise.

On the subject of practical nullification, Mr. W. said he had made some notes, and the very circumstances which he had anticipated had happened. From a late number of the Charleston Mercury, which he held in his hand, he read an account of a great State rights meeting at Charleston, whereat resolutions were adopted for forming companies to import goods free of duty. The merchants of South Carolina would, it was thought, be reluctant to hazard their commercial credit and convenience by availing themselves of the replevin law; and it had been doubted whether the force of the ordinance would be tried. But, as he had expected, the politicians, not the merchants, had formed a plan for trying the experiment. Preparations had been made to bring the question to an issue as soon as the 1st day of February arrived. He had made a note of the questions which would arise out of these considerations, but he would not detain the Senate by noticing them.

He would pass to the consideration of the provisions in the bill. The first section of the bill contains provisions which are preventive and peaceful. Mr. W. then read from the first section of the bill, as follows:

"Be it enacted, &c. That whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, or unlawful threats or menaces against officers of the United States, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President, to execute the revenue laws, and collect the duties on imports in the ordinary way in any collection district, it shall and may be lawful for the President to direct that the custom-house for such district be established and kept in any secure place within some port or harbor of such district, either upon land or on board any vessel," &c.

It enjoins forbearance on the Executive, and gives him power to remove the custom-house to a secure place, where the duties may be collected. It leaves the ports and districts as they now are, open for the commercial convenience of the good people of the State; and even the custom-house would not be taken from the port or harbor where it now is. Our object in removing the custom-house is to prevent all collision, if possible. The words "threats and menaces" do not run through the residue of the section. The power given in this clause is not new; the clause is simply declaratory of the existing law, as it has been held by our courts; for it has been decided, that where it is impossible to collect the duties, the officers of the customs may remove the custom-house.

The next paragraph provides for the cash payment of duties under circumstances which render it impossible to collect the duties in the ordinary way. This is no great matter. We have already abolished the credits on duties to some extent, and this law carries out the system farther. Why should the practice of taking bonds be persisted in when they say they are not bound to pay the bonds. It is a mockery to take bonds when the constitution and the law release the people bound from the obligation of the bonds. Suits must be brought to enforce the payment of the bonds, and the authority of the State and federal tribunals would thereby be brought into conflict, which conflict the bill sought to avoid. The 62d section of the act of the 2d March, 1799, refuses credit to merchants who have refused to pay their bonds. The same principle is applied to the present case, where people are combined to prevent the payment of bonds.

The third and remaining exigency provided for in this first section is the authority to employ the land or naval forces, or militia. This provision is entirely defensive. It merely confirms the authority for the protection of the custom-house and revenue officers. The simple question is—do you require obedience to the laws? How can you make the people of South Carolina pay the duties? The custom-house officers are not sufficiently numerous to enforce obedience to the laws; pains, penalties, indictments, all hang over the head of that man who is bold enough to exact payment. The Legislature forbids the enforcement of the law; and he who attempts to enforce it must suffer the penalty of the law as surely as he is convicted of the offence. The marshal, in this stage of the business, cannot interpose. The militia cannot be called out, for the best reason in the world—that they are committed in support of the other side of the question. Now what is to be done? It is the duty of the President to take care that the laws shall be executed. He is invested with the power by the constitution, and the public hold him responsible for its exercise. You can vest the power no where else. The first section of the second article of the constitution invests the President with the "executive power," and he is required to take an oath faithfully to execute the office and preserve the constitution. The second section of the same article makes him the commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, and of the militia, when called into actual service. The only question is—is it necessary to give these means to enforce the laws? If we intend to enforce obedience to the laws, these powers must be given, and no where can they be constitutionally lodged but in the President. We give Andrew Jackson power simply to execute, for a limited time, the revenue laws of the country. Well, we confide this power to a man who has never abused any power reposed in him. He said that these proceedings were long anticipated. They were the subject of discussion during the late Presidential contest. Every vote had an eye to the South. He spoke this with respect to the other candidates, all of whom he knew would have supported the constitution. He made no invidious distinctions.

Why did South Carolina throw away her vote on a distinguished individual, who was not a candidate? With an eye to this question. Why did the people of the United States vote for Andrew Jackson? With a view to this same question. For this provision in the law there was a precedent, to which he would refer. The act of 9th January, 1809, sec. 11-13, vol. 4, p. 194-5, to enforce the embargo, &c. The 2d section of the bill extends the jurisdiction of the circuit courts in revenue cases. It gives the right to sue in these courts for any injury incurred by officers, whilst engaged under the laws of Congress in the collection of duties on imports. It declares that property taken under the authority of the laws of the United States shall be irrepleviable, and only subject to the order and decrees of the courts of the United States; and it gives the penalty for the rescue of the property as is prescribed by the act of 30th April, 1790, sec. 22, vol. 2, p. 95. The provisions of that law make the penalty not to exceed three hundred dollars, and imprisonment for three months. This section has two objects in view: first, it gives power to the officers to sue in the federal courts; and second, it provides that they shall not be dispossessed of property seized by them under the laws of the General Government, without the authority of the courts of the United States. The object of this section is to meet legislation by legislation. There is nothing in this provision shocking or harsh.

The laws of South Carolina, made to enforce the ordinance, are harsh and oppressive beyond any of the feudal laws. Under the replevin act of South Carolina, the goods are first seized; if they are not given up, the return is made, and a capias in withernam issues; there is then a suit to recover back the duties; the custom-house officer cannot remove the suit to any other court, and the judges and jurors who are to decide the case are under oath to support the ordinance. For this misdemeanor the officers are subject to a fine of five hundred dollars and two years imprisonment. And they are liable to have their own property, to double the amount of the goods seized, taken and carried away. Every professional man knows to what cases a replevin law is usually confined. It views the custom-house officer, while discharging his duty, as a trespasser. If the replevy is not obeyed, the intermediate inquiry which the common law provides is discarded, and a writ of reprisal issues. It is not left discretionary with the sheriff to take enough to satisfy the demand; but he is bound to take double the amount. There is no danger that this part of the law can ever be executed, for no one person will have property enough for so tremendous a grasp. The goods are taken finally from the custom-house officer and carried off; and if he attempt to recapture them, he is liable to a fine of ten thousand dollars, and two years imprisonment. No such indictment is subject to traverse; that is, the accused shall not cross it; he shall not deny the facts alleged; he shall not plead "not guilty." This is the technical effect of refusing a traverse. But can the word be taken in that sense in South Carolina? Perhaps the word, as used in the ordinance, has a meaning peculiar to the South.

Mr. MILLER explained. The word had a peculiar meaning in South Carolina. At the first court the accused could traverse, but he had no right to continue the action. The ordinance denied the right to the accused to continue the case after the first term, except for cause shown. The ordinance, in creating this misdemeanor, merely applies to it the legal forms which in that State apply to all misdemeanors.

Mr. WILKINS.—It was apparent that the constitution of the courts in South Carolina makes it necessary to give the revenue officers the right to sue in the federal courts. It was not intended to restrict this right to any amount in controversy, nor to citizens of other States. It falls under the clause of the constitution which gives jurisdiction to the United States' courts in all cases arising under the constitution, treaties, and laws of the United States. He would put a case in a few words: Suppose the collector of the port of South Carolina is prosecuted. He is carried to prison, or the capias in withernam is issued against him. His property is carried off and sold. The case comes before the State court. He sets forth that, under the laws of the United States, he was obliged to do his duty. On the other side, it is said that the laws of the United States had been nullified; and the State laws had taken their place. Out of this issue springs a case provided for by the bill. But it is objected that the case will arise under the State law. But, shape it which way you may, the case arises out of the laws and constitution of the United States, and the judicial power extends to all cases in law and equity. It ought to be so. There ought to be a judicial power co-extensive with the power of legislation, and a co-extensive executive power. Without this co-extensive power, legislation would be useless in a free Government. Neither domestic tranquillity, nor uniformity of rules and decisions, can be secured without it.

It may be said, (continued Mr. W.) that in this way you overturn the State legislation, and that they ought to give their own direction to State controversies. So they may; but let them not come in collision with the constitution and laws of the Union. In every controversy within any State, arising under a State law, coming in collision with the constitution, or with a law of the United States, the federal courts have appellate jurisdiction. He felt himself too much exhausted to read a case or two to which he desired to call the attention of the Senate. But he meant to content himself with a mere reference to the case of Martin vs. Hunter's lessee, in 1st Wheaton, p. 304, and the case of Cohens vs. the State of Virginia, 6th Wheaton, p. 584, where this point had been decided. If appellate jurisdiction be given, the original could not be desired. All the residuum of jurisdiction remaining, after the original jurisdiction given in specified cases to the Supreme Court, might be exercised in any way by the inferior courts that Congress might direct. These observations were applicable to the third section of the bill, which also provides for the extension of judicial jurisdiction, by allowing the party or officer of the United States sued in the State courts for executing the laws of the Union, to remove the case to the circuit court. It gives the right to remove at any time before trial, but not after judgment had been given; and thus affects in no way the dignity of the State tribunals. Whether in criminal or in civil cases, it gives this right of removal. Has Congress this power in criminal cases? He would answer the question in the affirmative. Congress had the power to give this right in criminal as well as in civil cases, because the second section of the third article of the constitution speaks of "all cases in law and equity;" and these comprehensive terms cover all. He referred to the case of Matthews vs. Zane, 4th Cranch, page 382, which decides that, if two citizens of the same State, in a suit in their State court, claim title under the same act of Congress, the Supreme Court has an appellate jurisdiction to revise and correct the decision of that court.

The decision was founded upon the principle that the 3d act of the constitution, considered in connexion with the judiciary act of 1789, would not give it a more extensive construction than it merited; and that the great object was, to render uniform the construction of the laws of the United States, and decisions under them upon the rights of individuals; and in such case it was entirely immaterial that both parties were citizens of the same State.

It was admitted by Mr. Harper, counsel for defendant in error, that the exercise of jurisdiction in such case would be undoubted, if it was to maintain the authority of the laws of the United States against encroachments of the State authorities. The clause in the constitution to which he had adverted refers to the character of the controversy, without regard to the parties, or the particular form of the action. The object of the suit, and not the tribunal, determined the jurisdiction. Was it to try the validity of an act of Congress? That question determined the jurisdiction. Was it to try any indictment for treason? That question determined the jurisdiction. It was more necessary that this jurisdiction should be extended over criminal than over civil cases. If it was not admitted that the federal judiciary had jurisdiction over criminal cases, then was nullification ratified and sealed forever: for a State would have nothing more to do than to declare an act a felony or a misdemeanor to nullify all the laws of the Union. There were numerous prejudices—prejudices peculiar to particular States, which, under any other view, would throw all jurisdiction into the State tribunals.

Mr. W. would put a case to the Southern gentlemen, by way of illustration. It was one which they would feel disposed to resent, and one to which he felt a repugnance to refer; but he would take it as illustrative of the opinions he had thrown out. There was to be found in the constitution a clause which gives the right to the owner of a slave to pursue him from one State to another, and to take him wherever he may find him. Now it was known that there was in some States a strong feeling on this subject, and that particularly was this sensibility to be found in the State of Pennsylvania, where it was carried to a very great extent. In great party times, he would suppose that a party in Pennsylvania rallied on this great principle. Pennsylvania was covered over with zealous and highly respectable abolition societies. He would suppose that Pennsylvania carried these feelings to such an extent, as to pass a law to nullify this clause in the constitution. He stated that he had, in the judicial station which he had occupied, had cases brought before him for decision, in which he had felt it to be extremely difficult to keep down this feeling. It had been even contended before him that the pursuit of the slave by his owner into that State was an unconstitutional act. He would suppose that Pennsylvania was to pass a law, declaring that the moment a slave sets foot on her soil, he shall be at once elevated to the rank and privileges of a freeman, and that thus she should nullify the clause in the constitution on this point.

It would be deemed very hard by the Southern gentlemen that they could not try the question of the constitutionality of that law before the Supreme Court. And if the State of Pennsylvania were to pass a law imposing a fine of ten thousand dollars and five years' imprisonment on any owner of a slave found in pursuit of him, and that her jurors and judges are all sworn to regard this law, he would ask whether the United States' courts could not have jurisdiction in this matter. The power of the Judiciary would be entirely nugatory if it could be evaded by throwing the case into the form of a criminal proceeding. He referred the Senate to the cases of the United States vs. Moore, 3d Cranch p. 159, where it was admitted that Congress might give the power; and to that of Martin vs. Hunter's lessee, 1 Wheaton, p. 350-1, where it was admitted that criminal are the strongest cases.

The fourth section of the bill was merely matter of form. There was no constitutional principle involved in it. It only authorized the courts of the United States to supply the want of a copy of the record. It was intended to obviate the difficulty which was likely to arise from the novel provision contained in the 8th section of the replevin law of South Carolina, which makes it penal in the clerk to furnish such record. This provision did not meddle with the penalty of the clerk of the State court, but contented itself with providing means to supply the deficiency.

The fifth section authorizes the employment of military force under extraordinary circumstances too powerful to be overcome without such agency, and to be preceded by the proclamation of the President. What he had already said had reference also to this section of the bill. He would now merely refer the Senate to some precedents.

The first precedent which he would notice was to be found in the act of May 2d, 1792, vol. 2, p. 284, repealed by the act of February 28, 1795, renewing the power to call forth the militia, which act was still in force. This law grew out of the Western Insurrection in Pennsylvania. Like the present bill, although it was merely intended to meet that exigency, it was so framed as to continue in force. So the bill under consideration, although it had special reference to South Carolina, pointed not to her alone. If the opposition to the laws should extend itself, and the spirit of disobedience should exhibit itself, whether in the South or the North, the general principles of the bill would be equally applicable. It was an amendment of our code of laws to which the attention of Congress had now been called, and which was rendered immediately necessary by the peculiarity of our present situation.

The second precedent to which he would invite the attention of the Senate was the act of the 3d of March, 1807, vol. 4, p. 115, "to suppress insurrections and obstructions to the laws," and "to cause the laws to be duly executed." That act authorized the President to call out the land and naval forces to suppress insurrections, &c. These were the objects for which then, as in the present bill, this extraordinary power had been conferred.

Another precedent would be found in the act of January 9, 1809, sec. 11, vol. 4, p. 194, to enforce the embargo, and which gives the power to employ the land and naval forces, in general terms, to assist the custom-house officers. There was at that moment a great excitement, although nothing like the solemn position in which South Carolina has now placed herself. Yet it was deemed expedient to confer on the President this power.

He would now refer to the last precedent with which he should trouble the Senate. It so happened in the history of Pennsylvania, that that State took from Virginia a strip of land bordering on the Alleghany and Ohio rivers. On this strip of land, where Virginia had been accustomed to exercise jurisdiction, for which she had opened the titles, and where she had held her courts, there arose an insurrection. This had been called the Western Insurrection, but it was a singular fact that it was confined to this narrow strip of land which Pennsylvania took from Virginia. The President was then authorized to call out the militia of the State, because they were not committed against the United States, but were willing to obey the call. The man to whose name history has no parallel put himself at the head of these troops to quell the insurrection. All power was placed in his hands by the act of November 24, 1794, vol. 2, p. 451, and the President was authorized to place in West Pennsylvania a corps of 2,500 men, either draughted or enlisted.

The sixth section of the bill had reference to the replevin law of South Carolina, and was justified and rendered necessary by the 12th section of that act, which prohibited any person from hiring or permitting to be used any building, to serve as a jail for the confinement of any person committed for a violation of the revenue laws, under penalty of being adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor, and fined 1000 dollars, and imprisoned for one year. The State law, therefore, closes all the jails and buildings of South Carolina against prisoners held by process from the United States for a refusal to yield obedience to their laws. It was necessary, therefore, that something should be done. The case might not be fully met by the resolution of 3d March, 1791, vol. 2. p. 236; and this section merely incorporates that provision, without the introduction of any novel principle.

The seventh and remaining section of the bill extends the writ of habeas corpus to a case not covered by existing laws. These laws do not extend to any other than cases of confinement under the authority of the United States, and when committed for trial before the United States' courts, or are necessary to testify. He referred the Senate to vol. 2, p. 63, to the 14th section of the judiciary act. The present section merely extended the privileges of that act, which was so essential to the protection of the liberties of our citizens. It extended the act to cases of imprisonment for executing the laws of the United States. There would be nothing objectionable in this section; it came in conflict with no code of law. If a citizen were confined under the provisions of the ordinance of the 24th November, 1832, he could have no remedy under the laws as they now exist. As all such cases arose under the laws of the State of South Carolina, this section only extended the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus to meet those particular cases which had originated in the present state of things.

He had now done, having fully attempted to explain the reasons which had induced him to give his sanction to the bill. He should only say, in addition, that if it were the pleasure of Congress to enact this bill into a law, he should most fervently pray that no occasion might ever occur to require a resort to its provisions. It was his desire that the present bill, when it should become a law, might be rendered unnecessary by a return of the state of happy tranquillity which would renew the cement of our Union, and might lie for ages to come, without the necessity of reference to its provisions, slumbering in the libraries of the lawyer and among the archives of legislation.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 30.

THE COLLECTION BILL.

The Senate having resumed the consideration of the bill to provide further for the collection of the duties on imports—

Mr. GRUNDY asked leave to re-state what had been already stated by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, as to the amendments which the committee proposed to move in the bill. The first amendment was to strike out, in the 29th clause of the 1st section, the words "prevent or," (the effect of which is to exclude the power proposed to be conferred on the President of the United States to use military force to prevent, as well as to suppress, any riotous assemblage, &c.) The second was to limit the operation of the bill to the close of the next session of Congress. As the amendments were of much importance, he had felt desirous to present them more distinctly to the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. BIBB then rose to address the Senate. My voice, said he, is still for peace. Thinking it expedient, I desire to secure it by means most sure and practicable. I did wish that the discussion might have been delayed yet longer, to have advantage of all circumstances that might occur, as well those which might result from the legislative action of the Congress, as from the action of the Legislatures of the States, and also from the friends of conciliation and fraternal concord generally.

His wishes on this subject had to yield to those who differed from him, and he was now compelled to enter into this discussion, and to deliver such views as appeared to him just, upon the question at issue. In doing this, he hoped he should observe that decorum which became him as a member of that distinguished body; and that he should in no instance be found transcending that respect which he had ever felt for those with whom he had the honor there to be associated. He sincerely hoped that, even in the heat of argument, not a single expression might escape his lips, calculated to add to that excitement, which, both in doors and out of doors, was, he feared, already great enough, if not too great. But it was necessary, from the nature of the subject, to touch on the conflicting opinions of two great parties which had been distinguished in the United States, and had alternately held the reins of Government. He had, from early life, belonged to one of these parties; he had never swerved from its doctrines; and, in his old age, he still saw reason to abide by them. It was his wish, therefore, on the present occasion, to put his opinions fairly before the public, that he might not be understood or thought to advocate doctrines which he did not advocate.

He would tell them, then, in the outset, that he loved the Union. It was because he did love the Union that he felt himself then compelled to join in that debate. He wished to cherish the Union. He would cherish it as a safeguard against foreign invasion. He would cherish it as a bond of peace and concord at home. He would cherish it as the most likely means of protecting the country from the evils which history told them had befallen other Governments, who had, at one time, enjoyed a considerable share of liberty; the horrors which had befallen revolutionary France; and the evils which had been acted almost before their eyes in South America. He would not go into a detail of the horrors of civil war. He would leave them to the mind of every Senator to imagine; but he must believe that the most vivid imagination would fall far short of anticipating the horrors of a civil war like that which appeared about to be brought on this country. When he looked at the prospects before them, promising no alleviation of the burdens of the protective tariff, and at the bill under consideration, he could not but fear that those awful consequences, civil war and disunion, must follow its passage.

A message had been sent to them from the President of the United States, together with a proclamation addressed by him to the people of the United States. They had been told by the honorable Senator, who was the chairman of the committee by which this bill was reported, and who opened the debate, that this bill was responsive to the message of the Executive; that it was calculated and designed to meet the state of things there portrayed, the facts and the circumstances alluded to in the proclamation and message. Whilst it was admitted that this was an act of high legislation, it was justified on the ground that it was necessary. He should, then, treat the bill as though the amendments offered that morning by his friend from Tennessee were already in the bill; they proposed to make it not a permanent law, but to limit its duration to the end of the next session of Congress. He should treat its provisions, therefore, as intended to operate directly on South Carolina—he meant the state of things in South Carolina as declared and portrayed in the message of the President, in the ordinance of South Carolina, in the test oath, and in all the other public acts alluded to in the message—the proclamation, and the train of reasoning in the proclamation and the message, as applicable to the state of things in South Carolina—of things expected, not done.

Pursuing this object, he said that, so far as South Carolina was concerned, the ordinance was made by the people of that State in their highest sovereign character, organized in convention. It was done by South Carolina in her character of a State. So were also her legislative acts. The whole proceedings in South Carolina, to which the proclamation and message allude, are facts done upon paper, committed by words, not an overt act of resistance in the country: not any blow struck; no violence acted; no plan executed by force; no act done, or threatened, by a lawless banditti, or by a riotous assemblage of individuals convened without authority, or in contempt of the State authority, is communicated. But every fact in South Carolina complained of relates to things transacted by the people of South Carolina acting in their high sovereign character in convention, and through the legislative and executive departments of their organized government. Every thing which has been complained of is done by the State of South Carolina.

Here, once for all, he desired it to be remembered, that, when he spoke of a State, he did not mean an intangible being, a mere abstraction, without body, soul, intelligence, or moral responsibility; but of a State, in the sense in which the term was understood in international law, and in our own codes, as people within a defined territory, bound together by social compact, having a Government and laws to which they look for justice and protection, and to which they owe the corresponding obligations of allegiance and support.

In the argument he was about to make, he did not intend to justify the extremities to which South Carolina had gone, nor to defend all the positions she had assumed. He meant to examine the constitution of the country; its constituent parts; its checks and balances; for the purpose of testing the soundness of the doctrines in the proclamation and the message, and proposed by the bill to be established by force of arms.

It seems to me that the subjects embraced by the proceedings of South Carolina afford ample field for the exercise of intellect with intellect; sufficient room for the exercise of a mutual spirit of amity, concession, and conciliation, without resorting to the sword and the bayonet, to put up or to put down the political creed of the one or the other party.

I have witnessed the ragings of the natural elements, when the blackening clouds gathered. I have seen the forked flashes blaze upon the mountain, and yet the rock that decked the mountain's brow, and defied the storm, remained unscathed by the lightnings of heaven. I have heard the clamoring of the winds, and seen the proud forest bend before the majesty of nature. In the fury of the storm I have seen the fond mother press her infant to her bosom, and sigh with fearful apprehension that her husband might be exposed, houseless, "to bide the peltings of the pitiless storm." But, in the darkest gloom of elemental strife, there was a consolation; for there was an assurance that the storm would cease; that the sun would again shed his gladdening rays on herb, tree, fruit, and flower, displaying the charms of nature in renovated health and refreshed verdure. But when, in the storm now gathering in the political horizon, I shall hear the blast of a trumpet, the neighing of the steeds, the noisy drum, the resoundings of the heavy-toned fiery-mouthed cannon; when I shall see the glittering of small arms; when I shall read the proclamation preparatory to mortal strife between States and State, and know that the strife is in fact begun "in all the pride, and pomp, and circumstance of war," I shall then despair. There will be no assurance that the constitution will erect its proud crest above the struggling hosts, and come out unscathed from the contest. I have no assurance that the Union will survive the carnage and embittered feelings engendered in the impious war of child against parent, brother against brother. I have no assurance that the rays of civil liberty will again gladden with their mild beneficence this once happy land. These are my apprehensions. The union of these States is too precious to be set at hazard, or sported with by tilts and tournaments. He said the provisions of the fifth section of the bill appeared to him to lead, by a direct road, to civil war and a severance of the States.

Mr. B. said, it seemed to him that a false issue was presented. The question of war against South Carolina is presented as the only alternative. This issue was false. The first question is between justice and injustice. Shall we do justice to the States who have united with South Carolina in complaint and remonstrance against the injustice and oppression of the tariff? Shall we cancel the obligations of justice to five other States, because of the impetuosity and impatience of South Carolina under wrong and oppression? The question ought not to be whether we have the physical power to crush South Carolina; but whether it is not our duty to heal her discontents; to conciliate a member of the Union; to give peace and happiness to the adjoining States which have made common cause with South Carolina, so far as complaint and remonstrance go. Are we to rush into a war with South Carolina to compel her to remain in the Union? Shall we keep her in the Union by force of arms, for the purpose of compelling her submission to the tariff laws of which she complains? How shall we do this? By the naval and military force of the United States, combined with the militia? Where will the militia come from? Will Virginia, will North Carolina, will Georgia, Mississippi, or Alabama, assist to enforce submission to the tariff laws, the justice and constitutionality of which they have, by resolutions on your files, denied over and over again? Will those States assist to forge chains by which they themselves are to be bound? Is this to be expected in the ordinary course of chance and probability?

He earnestly entreated the Senators to reflect on the probable consequences of the measures proposed by the bill. Are we not approaching too near to the condition of Great Britain, when the colonies were petitioning for a redress of grievances? when the ministry, armed with her military and naval forces, looked on the remonstrances of her colonies with contempt? Their complaints could not reach the throne; their reasonings could only awaken the liberals of the kingdom, but could not quench the ministerial thirst for money and for power.

Has not South Carolina been treated by the proclamation pretty much in the style in which Lord Hillsborough treated the colony of Massachusetts, requiring that certain resolutions should be rescinded?—[Here Mr. B. read from Holmes's America, the following:]

"On the 22d of April, 1768, Lord Hillsborough wrote to Governor Barnard, of Massachusetts, stating that the proceeding which gave rise to the circular letter was 'unfair, contrary to the real sense of the assembly, and procured by surprise;' and instructing him, 'so soon as the General Court is again assembled, to require of the House of Representatives, in his Majesty's name, to rescind the resolution which gave birth to the circular letter from the Speaker, to declare their disapprobation of, and dissent to, that rash and hasty proceeding.'"

Mr. B. proceeded to allude to the obnoxious acts which gave rise to the resistance of Massachusetts to the British power—the Boston port bill, the tea tax, &c. Great Britain sent her armies in the confident expectation that the province would be immediately overrun. But what had aggrieved and injured the interests of Massachusetts, touched the rights and interests of all; and all united in one common cause, united to resist what they all believed to be oppressive and unjust.

He would here notice objections which he had heard (he would not say on that floor) to reducing the tariff, according to the recommendation of the President's message.

It is said, "South Carolina has put herself in battle array against the Government; she has assumed a military attitude; and the Congress of the United States must not be dictated to by a member of the Union." She must submit. In like manner Lord North reasoned in his day. [Here Mr. B. read from Mr. Holmes's History, as follows:]

"On the 12th of April, 1770, the King gave his consent to the act of repealing the duties, with the exception of the duty on tea. When the stamp act was repealed, the Parliament took care to pass an act 'for securing the dependence of America on Great Britain.' That declaratory act, and this reservation of the duty on tea, left the cause of contention between the two countries in its entire force. Lord North, who had moved the repeal of the obnoxious port duties of 1776, excepting the duty on tea, being strongly urged by the members in opposition not to persevere in the contention, when he relinquished the revenue, replied: 'Has the repeal of the stamp act taught the Americans obedience? Has our lenity inspired them with moderation? Can it be proper, while they deny our legal power to tax them, to acquiesce in the argument of illegality, and, by the repeal of the whole law, to give up that power? No: the properest time to exert our rights of taxation is when the right is refused. To temporize is to yield; and the authority of the mother country, if it is now unsupported, will, in reality, be relinquished forever. A total repeal cannot be thought of till America is prostrate at our feet.'"

Lord North's pompous idea of prostrating America before the British lion proved to be but a phantasma which tickled the brain of a haughty aristocracy, in the confidence of power, forgetting right: a project of oppression and injustice which the Omnipotent Dispenser of Justice would not suffer to be carried into execution. Let us take warning from our experience; let us profit by the example; let us avoid a similar catastrophe. If we turn a deaf ear to the complaints and remonstrances of the South; if we attempt to silence and put down, by force of arms, the voice of reason and justice; may not the attempt be followed by similar misfortunes—by a like fatal catastrophe? May we not see a union of common resistance, established by common interest, among those who suffer in common with South Carolina? May we not see another union arise, on the ruins of the present constitution, in that section of the country which is now complaining and suffering under the system of protective duties? Let us pause before we follow the example of Great Britain; let us not rashly rush into civil war; let us examine the foundations of our institutions; let us look at the past and the future, and see if it be wise, prudent, or just, to make war upon a sovereign people—a State—a constituent member of this Union of States. It is not a mob, a parcel of rioters, a lawless pack of banditti and insurgents, that this bill proposes to "suppress" by military force. It is not a "riotous assemblage of persons resisting the custom-house officers," "or in any other manner" opposing the execution of the revenue laws, "or otherwise assisting and abetting violations of the same." No; it is the State of South Carolina: the people acting in convention by ordinance; the Legislature and the Executive of South Carolina, truly called by this bill a "riotous assemblage."

Her ordinance and her laws are alluded to under the words, "or in any other manner opposing, or otherwise assisting and abetting." Disguise it as they may, by applying nicknames, contrary to the usage of language, the Government, and authorities and people of South Carolina, acting in obedience to her ordinance and laws, are aimed at, and intended to be included in the provisions of this bill. Mr. B. said he could not be under a mistake in this. The chairman of the committee has told us the bill was responsive to the message; that argues upon the ordinance and laws of South Carolina; and so has the honorable chairman.

This bill proposes to treat the people of South Carolina, who shall act in obedience to the State ordinance and laws, as rioters and insurgents. It proposes to place the allegiance of the people of the State to their immediate State Government in direct collision with their fidelity to the Federal Government; to place the citizens of South Carolina in an attitude in which they must be compelled to take part in arms with the federal authorities, or with the State authorities. Both Governments have the power to define and punish treason, and other offences; both Governments have the power to call the militia into service. The plain, peaceable, sober, industrious, unsophisticated citizens, are to be placed in the sad alternative of committing treason and crime, either against their State Government, or against the Federal Government. If they refuse to obey the call of their State, they are subject to punishment; if they do obey, and appear in arms against the military of the Federal Government, they are to be treated as enemies, and to be shot down. Take which side they may, if they survive the conflict, they are liable to be punished as offenders and traitors by the power which shall ultimately prevail in the contest. From treason, and crime, and disgrace, there is to be no refuge but in death.

There is an important distinction running throughout, between the cases for which the acts of Congress were heretofore made, and cited as military precedents, and the cases to which this bill is intended to apply. In the former, all the persons against whom the military force was authorized, were truly insurgent individuals, rioters, disturbers of the peace, not having the countenance, command, or panoply of State law and State authority—offenders against all authority, both State and federal. In the latter, the persons are countenanced, commanded, and authorized, and have the protection of the State. The former were literally and truly insurgents, banditti, rioters, and lawless: the latter are a nation, a State, a component member of this Union.

The bill proposes to invest the President with power to march the troops of one State into the bosom of another; to put the Union at war with itself; to wage a war which must involve the innocent with the guilty. Is not this consideration weighty enough of itself to turn our thoughts from such a measure, and to search for some other means of securing peace and good order?

Mr. President: If we make war upon the ordinance, and Government, and laws, and people of South Carolina—conquer her, prostrate her in the dust, what are we to do? Govern the people and territory as a conquered colony? South Carolina is a member of the Union, and the constitution guarantees to her a republican form of Government. If we extinguish her from the federal escutcheon, we violate the constitution. If we govern her by a peculiar law, different from the rule applicable to the other States, we break the constitution. Viewed in every light in which it is presented to my mind, the bill seems to me to be in conflict with the constitution, and tends to drive South Carolina from the Union by the power of the sword.

That I may not appear to have spoken too strongly, I will call the attention of the Senate to the first and fifth

Revenue Collection Bill.

[SENATE.]

sections of the bill. As to the others, although unguarded and objectionable, they may be amended. So long as the contest is between judiciary and judiciary, so long as it is waged by opinions and counter-opinions, with press and paper, or pen and paper, it is comparatively harmless. It is when force is to be employed that I am apprehensive of danger.

[Here Mr. B. read from the bill the provision which authorized the removal of the custom-houses, and even to keep them on board a vessel, where the collection of the revenue is obstructed or threatened: "and it shall be the duty of the collector to reside at such place, and there to detain all vessels and cargoes arriving within the said district, until the duties imposed on said cargoes by law be paid in cash, deducting interest, according to existing laws; and, in such cases, it shall be unlawful to take the vessel or cargo from the custody of the proper officer of the customs, unless by process from some court of the United States."]

On this part of the section he would remark, that, as it was applied to the State of South Carolina alone, it is a violation of the constitution, which requires that "no preference shall be given, by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one State over another." The distinction between one port and another is apparent and oppressive, which makes duties payable at one port in cash, and in others in bonds. As to so much of the section as directs that the goods shall be kept till the money is paid, he would say nothing, as he would not dwell on minute points while others of great importance demanded attention.

The section goes on to provide that "in case of any attempt otherwise to take any vessel or cargo by any force or combination, or assemblage of persons too great to be overcome by the officers of the customs, it shall and may be lawful for the President of the United States, or such person or persons as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces, or militia of the United States, as may be deemed necessary, for the purpose of preventing the removal of such vessel or cargo, and protecting the officers of the customs in retaining the custody thereof; and also for the purpose of suppressing any armed or riotous assemblage of persons resisting the custom-house officers in the exercise of their duties, or in any manner opposing the execution of the revenue laws of the United States, or otherwise violating or assisting and abetting violations of the same."

The offences included under the words "or in any manner opposing the execution of the revenue laws, or otherwise assisting and abetting," are too general and undefined. They do not go sufficiently into detail, to secure the rights of citizens in a free Government. Such general terms in creating offences, conferring powers on military officers to shoot down the supposed offenders, suit only despotic Governments, where the subject is considered but a thing, the property of the autocrat. They do not comport with the genius of our institutions. If the military is to supplant the civil authority; if, instead of a fair and impartial trial by jury, the supposed offender is to be executed at once by the soldiery, shot down as a wild beast, the offence should be clearly defined and flagrant. Now, sir, I do object to conferring on the Chief Magistrate and his subordinate military officers the power to declare and punish offences, included under such vague expressions. The power which I would give to the President of my choice, I would give to any other President; but I would not trust any President with such power. I would not set so bad an example, to exert its dangerous influence on future generations. If one President is invested with such authority, it becomes a precedent for future Legislatures to imitate and enlarge. My objections are not aimed at the man who is in the Executive chair, but they allude to general principles—to the safeguards of civil liberty.

Mr. B. then passed to the consideration of the fifth section, which he read as follows:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That whenever the President of the United States shall be officially informed by the authorities of any State, or by the circuit and one of the district judges of the United States, in the State, that, within the limits of such State, any law or laws of the United States, or the execution thereof, or of any process from the courts of the United States, will, in any event, be obstructed by the employment of military force, or by any other unlawful means, too great to be overcome by the ordinary course of judicial proceeding, or by the power vested in the marshal by existing laws, it shall be lawful for him, the President of the United States, forthwith to issue his proclamation, declaring such fact or information, and requiring all such military and other force forthwith to disperse; and if, at any time after issuing such proclamation, any such opposition or obstruction shall be made, in the manner or by the means aforesaid, the President shall be, and hereby is, authorized promptly to employ such means to resist and suppress the same, and to cause the said laws or process to be duly executed, as are authorized and provided in the cases therein mentioned by the act of the twenty-eighth of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, entitled "An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for that purpose;" and, also, by the act of the third of March, one thousand eight hundred and seven, entitled "An act authorizing the employment of the land and naval forces of the United States, in cases of insurrection."

Mark the words; when the President is officially informed that the operation of the law "will, in any event, be obstructed by military force," or "by any other unlawful means," &c., he may issue his proclamation, and thereafter employ military force. Now, sir, I beg leave to ask the meaning of "any other unlawful means."

Are they not intended to include the state of things in South Carolina? Do they not mean that, if the State shall not rescind the ordinance and her laws, the President may employ the army, navy, and militia, to compel her? They are intended to oppose South Carolina by force of arms—by war. Yes, sir, it is war against a State: it authorizes a declaration of war against the State of South Carolina, to be made by proclamation of the President, in his discretion, upon after, not upon existing facts.

The power to declare war is, by the constitution, vested in the Congress. They are to judge and decide on the policy and expediency of so calamitous a measure, before the honest industrious yeomanry of the country are called from their peaceful homes to partake of the toils, privations, and miseries of war. But in defence of the constitution, which he will violate by this very act, we are to confer upon a single Executive Magistrate the power vested in Congress by the constitution. Yes, sir, it is giving power to the President to declare war, and to make such declaration effectual by the naval and military forces. Sir, I am not in favor of this. "It has an awful squinting towards monarchy."

While on this part of the subject, my mind leads me to those times when the colonies maintained, as rightful, resistance to unjust and oppressive usurpation; when the spirit of freedom and patriotism animated the breasts of our ancestors. Great Britain attempted to introduce military force to overawe and humble the colony of Massachusetts. A resolution of the Legislature of Massachusetts was passed in 1769, declaring "that the establishment of a standing army in this colony, in time of peace, is an invasion of natural rights; that a standing army is not known as a part of the British constitution; that sending an armed force into the colony, under pretence of assisting the civil authority, is highly dangerous to liberty, unprecedented, and unconstitutional."

This bill proposes to send the army and navy against South Carolina, under pretence of assisting the civil authority of the United States. Instead of hearing the complaints of South Carolina, and legislating on the tariff, the source of her complaint, we authorize the President to declare war. By an act of conciliation, we may heal the unhappy discontents. Because public sentiment defies our law, we are invited to send a standing army to suppress the authorities of a sovereign State. Sir, is it not monstrous, when the very message of the President declares that the system complained of is unjust and oppressive, to seize upon this bill, and bring into effect the law of force, instead of the law of justice, reason, and conciliation? Instead of turning a listening ear to the complaints of South Carolina, we are to turn upon her our cannon. Should we not first try to appease these discontents, by legislating on the subjects of her grievance, in a spirit of justice, attempted by a spirit of mutual concession and conciliation? Is it not wanton, when we have at hand a remedy so easy and peaceful, to have recourse to the "ultima ratio," the law of force?

Nature has established diversity of climates, interests, and habits, in the extensive territories embraced by this Union. We cannot assimilate these differences by legislation. We cannot conquer nature. Other differences have been introduced by human laws and adventitious circumstances, very difficult, if not impossible, to be adjusted by one General Legislature. Hence the necessity of local Governments with their appropriate powers, and a General Government with its appropriate powers. Therefore, the respective States, in making up the present system of Federal Government, reserved to themselves all the powers which were local in their nature, and which, if exercised by any other than themselves, were likely to lead to the most prejudicial consequences.

It seemed to him, that the proclamation and message assert, in substance, that, by the declaration of independence, these United States were one single consolidated nation; that the constitution was made by the United States as one single nation; adopted by the people of the United States as one people; or, in other words, that it was adopted by a consolidated mass of the whole people, in contradistinction to the views of many of our most distinguished statesmen, that it was adopted by the people of the States, respectively. It is important, to sustain the first and fifth sections of this bill, that the grounds taken in the proclamation and message should be adopted; that is to say, that the constitution be made to spring from the whole as a mass, and not from the people in States, acting as separate and distinct Governments. It is in the former view only that the people of South Carolina, acting in obedience to State authorities, can be treated as rioters and lawless banditti. If the other view of the constitution be correct, then we cannot treat the people of South Carolina as rioters and lawless banditti, but regard them as a State, and war with them as a State.

My creed is, that, by the declaration of independence, the States were declared to be free and independent States, thirteen in number, not one nation; that the old articles of confederation united them as distinct States, not as one people; that the treaty of peace of 1783, acknowledged their independence as States, not as a single nation; that the federal constitution was framed by States, submitted to the States, and adopted by the States, as distinct nations or States, not as a single nation or people.

By canvassing these conflicting opinions, we shall the better understand how far South Carolina has transcended her reserved powers as a sovereign State; how far we can lawfully make war upon her; and whether we, or South Carolina, are likely to transcend the barriers provided in the constitution of the United States.

To view these questions correctly, let us look to the condition of the colonies before they threw off the yoke of the mother country. As colonies, they were separate and distinct communities; each had its separate Legislature (by some termed General Court,) its Executive, and Judiciary. They were settled under distinct charters granted by the crown. They were planted at different periods, and were emphatically distinct Governments. In that condition they were when the arbitrary measures of the British Government roused them to resistance. In this they had a common interest; a common feeling; common burdens to complain of; and held, in common, a spirit of freedom, which determined them to unite in defence of their violated rights. When resistance was the question, they deliberated, separately at first: a common cause induced them to interchange communications, and a general Congress of the colonies was proposed and adopted. In the general Congress the votes were taken by colonies. The very declaration of independence was voted by colonies. Some of the States had declared themselves independent before the declaration promulgated by Congress. North Carolina was the first; and I have seen an exemplification of the original document, in which that State had declared herself free, sovereign, and independent, long prior to the declaration by Congress. The State of Virginia, too, preceded Congress in her declaration of independence.

But it was in vain to go into details; for, before the 4th of July, 1776, each of the States, by its acts of resistance to tyranny and oppression, had thrown off its allegiance to the crown of Great Britain, assumed to itself a sovereignty, and claimed the right to consult with co-States, and to form a league for common defence; and, in virtue of such right, did send delegates to the General Congress; did there assume the right to take their stand among the nations of the world. The first meeting of delegates was held in September, 1774, and from that time until July, 1776, continued to consult without any plan or league to bind them.—[Here Mr. B. read from 1 vol. Laws U. S. chap. 1. and p. 1.] Finally, in July, 1776, the declaration of independence was agreed on; and it is called the unanimous declaration of the thirteen United States of America. But this is not all. The instrument, after giving a history of their grievances, and speaking of the failure of Great Britain to hear their complaints and redress them, concludes with this emphatic language: "We, therefore, the Representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name and by the authority of the good people of these colonies, solemnly publish and declare that these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States." Not an independent nation, but, in the language of the declaration, free and independent States. And the instrument goes further. It declares that they (the States) are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connexion between them and the State of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved; and that, as free and independent States, they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and do all other acts and things which independent States may of right do. And, for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor." The very declaration proclaiming to the world that thirteen stars had risen in the firmament of nations—not a single nation, but thirteen—ought to have arrested the statement advanced in the proclamation.

On the 11th June, 1776, it had been resolved that a committee be appointed to prepare and digest a form of confederation, to be entered into between the colonies. Upon the 12th July, 1776, (Secret Journal, p. 290,) that committee reported a draught of articles, which were from time to time debated, until the 15th of November, 1777.—(1 vol. Secret Journal, p. 349.)

Now, bearing in mind the dates of these respective transactions, which will be found in the first volume of the Laws United States, p. 1 to 20, it will be seen that at the time these colonies were acting as distinct sovereignties, and made their declaration of independence, these articles were then in seri, and were not even reported by the committee. But after the declaration they were reported, agreed on, and sent to the several States for ratification. The ratifications were adopted by the respective States, at different times, and signed by their delegates at various periods between the 21st July, 1778, and the 1st of March, 1781. [Here Mr. Bibb read from 1 vol. Laws United States, p. 12 and p. 20, the dates of the signatures by the respective States.]

These facts show, conclusively, that so far from the States forming themselves into a single nation by the declaration of independence, they never came finally into a confederacy until the delegates from Maryland subscribed the articles in 1781. The preamble itself, said Mr. B., is a refutation of any idea that the United States is one single nation. It is as follows:

"Whereas the delegates of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, did, on the fifteenth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven, and in the second year of the independence of America, agree to certain articles of confederation and perpetual union between the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, in the words following, viz:

"Articles of confederation and perpetual union between the States of," &c. (naming them.)

The first article declares that the style of this confederacy shall be "The United States of America."

The second article declares "that each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled." So far, then, from being made one nation by the confederation, and acquiring the rights of nationality as such, the independence of the several States preceded both it and the declaration.

Again: the third article declares that "the said States hereby severally enter into a firm league of friendship with each other for their common defence, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare; binding themselves to assist each other against all force offered to, or attacks made upon them, or any of them, on account of religion, sovereignty, trade, or any other pretence whatever."

And again: the articles of confederation, after giving various powers to the Government, in the thirteenth article, declare that—

"Every State shall abide by the determination of the United States in Congress assembled, on all questions which by this confederation are submitted to them. And the articles of this confederation shall be inviolably observed by every State, and the Union shall be perpetual: nor shall any alteration, at any time hereafter, be made in any of them, unless such alteration be agreed to in a Congress of the United States, and be afterwards confirmed by the Legislature of every State."

But the proof does not stop here. By the provisional articles of peace of the 30th November, 1782, and by the definitive treaty of the 3d of September, 1783, made between the United States and Great Britain, mutually signed and accepted, the first article in each contains the stipulation that "His Britannic Majesty acknowledges the said United States, viz: New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, to be free, sovereign, and independent States; that he treats with them as such."

The fifth article of the definitive treaty stipulates "that the Congress shall earnestly recommend it to the Legislatures of the respective States to provide for the restitution of all estates, rights, and properties, which have been confiscated," &c.

The sovereignty of the States, and their power to restore, or not, the confiscated estates, are distinctly acknowledged by both parties to the definitive treaty of peace.

I shall not stop to battle the watch about unqualified and qualified sovereignty. A monarchy may be limited or unlimited. A republican Government may confer limited powers to the agents of the people, or unlimited powers. A qualified or unqualified sovereignty may exist in monarchies and in republics. In our Governments the sovereignty is in the people of each State. The State Governments do not confer unlimited powers over the domestic affairs of the State. But yet the people of a State, united under a State Government, constitute a sovereignty. A portion of sovereign power is expressly withheld by the State constitutions.

But sovereigns may be united with sovereigns, and may divide delegated powers between the local sovereignties and the united sovereigns. The United States are united sovereignties. The people have delegated a portion of their powers as State sovereignties to their particular State Government, and another portion to the Government of the united sovereignties. Neither Government is an unqualified sovereignty. The State and Federal Governments are limited qualified sovereignties; all bound to keep within their respective spheres; each a usurper and a disturber of order when transcending the limits prescribed.

Such is the history of the old confederation which brought us so gloriously through the war of the revolution. The idea that it was a single consolidated nation, is repelled by the archives of the States, by the journals of Congress, and by the definitive treaty of peace.

I will next proceed to examine whether this idea of a single nation, this Government made by the people in mass, as contradistinguished from the people of the respective States, is sustained by the history and context of the existing constitution.

On the 21st of February, 1787, Congress, reciting in a preamble "that there is a provision in the articles of confederation and perpetual union for making alterations therein," by assent of Congress and of the Legislatures of the several States, passed a resolution, which will be found in the first volume of the laws of the United States, p. 59, in these words:—Resolved, That in the opinion of Congress, it is expedient that, on the second Monday in May next, a convention of delegates, who shall have been appointed by the several States, be held at Philadelphia, for the sole and express purpose of revising the articles of confederation, and reporting to Congress and the several Legislatures such alterations and provisions therein as shall, when agreed to in Congress, and confirmed by the States, render the federal constitution adequate to the exigencies of the Government, and the preservation of the Union."

In pursuance of this resolution, delegates, appointed by the several States, met in convention. On the 17th of September, 1787, Congress received the report of the convention lately held in Philadelphia, in the following words: [Here the constitution was set forth, verbatim.—1st vol. Laws U. S. p. 59, 60.]

To this constitution were appended two resolves of the

SENATE.]

Revenue Collection Bill.

convention, (same vol. p. 70.) The first is, that the reported constitution be laid before Congress; "that it should afterwards be submitted to a convention of delegates chosen in each State, by the people thereof, under the recommendation of its Legislature, for their assent and ratification," &c.

The second resolution recommends, that, as soon as nine States had ratified, the Congress "should fix a day on which the electors should be appointed by the States which shall have ratified the same," a day for assembling the electors to vote for President and Vice President, and the time and place for commencing proceedings under this constitution, &c.

To the reports of the constitution was also appended an address agreed upon, by the unanimous order of the convention, to the President of Congress. In this letter these sentiments are conveyed: the desire long felt, "that the power of making war, peace, and treaties, that of levying money and regulating commerce, and the correspondent executive and judicial authorities, should be fully and effectually vested in the General Government of the Union."

"It is obviously impracticable in the Federal Government of these States to secure all the rights of independent sovereignty to each, and yet provide for the interest and safety of all." The difficulty which had arisen in fixing the rights to be surrendered, and those to be reserved, because of the difference among the several States as to their situation, extent, habits, and particular interests; the great importance which they had kept in view, "the consolidation of our Union, in which is involved our prosperity, felicity, safety, perhaps our national existence."

That "the constitution we now present is the result of a spirit of amity, and of that mutual deference and concession which the peculiarity of our political situation rendered indispensable."

That each State should consider "that had her interest been alone consulted, the consequences might have been particularly disagreeable or injurious to others."

Upon this report, the Congress, on the 28th September, 1787, came to the following resolve: (p. 60.)

"Resolved, unanimously, That the said report, with the resolutions and letter accompanying the same, be transmitted to the several Legislatures, in order to be submitted to a convention of delegates, chosen in each State, by the people thereof, in conformity to the resolves of the convention made and provided in that case."

The constitution, so transmitted to the Legislatures, was by them respectively submitted to State conventions, elected in each State, and assembled under the law of each several State.

On the 13th September, 1788, nine States unanimously in Congress adopted a preamble and resolution, reciting the resolve of February 21st, 1787, for revising the articles of confederation; the report of the convention of the 17th September, 1787; the resolve of Congress of the 28th of September, 1787, for transmitting the report, resolutions, and letter to the several Legislatures; and that the said constitution had been ratified by a sufficient number, which ratifications had been received by Congress. Therefore they appointed the first Wednesday in January, 1789, for choosing the electors in the several States which before that should have ratified; the first Wednesday in February, 1789, for the electors to assemble to vote for President and Vice President; and the first Wednesday in March, 1789, for commencing proceedings under said constitution at New York. (See preamble and resolution of 13th September, 1788. Laws U. S. vol. i. p. 60.)

The ratifications were at the following times:

1. Delaware, December 12, 1787.
2. Pennsylvania, December 12, 1787.

3. New Jersey, December 18, 1787.
4. Connecticut, January 9, 1788.
5. Massachusetts, February 6, 1788.
6. Georgia, January 2, 1788.
7. Maryland, April 2, 1788.
8. South Carolina, May 23, 1788.
9. New Hampshire, June 21, 1788.
10. Virginia, June 26, 1788.
11. New York, July 26, 1788.

It would appear that, Congress having appointed the first Wednesday in January, 1789, for choosing electors, and the first Wednesday in March, 1789, for proceedings under the constitution, it went into operation without North Carolina and Rhode Island. North Carolina did not ratify the new constitution until the 21st November, 1789; Rhode Island not until the 29th May, 1790. Of the two Carolinas, the North State was the first to throw off the colonial subjection to the British crown, and to encounter boldly the consequences of those awful words, rebel and traitor, with which kings never fail to denounce those who defy their power and struggle for liberty. She was quick to risk all in war against a foreign power, for liberty and independence, but slow to come into the compact, until she believed the principles of civil and political liberty were sufficiently guarded from controversy at home.

It cannot be denied that the constitution was made and adopted by the States, severally and distinctly; for, until it was ratified by a State for herself, and by her own consent, it had no obligation on her. The ratification of eleven States could not impose it upon North Carolina and Rhode Island; and the vote of twelve States, which included more than twelve-thirteenths of the population of the United States, could not impose it upon the small State of Rhode Island, until accepted by her. There was not one single State that did not ratify in the name of the State, in the name of the people who were bound together in the State Government. Mr. B. referred to the ratification by the State of Pennsylvania, and quoted from it the following words: "Be it known unto all men, that we, the delegates of the people of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania in general convention assembled, have assented to and ratified, and do, in the name and by the authority of the same people, and for ourselves, assent to and ratify the foregoing constitution," &c. Further, in the ratification by the State of New Jersey, is to be found the following language: "In convention of the State of New Jersey," (then the act of the Legislature of New Jersey, authorizing the convention, is recited.) "Now be it known, that we, the delegates of the State of New Jersey, chosen by the people thereof for the purpose aforesaid, having maturely deliberated on and considered the aforesaid constitution, do hereby, for and on behalf of the people of the said State of New Jersey, ratify and confirm the same, and every part thereof."

These two ratifications are fair specimens of the residue, and seem to show the sense and understanding of those who did the acts; that they did it for the State, for the people of the State, acting in pursuance of an act of the Legislature, as binding that State, but not as operating beyond the limits and jurisdiction of the State.

Thus I have given an authentic history of the rise, progress, and ratification of the constitution of the United States. It grew out of the league of friendship and perpetual union contained in the articles of confederation.

It was proposed by virtue of a provision for amendment contained in these articles.

The resolution of Congress, proposing to the States the convention, recited the provision in the articles of confederation as the cause.

The convention was appointed by States, and voted by States.

JAN. 30, 1833.]

Revenue Collection Bill.

[SENATE.]

The report of the convention was approved by the Congress, voting by States.

It was transmitted to the Legislatures of the several States.

The several Legislatures authorized the elections of the conventions, and defined the object, and their powers.

It was ratified by States; and, being so ratified, it became obligatory, according to the seventh article, which is in these words:

"The ratifications of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this constitution, between the States so ratifying the same."

Aye, sir, "between the States;" not over the people, but between the States so ratifying. How ratifying? By conventions of the people in each State. If these conventions were not the representatives and delegates of States, why did the constitution provide that, upon the ratification of nine States, it should be established "between the States so ratifying the same?" To say that these conventions were not the representatives of States; to say that the constitution was ratified by and over a mass of people, independent of the authorities and jurisdictions which distinguish and divide them into States, contradicts the language of the constitution, and the fact.

The expression, "we, the people of the United States," in the preamble of the constitution, ought not to be detached from the seventh article, requiring the ratification of nine States, and from all other parts of the instrument, for the purpose of giving a meaning false in fact, and contradictory to its history. They are explained by the resolution for transmitting it to the State Legislatures; by the fact that each State deliberated and ratified for itself; and by the seventh article, which declared it obligatory "between the States so ratifying;" by the known truth that no State was bound, unless by its own assent. The ratification of twelve States did not make it obligatory on the State or people of Rhode Island. "We, the people of the United States." What is the meaning here of the word "united?" Does it mean a united people, consolidated into one mass, without reference to the respective sovereignties into which they had been divided under separate State Governments? No, sir; it is States united; not united people without their States. People may exist without States, but States cannot exist without people. "United States," by the force of expression, means a plurality of States, a plurality of sovereignties or Governments united. The resolution of Congress, of February 21, 1787, recommending the convention under which the delegates were appointed and acted, declared the objects to be "for the sole and express purpose of revising the articles of confederation," and reporting "such alterations and provisions therein, as shall, when agreed to in Congress and confirmed by the States, render the federal constitution adequate to the exigencies of Government, and the preservation of the Union." What Union? That which had been formed, and then existing—the union of States—signified on their ensign armorial by the thirteen stripes and thirteen stars, forming a new constellation; and yet signified on our escutcheon by the stars, the bundle of arrows in the talon of the eagle, and the motto "E pluribus unum"—out of many Governments, one.

The respective State conventions, (called to deliberate on the proposed alterations in the old "federal constitution," by the new constitution,) represented the respective State Governments. The assent of the State Legislature was a prerequisite to the assemblage of such a convention. The Legislature prescribed the time and manner of the election, and limited the purpose and power of the convention. The convention, so elected and assembled, did not dissolve the State Government; they had no power to dissolve or revise the State constitution; their delegations of power from the people were confined, by the law for the election, to deliberations and action on the proposed constitution. Each convention acted as the agents and delegates of a people knit together by the particular State Government under whose authority it was elected and assembled, not as the agents of people who had no Government, or who intended to dissolve their existing State Government.

That the State Governments are the first-born, the elder; that they were endowed with the rights of "free and independent States;" in possession of the powers, privileges, attributes, and prerogatives of sovereign States; that the Federal Government is the younger; that it sprang from the States; that it owes its being and powers to the concessions of the State Governments; that its powers are delegated and limited; derivative, not inherent; that the powers not delegated to it are reserved to the States—are solemn truths, attested by the memory of witnesses; by the journals; by public records; by authentic testimonials deposited in our archives, and in those of foreign nations; by the constitution itself. Neither the breath of sophists, nor the denials of politicians, nor the dictums of courts, nor the proclamation of a President, can obliterate the past, denolish the facts, nor hide these truths from the common sense of mankind.

The federal constitution was not only created by the States, but is a compact between the States. The seventh article is a testimony to this. The ratification of nine States shall make it "obligatory between the States so ratifying." The instrument abounds with compacts between the States. The ratifications of the States of New Hampshire and Massachusetts treat the instrument according to truth, as a compact between the States. [Mr. B. read the ratification of the State of Massachusetts, as follows:]

"In convention of the delegates of the people of Massachusetts, February 6th, 1778." "The convention having impartially discussed and fully considered the constitution for the United States of America, reported to Congress by the convention of delegates from the United States of America, and submitted to us by a resolution of the general court of the said commonwealth, passed the 25th day of October last past, and acknowledging, with grateful hearts, the goodness of the Supreme Ruler of the universe in affording the people of the United States, in the course of his providence, an opportunity, deliberately and peaceably, without fraud or surprise, of entering into an explicit and solemn compact with each other, by assenting to and ratifying a new constitution, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity, do, in the name and behalf of the people of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, assent to and ratify the said constitution for the United States of America."

Mark the expressions, "in affording the people of the United States" "an opportunity" "of entering into an explicit and solemn compact with each other," "do, in the name and behalf of the people of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, assent to and ratify," &c. The people of the "commonwealth of Massachusetts" ratify "a compact." With whom? Between the said people of the "commonwealth of Massachusetts," and the people of the other United States. The assent of the majority of delegates of the people of the commonwealth of Massachusetts bound the whole commonwealth to the compact with the people of the other commonwealths, who, by the assent of the majority in each commonwealth, bound the dissenting minorities. But the dissenting minority in each commonwealth could not be bound to a compact, but by force of the power of the majority of a commonwealth to bind the minority, according to the provisions of the State constitution. Dissenting minorities could not contract with dissenting minorities, but by force of the State Government, which made the will of the majority bind the minority.

The ratification of New Hampshire, like that of Massachusetts, contains a grateful acknowledgment for the opportunity afforded to the people of the United States of entering into a solemn compact with each other.

A majority of the whole people throughout the Union did not, and could not, make the constitution obligatory. The assent of each particular State was necessary to bind the people of the State. The assent of twelve States did not bind the people of New Hampshire: they were not bound by the constitution until the State itself assented.

Mr B. continued his argument by asking the members of the Senate how that body itself was constituted? By the action, the separate action, of the State Legislatures, and not by the citizens of the United States, in primary assembly, or as a body. It was, as one of the co-ordinate branches of the Government, dependent for its very existence upon the States separately. If a majority of the States should refuse to elect Senators, such a refusal or omission would involve a dissolution of the Union. In the event of such a refusal, there could be no alternative, for there was no compulsory power in relation to the elections. There was no power in the constitution to change or compel the elections. The States, great or small, as they might be, however wide or limited in extent, were there all represented on terms of the most perfect equality. This was a plain, evident, and absolute principle, which could not, by any sophistry, be evaded. Recollect that direct taxes, and the apportionment of representatives among the several States, according to their respective populations, in federal numbers, is another fixed principle of the compact; that is to say, according to the number in each, "determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons." Are the representatives elected as by or for a single nation? No: according to States and State population. On this subject a great struggle took place at the last session in the debate on the bill to fix the ratio of representation under the fifth census. No Senator, who had attended the discussion of this interesting subject, could fail to recollect the numerous arguments advanced, and ingenious propositions for transferring and disposing the fractions produced in each State, when the number proposed for the ratio of representation was applied to the federal number in each State.

That the constitution is not based upon the idea of a single nation, may be illustrated by other parts. "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union," (art. 4, sec. 3.) Not new people, but new States. The new people must be united under a republican form of government, and compose a State, before admission into the Union. "The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government;" (art. 4, sect. 4.) In this section of the constitution the truth is declared, that "this Union" is of States; and the States, united, are to "guaranty to every State a republican form of government." Every State is a party to this compact for guaranty. The word "guaranty" means, according to use and definition, to undertake to secure the performance of a treaty or stipulation. The constitution is founded on and composed of compacts and stipulations between the States as parties. What is this fourth section of the fourth article, but a compact entered into by all the States, with each and every one, respectively?

Away, then, with this idea of a single nation—a unit. The Government of this Union is based upon a union of States, as parties to a compact. Its fulfilment depends upon the observance of good faith among the States who are parties to the compact, as in all compacts between sovereign parties. Nothing but good faith can preserve the Government. Its life's blood and vitality can be circulated only by the instrumentality of the State Legislatures. The powers delegated to the Federal Government extend to making laws to operate on individuals throughout the United States. But the States have not delegated the power to coerce the State sovereignties, to compel the State Governments. The States are yet free and sovereign States. I mean no cavil about qualified or unqualified sovereignties. What I have before said on that subject will, I hope, prevent misconstruction.

[Here Mr. B. gave way for adjournment.]

THURSDAY, JANUARY 31.

MERCHANTS' BONDS.

Mr. KING then moved to postpone the previous orders, and to take up the bill to explain and amend the 18th section of the bill of July, 1832, to amend the various laws imposing duties on imports.

It was stated by him that this bill must pass before the 15th February, if at all, to be of any avail; and this was urged as a reason for the motion.

Mr. POINDEXTER objected to giving this bill a preference over other bills preceding it in the orders of the day.

Mr. SILSBEE urged the necessity of an immediate action on the bill, for the purpose of preventing great inconvenience to the merchants. He did not anticipate any objections to the principles of the bill.

The motion to postpone having been agreed to, and the bill being taken up,

An amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce, requiring the collectors to give the merchants credit on their bonds for the difference between the high and low duties, and to cancel the bonds on payment of the balance, (in lieu of issuing debenture certificates for the amount of excess of duty,) was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, nem. con.

THE REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill further to provide for the collection of the duties on imports.

Mr. BIBB resumed the argument which he yesterday began upon the bill. He felt very sensibly, he said, the weight which devolved upon him in sustaining his views of this subject against an authority so highly respectable, and so deeply seated in the affections of the people, as the author of the proclamation, to the doctrines of which it had become his duty to advert: But whilst he stood on the principles of the constitution; whilst he had on his side the opinions of patriots, of lovers of liberty; opinions which were delivered by some of the most eminent of the men who framed the constitution, which opinions were promulgated throughout the United States for the purpose of inducing the adoption of the constitution, he felt himself clad in armor impenetrable to adverse argument, the high authority of the proclamation notwithstanding.

He had left off yesterday, he said, at that point of his argument in which he had maintained that the federal constitution is a compact between the States. He now said, in addition, that he considered every Government instituted by consent, and reduced to the form of a written constitution, to be a compact; and that they who hold the power to alter and amend, and have a sovereign power over the Government, are parties to that compact. The 5th article of the federal constitution, he said, placed the power of amending the constitution in the Legislatures of the respective States, or in their respective conventions. They create, and they can destroy. The constitution, he said, abounds with compacts. Article 1, section 9, contains compacts by all the States jointly, with each severally. Article 1, section 10, contains compacts by the several States not to exercise, and to qualify the exercise of certain powers which might be injurious. The 4th article contains compacts by the several States with each other, and by the whole with each. The proviso in the 5th article is a joint compact by all, and with each other, severally. The various stipulations in the constitution, and especially the equality of representation in the Senate, and the majority required to add new powers or to amend, exhibit sedulous care to preserve to their respective local Governments their local interests.

Revenue Collection Bill.

In prosecution of this jealous care for the preservation of the powers and rights of sovereignty not surrendered by the States, a number of States, at the time of their adopting the constitution, expressed a desire, in order to prevent misconstruction, that further declaratory and restrictive clauses should be added. Accordingly, the first Congress held under the new constitution proposed amendments, ten of which were adopted by the States. The tenth of which is as follows: "The powers not delegated to the United States by this constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

"To the States respectively or to the people" is here introduced, out of abundant caution, to prevent the possibility of a construction that the rights not delegated by the people to the State Governments, but reserved, had been, by the federal constitution, taken away from the people, and transferred to the State Governments.

It is clear that the Federal Government was made by the States; that it is a compact between States; that the States are constituent and essential parties to the existence of the Federal Government; that the States surrendered only a portion of their powers and authorities; that all powers not delegated nor prohibited are retained; that they have retained the ultimate sovereignty over the Federal Government; that special care has been taken in the compact to protect against the addition of new powers, unless three-fourths of the States shall concur.

This brings us to the question, how the several States are to be protected against an irregular, unconstitutional action of the Federal Government, in evading a proposition for a grant of new powers by amendment, and substituting therefor a palpable usurpation of powers not delegated.

The abuse of delegated powers is one case. The palpable usurpation of powers not delegated, but reserved, is another case.

How are the several States to be protected against the usurpation of their respective reserved powers? How are minorities of the States to be protected against a breach of the constitutional compact, requiring the concurrence of three-fourths to sanction a further abridgement of their reserved powers? For it is clear that, by the compact, a minority of seven States are intended to be protected against the concurrence of seventeen States, in any regular proposition to delegate to the Federal Government any portion of their reserved powers. Does that security consist solely in the good faith and unambitious temper of the Federal Government? Does the security of the minority of the States against the usurpation of their reserved powers by the delegates of a majority of States not sufficient to carry a constitutional amendment, or against the usurpation of their reserved powers by any one of the departments, rest solely upon the machinery and regulating checks of the Federal Government itself?

It is conceded by me, that, generally, the security against abuses of the delegated powers lies in the nature and organization of the Government itself; the distribution of its powers into several departments; the tenure of office; the mode and frequency of elections, &c. When acting within the pale of delegated powers, the majority must be obeyed for the time. Abuses or maladministration of delegated powers must be corrected through the instrumentality of elections. The security in such cases rests upon the regulating checks contained within the Government itself, the responsibility of the rulers to those who elected them. To abuse and maladminister delegated powers, and to usurp powers not delegated, but reserved, are subjects entirely different.

The question is, whether or no, "in cases of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of powers not granted by the said compact, the States who are parties thereto have the right to interpose, for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining within their respective limits the authorities, rights, and liberties appertaining to them."

The question is not whether the State Governments shall direct and control the Federal Government in the exercise of its delegated powers, but whether they shall interpose for arresting the exercise of powers not delegated, but usurped. The question is not whether the Federal Government is the servant of twenty-four masters of different wills, yet bound to obey all, in the exercise of its granted powers, but whether the Federal Government shall be the sole and exclusive judge of the limits of its own powers; an autocrat, the sole director of his own will, and the unbridled usurper of the rights and liberties appertaining to the States.

That there are powers, authorities, and liberties, appertaining to the States, which belonged to them as States, and which they have not surrendered, but reserved, is undeniable. The general principle is clear, that in all compacts, leagues, conventions, and treaties between sovereign States, powers, and potentates, each party has the right to judge whether a breach has been committed by the other party; and in case of a wilful, deliberate breach, to take such measures for redress as prudence and the discretion of the injured party shall dictate.

Is the compact between these States an exception to this general rule? If it is, then the States must, by some action of theirs, have surrendered this portion of their sovereignty. What part of the constitution declares such a surrender? There is no such express declaration of surrender. In the various enumerations of powers prohibited to the States, and agreed not to be exercised by them, there is no declaration that they shall not exercise the right, appertaining to them as parties to the compact, to judge of an excessive, alarming, and dangerous stretch of power by the Federal Government. The abridgment of the powers of the States in this particular, not being expressed, cannot be made out by implication or by construction. The powers not delegated by the States to the United States, nor prohibited to the States by the constitution, are reserved to the States. So says the constitution. What clause in the constitution delegates to the Federal Government the sole power of deciding the extent of the grant of powers to itself, as well as the extent of the powers reserved to the States?

It is said that this power is vested by the constitution in the Supreme Court of the United States. The provisions are,

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority."

This constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

These are the two provisions of the constitution which

SENATE.]

Revenue Collection Bill.

are referred to as delegating the power to the Supreme Court, to be the sole judge of the extent of the powers granted and of the powers reserved, and as denying to the States the sovereign power of protecting themselves against the usurpation of their reserved powers, authorities, and privileges. If the delegation to the Supreme Court, and prohibition to the States, are not contained in these two clauses, then they are not to be found in the federal constitution.

The latter clause cannot touch the question in debate, for that only declares the supremacy of the constitution, and the treaties "and laws made in pursuance thereof." Powers exercised contrary to the constitution, acts done contrary to the constitution, by the exercise of authorities not under but in violation of the constitution, and by usurpation of State rights, State authorities, and State privileges, are the subjects under consideration.

Let us examine the former clause: "The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this constitution." The case must be of "judicial power;" it must be a case, "in law or equity," arising under the constitution. The expression is not "to all cases arising under the constitution, treaties, and laws of the United States;" but it is "to all cases in law and equity."

"Use is the law and rule of speech." By this law and this rule we must examine the language of the constitution.

A judicial power is one subject; a political power is another and a different subject. A case in law, or a case in equity, is one subject; a political case is another and a different subject.

Judicial cases in law and equity, arising under the regular exercise of constitutional powers, by laws and treaties made by authority, are different from political questions of usurpation, surmounting the constitution, and involving the high prerogatives, authorities, and privileges of the sovereign parties who made the constitution.

In judicial cases arising under a treaty, the court may construe the treaty, and administer the rights rising under it to the parties who submit themselves to the jurisdiction of the court in that case. But the court must confine itself within the pale of judicial authority. It cannot rightfully exercise the political power of the Government in declaring the treaty null, because the one or the other party to the treaty has broken this or that article; and, therefore, that the whole treaty is abrogated. To judge of the breach of the articles of the treaty by the sovereign contracting parties, and in case of breach to dissolve that treaty, and to declare it no longer obligatory, is a political power belonging not to the judiciary. It belongs to other departments of the Government, who will judge of the extent of the injury resulting from the violation, and whether the reparation shall be sought by amicable negotiation, or whether the treaty shall be declared no longer obligatory on the Government and the people of the injured party. Yet, by the law of nations, the wilful and deliberate breach of one article of a treaty is a breach of all the articles, each being the consideration of the others; and the injured party has the right so to treat it.

By the act approved on the 7th of July, 1798, the Congress of the United States declared themselves of right freed and exonerated from the stipulations of the treaties and of the consular convention theretofore concluded between the United States and France, and that they should not thenceforth be regarded as legally obligatory on the Government or citizens of the United States, because of the repeated violations on the part of the French Government, &c.

Before this declaration, the Supreme Court of the United States was bound, in cases of judicial cognizance coming before them, to take the treaties as obligatory, and to administer the rights growing out of the treaties between France and the United States. After that declaration, the court was bound to consider the treaties as abrogated. The courts had no power, before the act of July, 1798, to inquire into violations, and therefore to declare the treaties not obligatory. After that act, they had no power to demand evidence of the violations recited, and revise the political decision of the Government.

To declare these treaties no longer obligatory was a political power, not a judicial power. Yet the violations of these treaties, committed under the authority of the French Government, and the consequent injuries to the citizens and Government of the United States, and the rights of the United States consequent therefrom, before the act of July, 1798, were "cases arising under the constitution" and treaties of the United States. But the judicial power did not extend to those cases of violation, so as to declare the treaties no longer obligatory. The question whether those violations should or should not abrogate the treaties, did not make a case in law or equity for the decision of a judicial tribunal. Yet they were cases arising under the constitution. The power to decide them belonged to the Government of the United States as a political sovereign; but the judicial power did not extend to them; those cases belonged to the political powers, not to the judicial powers of the Government.

The British courts of admiralty executed upon the commerce of the United States the British orders in council, disclaiming the power to decide whether those orders in council were conformable to the general law of nations, which every nation is bound to respect and observe. In like manner, the French courts of admiralty executed upon the commerce of the United States the Berlin and Milan decrees.

The British and French courts had not cognizance to judge the sovereign powers of the nations, and to declare those orders and decrees contrary to the law of nations; that was not a judicial power. So the courts of the United States, even the Supreme Court, had not the power to declare the treaties between the United States and France, and Great Britain, no longer obligatory upon the citizens and Government of the United States, because of the multiplied wrongs and injuries committed upon the citizens of the United States under color of those orders in council and decrees, infracting the law of nations and treaties, and hostile to the rights of the Government of the United States. Those cases, in their effects upon the treaties and amicable relations between the United States and those Governments, did not fall within the judicial power of the courts of the United States. Those questions did not fall within the description of "cases in law and equity," as used in the constitution of the United States, in conferring, vesting, and defining the powers of the judicial department. Those political powers belong to other departments of the Government. According to the law and rule of speech established by use, such powers are classed under the denomination of political powers, prerogative powers, not under the head of judicial powers.

Before I proceed to illustrate by other examples the distinctions which I have taken between political powers and judicial powers, between political questions or cases and judicial questions or cases, I will refer to the declaration of one whose opinions on constitutional questions I know will command respect; a man to whose opinions I willingly yield my respect, without, however, submitting with that implicit faith which belongs to fools. On the resolutions of Mr. Livingston, touching the conduct of President Adams, in causing Thomas Nash, alias Jonathan Robbins, to be arrested and delivered over to a British naval officer, without any accusation, or trial, or investigation in a court of justice, Mr. Marshall, then a representative of Virginia, now chief justice of the United States, in defending the conduct of the President, thus delivered his opinion in that debate.—(Appendix 5, Wheaton, p. 17.)

“By extending the judicial power to all cases in law and equity, the constitution had never been understood to confer on that department any political power whatever. To come within this description, a question must assume a legal form for forensic litigation and judicial decision. There must be parties to come into court, who can be reached by its process, and bound by its power; whose rights admit of ultimate decision by a tribunal to which they are bound to submit. A case in law or equity may arise under a treaty, where rights of individuals acquired or secured by a treaty, are to be asserted or defended in courts.” “But the judicial power cannot extend to political compacts.” This distinction between a political power and a judicial power is recognised and acted upon by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Williams vs. Armroyd, 7 Cranch, 423, 433.

Again, in the case of Marbury vs. Madison, (1 Cranch, 137; 1st Peters's Condensed Reports, 279,) this distinction between the political powers of Government and the judicial power is most explicitly avowed and recognised by the Supreme Court. The supremacy of that court is a judicial supremacy only. It is supreme in reference to the other courts, in questions of a judicial character, brought within the sphere of judicial cognizance by controversies which shall have assumed a legal form for forensic litigation and judicial decision. There must be parties amenable to its process, bound by its power, whose rights admit of ultimate decision by a tribunal to which they are bound to submit. “Questions in their nature political, or which are by the constitution and laws submitted to the Executive, can never be made in this court.”

The decision of the Executive, upon political questions submitted to its discretion, is as supreme as the decision of the court within its jurisdiction. Neither department ought to invade the jurisdiction of the other; so said the Supreme Court of the United States, in Marbury vs. Madison. A judicial decision binds the parties litigant in that particular case, not others who are neither parties nor privies, whose rights and privileges are separate and distinct. Not even the court itself is bound to give the like decision between other parties, where a similar question may be involved. Prudence will dictate that a former decision be not lightly disregarded, but adhered to in a subsequent case, unless the judges see an error in the former decision. But honesty requires that an erroneous opinion be not carried into doctrine, and error perpetuated, merely because of the first error. Errors should be corrected, not perpetuated. To err is the lot of man; to correct an error is noble and praiseworthy. No decision binds in law or in morality, beyond the rights of the parties litigant, and those claiming under them as privies; and even there, not until the time for a new hearing or re-trial has expired. But as to all other persons, it binds not. It is contrary to the first principles of justice, that the rights, interests, and privileges of any person should be decided, negatived, and abrogated, before he is heard to make good his title and his claim, his rights and his justification. God in his infinite wisdom did not condemn Adam unheard. And this example of divine wisdom and justice is fit to be imitated by human tribunals.

When parties present themselves before the Supreme Court of the United States to litigate the judicial question involved in that controversy, the decision of the court binds the rights and interests therein represented and litigated; it binds no others.

The public rights, privileges, authorities, and prerogatives of the States, are not the property of individuals, and cannot be represented and brought up for decision by individuals.

In a case between two citizens, parties to an ejectment, claiming lands, the one party under a grant from the State of New York, the other under a grant from the State of Connecticut, in the gore which was claimed by both States, the court was competent to decide the private rights and interests of the parties. But that decision could have no controlling influence over the line of jurisdiction between the two States; because those States were not parties. So said the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases of Fowler vs. Miller, and Fowler vs. Lindsay, (3 Dallas, p. 411.) And one of the judges, in delivering his opinion, with whom all concurred, asked emphatically, “On what principle can private citizens, in the litigation of their private claims, be competent to fix the important rights of sovereignty?”

The twelfth amendment to the constitution takes away the jurisdiction which had been given to the Supreme Court to hold jurisdiction of a suit against one of the United States by a citizen of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign States; but leaves the jurisdiction conferred over controversies between two or more States. If two States, therefore, have a controversy, which, in its character, makes a case in law or equity proper for judicial cognizance, it may be brought before the Supreme Court. Controversies between two or more States, about territory or limits, may be litigated before the Supreme Court of the United States. But then each State must have an opportunity, as a party, to prosecute or defend her right before the decision can bind her. Those are questions of meum et tuum; rights of property which one State claims to the exclusion of the other; not political rights belonging to all the States respectively, where the rights and powers of one State does not exclude but establishes the rights of each and every other. Such rights claimed for all, as belonging equally to each and every of the States respectively, cannot make a controversy in law or equity between two States.

Political powers not delegated to the Federal Government, political powers reserved to the States, constitute the subjects of the propositions which are affirmed on the one side, and denied on the other. The propositions affirmed are, that the powers of the Federal Government result from the compact to which the States are parties; that these powers are limited by the plain sense and intention of the instrument constituting that compact, and no further valid than they are authorized by the grants enumerated in that compact; “and that, in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of other powers, not granted by the said compact, the States, who are parties thereto, have the right, and are in duty bound, to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining, within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties appertaining to them.”

If the Congress of the United States usurp and exercise a power not delegated, but reserved, it is evident that the controversy about this exercise of power must be between the Government of the United States and the States. How is this controversy to get into the courts, and finally to the Supreme Court, so as to bind the State as one party, and the Government of the United States as the other party? For on no principle can private citizens, in the litigation of their private claims, be competent to fix the important rights of sovereignty. A decision in a case to which a State is not a party cannot bind the State; it is res inter alios acta. So said this court, to whom these litigated questions of the limits of sovereign power are supposed to be referred, by those who deny the right of the States to interpose.—Fowler vs. Miller and Lindsay, 3 Dall. 412.

Mr. Callender was tried, convicted, and sentenced to fine and imprisonment in the State of Virginia by the federal court, under the sedition law. Now, it is clear that Mr. Callender was not in his individual person the representative of the State of Virginia, so as to bind that State by the decision, and fix her sovereign rights. Mr. Lyon was tried and sentenced in Vermont under the sedition law by the federal court; yet that decision did not bind the State of Vermont. Mr. Cooper was sentenced for sedition by the federal court in the State of Pennsylvania, yet that did not bind that State; neither did all these decisions bind the States, nor settle the point that the sedition act was valid and constitutional; nor would the decision of the Supreme Court have had that effect if such cases could by law have been carried to the Supreme Court.

To bind a State, and command obedience to the decision of the Supreme Court, in a question relating to a dangerous usurpation of powers not delegated, but retained by the States, it is necessary that a case should be brought before that court between the United States and a State, as parties litigant; because, according to the first principles of jurisprudence, none but the rights of parties are bound by the decision.

Where is the grant of power to the judicial department to hold a plea of controversy between the United States and a State, as parties in a controversy touching the political powers alleged to be reserved to the States, respectively, and not delegated to the Federal Government? Is there any thing in the constitution which gives color to the idea that a suit can be maintained in the Supreme Court, or in any of the inferior courts, between the United States as plaintiffs and a State as defendant, or between a State as plaintiff against the United States as defendant, to settle a controverted question of delegation and reservation of political powers? Would such a suit be a case in law or equity according to any usage of speech? Let us try to frame the complaint on the one side, and the defence on the other, and come to the judgment, upon the alien and sedition laws. What sentence is to be passed upon the State? I suppose that her resolutions were seditious and unconstitutional; that she should forever thereafter acknowledge that the alien and sedition laws were constitutional; that she repeal her false and seditious resolutions. Ridiculous!

Let the Attorney General of the United States try to frame a bill in equity, or an indictment for the United States against a State or States; or the Attorney General of a State to frame a declaration at law, or bill in equity, or indictment, for a State against the United States, to try the controverted questions of political powers delegated and retained by the States; draw out the plaint, and it will appear at first blush to be an anomaly, not known in the vocabulary of "cases of law and equity," not to be classed under the judicial power over cases in law and equity, according to any law or rule of speech. There is no grant of power to the Supreme Court to hold jurisdiction of any such plaint or bill. Such a plaint in law or in equity would be a novelty in the history of judicial powers. The portentous consequences of such a jurisdiction in the court would strike with terror and amazement as soon as such a process should be instituted.

The alien act of June, 1798, was enacted when the United States were at peace with all the world. By this it was declared that it shall be lawful for the President of the United States "to order all such aliens as he shall judge dangerous to the peace and safety of the United States, or shall have reasonable grounds to suspect are concerned in any treasonable or secret machinations against the Government thereof, to depart out of the territory of the United States within such time as shall be expressed in such order." Any alien, so ordered to depart, found at large within the United States, after the time limited in such order, and not having obtained a license from the President to remain, was subject to be imprisoned, on conviction of such disobedience, and never admitted to become a citizen of the United States. To obtain a license, such alien was to prove his innocence, and to give bond and security for his good behavior, and for not violating his license; which the President, however, might revoke at his pleasure. All aliens ordered to depart, who did not obtain license to remain, were liable to be arrested and sent out of the United States, at the discretion of the President.

This act was not levelled against the citizens of any power, State, or potentate, at war with the United States, for there was then no declaration of war by the United States against any foreign power. There was another act passed in July, 1798, "respecting alien enemies," providing for a case of war, and operating only upon the citizens or subjects of the hostile nation or Government. This act of June, 1798, was levelled at alien friends; against those who had been invited by the policy of the States, and the genius and spirit of our free institutions, to fly from the oppressions and convulsions of the old world, and seek an asylum in the States; against oppressed humanity, seeking a home on our peaceful shores. All this numerous class of aliens, not then having completed their naturalization, were placed at the discretion of the President, to be removed upon suspicion, without the form of a trial, except in the mind and judgment of the President. The sedition law operated upon citizens as well as aliens.

These two acts, when made to bear against particular individuals, might have been the subjects of judicial investigation in each particular case; but the decision in such case would have affected only the personal rights of the individuals, parties to the judicial proceeding, but could not fix and bind the important rights of the State sovereignty involved in those two acts of Congress. Those acts, although they had never been brought to bear upon a single person, did invade the political rights and powers of the States, violated that security for liberty of speech, of the press, of the person, which the States respectively had a right, and were in duty bound, to maintain within their respective jurisdictions; and counteracted the policy and interests of the States, by driving from their shores alien friends, whom their laws had encouraged and invited to settle their vast tracts of wild, uncultivated lands; the faith of a sovereign State was pledged; that sovereign was bound to take care that its plighted faith was not violated by the usurpation of another potentate. The private rights and personal security of individuals, and the political rights, authorities, and powers of the State Governments, were both invaded and violated by these two acts. An individual might be indicted for sedition, and sentenced, or be arrested for refusing to depart according to the order of the President, and the court might refuse to discharge him upon habeas corpus. The private rights of the individual, when violated under color of the alien or sedition law, might be submitted to the judicial powers. But the political powers, authorities, and liberties of a State, violated by those laws, cannot be subjected to the judicial power of a federal court, supreme or inferior; they cannot be arrested, tried, condemned, removed, or extinguished. Such cases as do not fall properly under the denomination of judicial powers, of cases of law and equity, according to common usage and acceptance antecedent to the constitution, required an enumeration and express delegation to the judicial department to hold cognizance of such classes, of which there are examples in the constitution; such as controversies between two or more States, and between a State and foreign States, &c.

The distinctions between political and judicial powers; between judicial cases in law and equity, and political cases; between the binding effect of a judicial decision on the parties litigant, and its want of obligatory force on

Revenue Collection Bill.

others, not parties nor privies, are very necessary to be observed.

The disregard of the usage of speech antecedent to the constitution, and of the distinctions just mentioned, would remove the landmarks of the compact. It would convert the Supreme Court into a political council and board of control, to administer the political opinions of its members. It would confer on the Supreme Court powers too gigantic and terrific, too dangerous to the peace of the United States, to the reserved powers of the States, and to the safety of the Union.

It would carry along with it the power to the Supreme Court to decide upon acquisition of new territories, and upon the admission of States into the Union, formed out of such purchased territories; the power to decide how far infractions of treaties and delays of reparation did abrogate those treaties between the United States and foreign nations.

The whole system of the United States, for ascertaining and adjusting private land claims in the newly acquired territories by commissioners, reserving the final decision to the Congress, depends upon the distinction I have taken.

Remove these distinctions, and the powers of the legislative and executive departments depend on the judgment of the Supreme Court; and the limits of its own powers would depend upon its own will.

A new mode of drawing to the Federal Government the reserved powers of the States is let in, which evades and puts to naught the safeguard to the minority of the States provided by the compact against amendments. The door is open to usurpation and tyranny, by giving the Federal Government the sole and entire control, independent of any control of the States.

By the theory of the constitution, if the Congress desire to exercise a new power not before delegated, they must draw upon the States for a further surrender and delegation of another portion of their reserved powers. To sanction such new delegation of power, three-fourths of the several States must consent, by ratifying the amendment proposed. But in practice, under this new doctrine, that whatever power is sanctioned by the Supreme Court of the United States is constitutional, and the States have no power to interpose, a bare majority of both Houses of Congress, with the assent of the President and the Supreme Court, or two-thirds of both Houses with the assent of the Supreme Court, without the assent of the President, may alter the constitution at pleasure. If the Congress exercise any of the powers reserved to the States by passing an act, let the Supreme Court, in a litigation between two citizens, in which this law is incidentally drawn in question, sanction it as constitutional, then, according to this unlimited power, conferred on the Supreme Court by construction, the act would be constitutional law, sound constitutional doctrine. Protect the authors of the law from a public examination of their conduct, by the terrors of an alien and sedition law, to speak or to write against the authors of the law would be seditious; to oppose the law by force would be treason, rebellion! So say those who contend for the unlimited power of the Supreme Court to decide "all cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States!" Deny the rights of the States to interpose to arrest the usurpation, and where is the remedy?

Happily, a Legislature cannot be indicted of sedition; a State cannot be indicted of treason, and arraigned at the bar of a court. The general revolt of a whole nation against usurpation and oppression cannot justly be called rebellion. Truth is comprehended by examining principles. A whole people resisting oppression, and vindicating their own liberty and the constitution, commit no crime in so doing. Private men, who swear allegiance to the constitution, who swear "obedience ad legem," swear no obedience "extra vel contra legem." The oath can detract nothing from the constitution; nothing from the public liberty, which the constitution was intended to protect. It admits the right to protect and preserve the constitution, and imposes a duty to avenge the violation of it.

By the constitution, the diversified particular interests of the States were intended to be under the regular action of the Federal Government, secured and reserved from federal legislation: 1st, by a judicious selection of the delegated powers, the exercise of which were most likely to promote the general welfare of all the States, and least likely to bear oppressively upon any one of them; 2d, by regulations and prohibitions upon the exercise of those powers so specified and delegated, so as to render their action uniform in all the States, and to guard against a preference or favoritism towards any of the States; 3d, by guarding against amendments which might delegate additional powers, and divest the States of further portions of sovereignty, unless such amendments were proposed by two-thirds of the Houses of Congress, or two-thirds of the Legislatures of the several States, and afterwards ratified by three-fourths of the States.

But by this new doctrine of supremacy of the federal court, an irregular action of the Federal Government is substituted in place of amendment. Usurpation of power, if sanctioned by the Supreme Court, is made equal to an additional grant by an amendment of the constitution. A majority of the States combined in interest, may, if sanctioned by the Supreme Court, exercise any powers not delegated, not necessary and proper to execute the powers especially delegated, but new substantive powers to the Government, added by construction, destructive of the particular interests and prosperity of a minority of the States—powers which two-thirds of both Houses, or two-thirds of the Legislatures of the States, would not propose; or, if proposed, would not be ratified by three-fourths of the States as an amendment to the constitution.

A majority of the States elect a majority of the Senators, and a majority of the members of the House of Representatives; and a bare majority of the States may be so taken as that they may elect a majority of electors of President and Vice President. So that a majority of States combined in the assumption of new powers, may exercise such new constructive powers to their aggrandizement, and the advancement of their particular interests, to the depression of the particular interests and prosperity of the minority. Such a combination may be perpetuated by the very fact that it is a combination of the majority of local and particular interests. The aggression cannot be corrected by an appeal of the minority for a change of representation in the two Houses, because of the special interests which the majority of the States have in continuing such system of benefits to themselves, at the expense of the minority. The combination can effectually perpetuate itself by continual elections to both Houses, and by the election of the President and Vice President.

This is a short way of adding new powers by assumption of Congress, with the consent of the Supreme Court, and denying the authority of the States to interpose to arrest the evil. It is a new mode of amendment to the constitution, totally variant from the mode prescribed by the constitution. It evades and defies the security and efficient safeguard provided by the constitution, and encourages encroachments which lead to a tyrannical concentration of all the powers of Government, both State and federal, in the same hands.

But there may be instances of usurpations of undelegated power so contrived as to evade the examination and decision of the judicial department, even in suits between the Federal Government and an individual.

The very protective system, which is the source of this unhappy discontents in South Carolina as well as in other States, is a striking example.

SENATE.]

Revenue Collection Bill.

The tariff bill, on its title and face, professes to be for revenue. But the duties imposed produce revenue exceeding the wants of the Government for its economical expenditures. The high imposts are enacted for protection of manufactures. But this motive and intent is concealed and not avowed in the bill, howsoever strongly urged on the floors of Congress to induce the high tariff; and howsoever this intent may inflate extravagant and wasteful expenditures, for the purpose of fostering and continuing the high pressure of taxation upon consumers.

Now, the judicial tribunals cannot go out of the act to look for the motives of the members of Congress; they cannot examine into the secret springs of action in the Legislature. So it is decided in the case of Fletcher vs. Peck, in the Supreme Court of the United States. As the power to tax imports and collect revenue is expressly delegated, the question of the undelegated but usurped power of protection of one class of citizens, by giving money to them, taken from the pockets of other classes of citizens who consume domestic manufactures, can never arise upon a bill professing to be for revenue. But will the gentlemen who are so ardent for protection of manufactures be pleased to divide these subjects into two acts: the first, for revenue; the second, declaring that over and above the amount of duties necessary for revenue, so much additional duty shall be imposed for protection? Bill number one, for revenue, no citizen will question. But bill number two, for protection avowedly, will be questioned; the judicial tribunals can, at the instance of any individual, who pays the duty for revenue, but refuses to pay the duty for protection, come at the question of delegated or undelegated power. Aye, more, sir; the people will see how much they are taxed for the wants of the treasury; and what for the system of protection to manufactures. I challenge the supporters of the protective system to such a trial.

Government, at best, is but an evil. But it is a necessary evil. It is founded in an imperious necessity arising out of the very nature of man, his imperfection, his apathy to pursue his passion and selfish desires, to the destruction of the rights and interests of his fellow-men. If men were as perfect as angels, then no Government would be necessary. But such is the nature and imperfections of man, that the exercise of the powers of Government tends to increase, not to allay, his lust for dominion.

Few men are willing to lessen their own powers. There are illustrious examples to the contrary. They stand conspicuous and illustrious, because they are exceptions to the general rule. "Power is continually stealing from the many to the few." No wise and practical statesman, who is a lover of rational liberty, none but a political dreamer of the perfectability of man, or one who, expecting to bask in the sunshine of power, loves it more than liberty, would ever construct a Government upon any other plan than that of providing and securing checks and balances against the encroachments and abuses of power. The federal constitution was framed and adopted by wise, patriotic, and practical statesmen, lovers of liberty, inspired with a holy zeal in a revolution to resist the encroachments of power from the central Government upon the rights and liberties of the colonies. They did not, they could not, intend to create a central Government with unlimited powers, nor a Government without sufficient practical checks against the usurpations which might be attempted upon the reserved rights of the States.

The Supreme Court of the United States is not such sufficient check and safeguard against the encroachments of the central Government upon the State Governments. The number of judges of the Supreme Court is not defined by the constitution. That number is but seven at present. Four are a majority of the court. But the number may be increased at the pleasure of the Congress and a President, so as to give a majority of a desired political cast. These judges hold their offices for life, removable by impeachment by the House of Representatives, and conviction by the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators. Their responsibility is too remote, and the number too few for a high prerogative court, with power to adjust the political powers of the Federal and State Governments, and try the Federal Government when impeached of usurpation and encroachment upon the reserved powers belonging to the States. If the central Government be accused of encroachment and usurpation, its triers, the Supreme Court judges, are, in their turn, liable to be impeached and tried by the central Government. The Congress who commit the usurpation are the only persons who can impeach and try their judges. The offending Congress are to be tried by their judges; and the offending judges are to be impeached and tried by the offending Congress. There is but little wise and practical security in this against the encroachments of the central Government. No plaintiff would feel very safe if the defendant had the sole power to appoint the jury, with the power superadded to accuse that jury of misconduct, and try the accusation. It seems to me that if those wise and practical statesmen and patriots who framed the new federal constitution had designed the Supreme Court to be the sole prerogative court of high and ultimate commission to try the central Government for usurpation of powers not delegated, and the final and sole safeguard for the reserved powers of the States, they would have devised some more certain and direct responsibility of the judges to the States, than by referring their impeachment to Congress, who must be parties, aiders, and abettors in the usurpation. The States would not have adopted the constitution if they had been informed that such was to be its interpretation.

In deliberating upon the extent of the powers intended to be conferred by the constitution upon the several departments, and the powers reserved by the States, we ought to keep steadily in view—

1st. The perpetuity of the Union;

2d. The powers necessary to a fair and energetic administration of the Government, as ordained and established;

3d. The safety of a minority of the States against a combination of a majority;

4th. The security against usurpation and degeneracy into practical tyranny.

These are the great interests of every true American, to which every patriot ought to look with a watchful, steadfast eye.

Every construction of the constitution which tends, in practical operation, to weaken the exercise of the powers plainly conferred, to lessen the security against the combination of a majority of the States against the minority, or to weaken the guards against usurpation and practical tyranny, tends necessarily, in the end, to weaken and dissolve the bonds of union, and ought, therefore, to be rejected.

Union, common defence, and protection, justice to all, rational liberty to all, now and at all times hereafter, were the great ends intended by the constitution. All constructions which tend to subvert these great ends; which tend to invite or encourage usurpation in the Federal Government, or to the usurpation by one department of powers belonging to another department; which tend to invite and encourage a combination of a majority of the States to pursue their interests at the expense of a minority of the States, ought to be rejected as repugnant to the leading objects of the constitution. These leading inducements were, justice to the whole, the welfare of all.

Oppression, injustice, invasion of private property by the insidious arts of legislation, insecurity against the oppressive hand of power, combinations by a majority of confederated States against the minority, have produced revolutions and destruction of Governments, and will reproduce them, unless the human race shall be degenerated into brutal ignorance; non-resistance and passive obedience be inculcated as of divine institution; and every spark of rational liberty shall be extinguished.

The genius of our institutions, the intelligence of the people of the States, the spirit of free inquiry guaranteed by the Federal and State Governments, the love of liberty which pervades the great body of the people, all conspire to insure us that the iron age of ignorance, tyranny, and passive obedience is never to infect this land with its baleful gloom, unless preceded by those awful convulsions of party strife and civil war, which desolate social order, and bury science, morals, and religion in the ruins.

Are there no dangers to liberty to be apprehended from referring all the political powers of the Federal Government, and all the reserved powers of the States, to the guardianship of a few judges appointed for life, not removable, except by impeachment for crimes and misdemeanors; not impeachable or removable for error of opinion? So far removed from responsibility, ("for impeachment is not now even a scarecrow,") if transformed into a political court instead of a judicial tribunal, is there no cause to apprehend that a majority of the judges may administer their theory of what the Government should be, instead of the theory actually adopted by the States? Are no judicial opinions tinctured and discolored with the party feelings and opinions of the day? Is there no cause to apprehend that the judges will follow up the maxim taught in the law schools, and issued from the bench, "ex boni judicis amplari jurisdictionem," not only to the enlargement of their own powers, but to the enlargement of the powers and increase of the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, as the means convenient and proper to the end, the amplification of their own jurisdiction?

If the judges of the Supreme Court are to have the final and exclusive authority to settle political questions, touching encroachments upon the reserved powers of the States, and all other political questions arising under the constitution, then, superadded to those qualifications which have heretofore been thought essential for a judge, the primary consideration in selecting him ought to be, in what political school has he been brought up? What are his political opinions on certain great contested political questions? To what political party does he belong? I respect a court of justice, but I abhor a party court. Let us not, by construction, transform a court of justice into a political council of state. Let us not transform the emblem of justice into the emblem of power. Let us not defile the sanctuary of justice with the passions of political parties contending for political powers.

If the Supreme Court is once acknowledged to be the ultimate tribunal for settling the boundaries of political power between the Federal Government and the State Governments, so as to bind the parties to the compact, then it will inevitably follow that the court will be the subject of political party strife. Reform in the court, by infusing a new spirit by other or additional judges, will become the subject of political party strife as much as reform in the executive administration. The majority of Congress and the Executive might at any time add to the bench of the Supreme Court a sufficient number of judges to carry an important question of political power. The British ministry advised the King to create a sufficient number of new peers to carry the reform bill. The power of a majority of Congress, with the aid of the President, to create new judges, for a special occasion, is as effectual as the power of the King to create new peers.

The principles of civil justice to be administered by the judicial tribunals are fixed, immutable, and eternal; they are so nearly assimilated in all civilized nations, that they may be made universal. But the notions of political justice, and balances of political power, are mutable and variant, differing, like the complexions, habits, education, and feelings of politicians.

If the Supreme Court is to be the sole and exclusive judge in the last resort, not only of judicial questions properly submitted to it by the forms of the constitution, but also of all questions touching the confines of political powers delegated and not delegated by the compact, then not only the legislative and executive departments of the Government hold their powers at the will of this court, but the concurrence of this court, with the other departments of the Federal Government, "in usurped powers, might subvert forever, and beyond the possible reach of any rightful remedy, the very constitution which all were instituted to preserve." If one of the parties is to be the sole and exclusive judge of the extent of the powers to him delegated, and of the concessions made by the other parties, then such party would have an unlimited and supreme authority over the other parties. It is not sufficient to discriminate in theory the several classes of power, and distribute them between the legislative, executive, and judicial departments; neither will it suffice to mark with precision the boundaries between the powers delegated to the Federal Government and those retained by the States, and trust to these parchment barriers for defence against the insatiable appetite and restless gnawings of power. Experience teaches that the efficacy of such paper barriers are too feeble to withstand the scorching desires of power, and that some more adequate defence is indispensable to secure the more feeble against the more powerful members of the Government.

The judicial department does not present the requisite security in matters of such transcendent and vital importance. The judges of the Supreme Court are too few in number. The permanent tenure by which their appointments are held, as well as their salaries and the mode of their appointment, destroys all sense of dependence on the States, and lifts them above the common burdens of the people; and, from the very nature of their callings, they see human nature in the worst light.

These are but too apt to infuse into their minds high-toned notions of a forcible consolidated Government, as necessary to "save the people from their worst enemy—themselves." Judges, in a long course of official duties, are familiarized to the sight of frauds, chicaneries, misdemeanors, and crimes; accustomed to exercise the force of the laws upon knavish wealth, naked poverty, and squalid vice; they are but too apt to confound the distinction between the judicial powers necessary to administer the laws, and political powers necessary to prescribe the laws; between the powers necessary to be granted to secure and protect against a violation of the laws by the vicious, and the powers necessary to be reserved to the good for protection and security against a violation and abuse of the political powers of the Government.

In England, from the time that Alfred hung the forty judges for illegal and corrupt practices, to the trial and conviction of Algernon Sidney for high treason, in writing that celebrated treatise on Government, (which, since his execution, has been published,) against the divine right of kings, and the doctrines of non-resistance and passive obedience, and from that time to this, the history of judicial power, as exercised, teaches this solemn truth—judges are but men, fallible men.

The history of judicial power in our own country and in our days, is not less impressive.

But I forbear.

I respect an independent, upright judge. There is a generous confidence yielded by the moral sense of the community to such an officer. He is looked upon as the guardian of civil rights, the protector of life, liberty, and

[SENATE.]

Revenue Collection Bill.

[JAN. 31, 1833.]

property. But the judge who exhibits himself as the zealot of a political party, freezes the generous confidence of the people, and turns it into fear and trembling.

It is well remarked in the 51st No. of the Letters of Publius, in relation to the judicial department, that "the permanent tenure by which the appointments are held in that department must soon destroy all sense of dependence on the authority conferring them."

I defend the framers of the constitution from any intention of conferring on the Supreme Court such transcendent powers. I will not slander the characters of the dead, nor of the survivors, by supposing that these zealous patriots and enthusiastic defenders of the rights of the colonies against the central power of Great Britain, could have been traitors to their principles. It is impossible, to my belief, that the statesmen who were members of the respective State conventions could have intended to adopt a Government so destitute of all reasonable defence against the encroachments of power and the uncompromising purposes of self-interest, as this would be, if the Supreme Court were the sole expositor of the constitution in the last resort, and in "all cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States."

If the General Government is to be the exclusive judge of the extent of the powers delegated to it, the discretion of those who administer the Government, and not the constitution, would be the measure of their powers. And if one department of that Government, the judiciary, is to be the sole and final expositor, then its discretion, and not the constitution, would be the measure of their powers. Such a construction invites those who exercise power to arrogate more than they have a right to, by declaring they are the sole, final, and exclusive judges of the measure of their own powers.

Far different was the language of those who made the constitution; of those who recommended it for adoption, and of those who were deliberating on its adoption. It was declared, so recommended, and so adopted, to be a Government of limited powers, few and defined; that the powers of the State Governments were numerous and indefinite, and that the State Governments were "constituent and essential parts of the Federal Government;" "that the State Governments would be the sentinels and the authoritative bulwarks against encroachments of the Federal Government."—Federalist, No. 45, p. 292.

In the 45th No. of the Letters of Publius, p. 290, it is declared that "the State Governments may be regarded as constituent and essential parts of the Federal Government." "Each of the principal branches of the Federal Government will owe its existence, more or less, to the favor of the State Governments, and must consequently feel a dependence which is more likely to beget a disposition too obsequious than too overbearing towards them."

Again, in the same number: "The powers delegated by the proposed constitution to the Federal Government are few and defined. Those which are to remain in the State Governments are numerous and indefinite. The former will be exercised principally on external objects, as war, peace, negotiation, and foreign commerce; with which last, the power of taxation will, for the most part, be connected. The powers reserved to the several States will extend to all the objects which, in the ordinary course of affairs, concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people, and the internal order, improvement, and prosperity of the State."

Again, in No. 46: "But ambitious encroachments of the Federal Government on the authority of the State Governments would not excite the opposition of a single State, or a few States only. They would be signals of general alarm. Every Government would espouse the common cause. A correspondence would be opened. Plans of resistance would be concerted." "The same combination, in short, would result from an apprehension of the federal, as was produced by the dread of a foreign yoke; and unless the projected innovations should be voluntarily renounced, the same appeal to a trial of force would be made in the one case as would be made in the other. But what degree of madness could ever drive the Federal Government to such an extremity?"

Again, page 299: "The only refuge left for those who prophesy the downfall of the State Governments is the visionary supposition that the Federal Government may previously accumulate a military force for the objects of ambition. That the people and the States should, for a sufficient period of time, elect an uninterrupted succession of men, ready to betray both; that the Governments and people of the States should silently and patiently behold the gathering storm, and continue to supply the materials, until it should be prepared to burst on their own heads, must appear to every one more like the incoherent dreams of a delirious jealousy, or the misjudged exaggerations of a counterfeit zeal, than like the sober apprehensions of genuine patriotism. Extravagant as the supposition is, let it, however, be made. Let a regular army, fully equal to the resources of the country, be formed; and let it be entirely at the devotion of the Federal Government; still it would not be going too far to say, that the State Governments, with the people on their side, would be able to repel the danger."

Again, in the same No.: "Notwithstanding the military establishments, in the several kingdoms of Europe, which are carried as far as the public resources will bear, the Governments are afraid to trust the people with arms. And it is not certain that, with this aid alone, they would not be able to shake off their yokes. But were the people to possess the additional advantages of local Governments chosen by themselves, who could collect the national will and direct the national force, and of officers appointed out of the militia by these Governments, and attached both to them and to the militia, it may be affirmed, with the greatest assurance, that the throne of every tyranny in Europe would be speedily overturned, in spite of the legions which surround it."

Again, in No. 48: "It will not be denied that power is of an encroaching nature, and that it ought to be effectually restrained from passing the limits assigned to it. After discriminating, therefore, in theory, the several classes of power, as they may in their nature be legislative, executive, or judiciary, the next and most difficult task is to provide some practical security for each against the invasion of the others." "Will it be sufficient to mark with precision the boundaries of these departments in the constitution of the Government, and to trust to these parchment bargains against the encroaching spirit of power?" "Experience assures us that the efficacy of the provision has been greatly overrated, and that some more adequate defence is indispensably necessary for the more feeble against the more powerful members of the Government."

The residue of this No., and Nos. 49 and 50, are devoted to prove, by very many examples, "that a mere demarcation on parchment of the constitutional limits of the several departments, is not a sufficient safeguard against those encroachments which lead to a tyrannical concentration of all the powers of Government in the same hands."

In No. 49, it is said: "We have found, in the last paper, that mere declarations in the written constitution are not sufficient to restrain the several departments within their legal limits."

Again, in No. 51: "To what expedient, then, shall we finally resort, for maintaining the necessary partition of power among the several departments as laid down in the constitution? The only answer that can be given is, that if all these exterior provisions are found to be inadequate, the defect must be supplied, by so contriving the interior structure of the Government, as that its several constituent parts may, by their mutual relations, be the means of keeping each other in their proper places."

The first safeguard suggested is, that each department should have a will of its own, and the members of each should have as little agency as possible in appointing the others. In the execution of this principle rigorously, "all appointments for the supreme executive, legislative, and judiciary magistracies should be drawn from the same fountain of authority, the people, through channels having no communication with each other." Difficulties are then suggested, which render some deviations from the rigorous execution of that principle proper. In the constitution of the judiciary department, in particular, it might be inexpedient to insist rigorously on the principle, (election by the people;) first, because peculiar qualifications being essential in the members, the primary consideration ought to be to select that mode of choice which best secures these qualifications; secondly, because the permanent tenure by which the appointments are held in that department must soon destroy all sense of dependence on the authority conferring them.

Another great security against a gradual concentration of the several powers in the same department "consists in giving to those who administer each department the necessary constitutional means and personal motives to resist encroachments from the others." "In framing a Government, which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this: you must first enable the Government to control the governed; and, in the next place, oblige it to control itself. A dependence on the people is, no doubt, the primary control on the Government; but experience has taught mankind the necessity of auxiliary precaution."

After reasoning upon the subject of these auxiliary precautions generally; the celebrated author of this number of Publius exhibits some as peculiarly applicable to the Federal Government, p. 326: "There are," says he, "moreover, two considerations particularly applicable to the federal system in a very interesting point of view.

"First. In a single republic, all the power surrendered by the people is submitted to the administration of a single Government; and the usurpations are guarded against by a division of the Government into separate and distinct departments. In the compound republic of America, the power surrendered by the people is first divided between distinct Governments, and then the portion allotted to each divided among distinct and separate departments. Hence, a double security arises to the rights of the people. The different Governments will control each other, at the same time that each will be controlled by itself.

"Secondly. It is of great importance in a republic not only to guard society against the oppression of its rulers, but to guard one part of society against the injustice of the other part. Different interests necessarily exist in different classes of citizens. If a majority be united by common interest, the rights of the minority will be insecure. There are but two methods of providing against this evil; the one by creating a will in the community independent of the majority; the other, by comprehending in the society so many separate descriptions of citizens as will render an unjust combination of a majority of the whole very improbable, if not impracticable."

The 52d No. concludes by adverting again to this security arising from the control of the State Governments. "The conclusion resulting from these examples will be a little strengthened by these three circumstances. The first is, that the Federal Legislature will possess a part only of that supreme legislative authority which is vested completely in the British Parliament; and which, with a few exceptions, was exercised by the Colonial Assemblies and the Irish Legislature. In the second place, it has, on another occasion, been shown that the Federal Legislature will not only be restrained by its dependence on the people, as other legislative bodies are, but that it will be, moreover, watched and controlled by the several collateral Legislatures, which other legislative bodies are not."

The letters of Publius, thus explaining the principles of the constitution, and the checks and balances, were published to the people of the United States, and had very great influence in recommending the proposed constitution. In the State conventions assembled to consider the proposed constitution, the same explanations were repeated again and again, as well by distinguished members of the federal convention which framed and proposed the new constitution, as by the other advocates for its adoption. The apprehensions that the new constitution was or could be made a Government of unlimited powers—that the rights and powers of the State Governments could be absorbed by construction—that all powers, foreign and domestic, could be melted in the crucible of federal power, and consolidated in one mass, to be used at pleasure by the Federal Government, as its administrators might think fit and convenient for the general welfare, were pronounced idle and visionary. Those who entertained such fears were called political dreamers, arguing against the plain sense and meaning of the instrument. It was over and over again explained as a Government of defined powers, with safe and sufficient checks and balances to guard against the exercise of powers not delegated by the States: as a Government deriving its powers by special delegation, leaving to the State Governments all their rights, powers, and privileges not delegated nor prohibited. In that sense, it was adopted by the States. But to render assurance doubly sure, they proposed and adopted the tenth amendment, declaring—

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." Mark! to the States "respectively," not collectively.

When the new federal constitution was framed and proposed for adoption, the encroaching nature of power had been severely felt and not forgotten. The necessity to fortify against its usurpations was well understood, and the principles of republican government were adored with a frank and generous spirit. In those early seasons of virtue and devotion to liberty, the letters of Publius appeared, abounding with sound political maxims and elementary principles of republican government, drawn from the deepest fountains of knowledge—the history of past times, observations on the present, and the reflections of the wise, the good, the philanthropic, and the patriotic.

These principles are clearly stated and forcibly illustrated in the letters of Publius, that the State Governments are constituent and essential parts of the Federal Government; that the powers of the proposed Federal Government are few and defined; that those which remain to the State Governments are numerous and indefinite; that the change proposed by the new constitution consists much less in the addition of new powers to the Union, than in the invigoration of the old, except only as to the regulation of commerce; that power is of an encroaching nature; that it ought to be effectually restrained from passing the limits assigned to it; that one security is, by written constitutions; a second by distribution of powers into legislative, executive, and judicial; a third, that these powers be intrusted to different hands; that mere demarcations of powers and written declarations in a constitution are not sufficient to restrain the legislative, executive, and judicial departments within their assigned limits, nor to prevent their encroachments, the one upon the other, nor to prevent the tyrannical concentration of all the powers of Government in the same hands; that, to oblige the Government to control itself, and keep within its assigned limits, some additional auxiliaries over and above paper barriers, and dependence on the people, are necessary; that these additional auxiliaries consist in providing that each department may have a will of its own, and that each be invested with the constitutional means and personal motives to resist encroachments of the other departments.

The Federal Government is then represented as containing all the securities of a single republic, by the divisions of the several classes of executive, judicial, and legislative powers among the several distinct departments; but, also, that by the division of powers between the State Governments and the Federal Government, each department will watch the others; each Government will have a tendency to control itself; and the different Governments will control each other; that this Federal Government will be doubly watched and controlled by the people and by the State Governments.

The letters of Publius do most explicitly explain that the State Governments were safeguards against the encroachments of the Federal Government, not only as being constituent parts, but by reason of having a will of their own; capable of watching, capable of directing their force, and having the control of the militia.

In the debates in the New York convention on the adoption of the federal constitution, Mr. Hamilton urged the same security against federal encroachment. He said: "The people have an obvious and powerful protection in their State Governments. Should any thing dangerous be attempted, these bodies of perpetual observation will be capable of forming and conducting plans of regular opposition. Can we believe the people's love of liberty will not, under the incitement of their legislative bodies, be roused into resistance, and the madness of tyranny be extinguished at a blow?"

The resolutions of Kentucky and Virginia, of 1798, and of Virginia at the session of the Legislature of 1799, concur in ascribing to the State Governments the rightful power to interpose to arrest dangerous usurpations by the Federal Government.

Here it is convenient to remark that the report and resolutions of the Legislature of Virginia, of January, 1810, do not in the least conflict with the resolutions of Virginia of 1798 and 1799, and Kentucky of 1798. Those of 1810 relate to a proposition from Pennsylvania to provide, by amendments to the constitution, for cases of conflicting decisions between the State courts and the federal courts. Those of 1798 and 1799 relate to deliberate and palpable usurpations by the Federal Government of the dangerous powers, other than those delegated.

The inaugural address of Mr. Jefferson recommends "the support of the State Governments in all their rights as the most competent administrators of our domestic concerns, and the bulwarks against anti-republican tendencies." The letters of Publius, before the State conventions convened; the explanation in the conventions, by the advocates of the proposed constitution; the resolutions of Virginia and Kentucky of 1798 and 1799; and the inaugural address of Mr. Jefferson, all concur in asserting the rights of the State Governments to arrest and prevent the dangerous usurpations of the Federal Government.

Without these conservative principles, "these bodies of perpetual observation," the Federal Government would soon become the sole arbiter of its powers, with a faculty within itself to increase its powers and multiply its authorities without limit; to riot in irresponsibility, and dazzle by its splendor; to attract to itself all the powers of the State Governments, and, in its omnipotency, to grind the States into dust. Such a Government, overwhelmed by the multiplicity of its concerns, could not enter into the details of legislation. Large discretionary powers would be conferred on the Executive; in place of law, executive discretion must govern; security for life, liberty, and property will vanish; the voice of the people will be stifled, until the evils shall accumulate beyond endurance; and then there would be no relief but in convulsion, no remedy but in revolution. Such must be the inevitable result of consolidating State and federal powers into one Government, extended over such a widespread surface; so various in climate, productions, pursuits, habits, and interests. One central Government, with general and defined powers of legislation, cannot diffuse the blessings of good order, security, responsibility, and rational liberty, throughout such a vast territory. The State Governments are necessary parties and towers of defence.

But we are providing by this bill to compel a State into submission; to exhibit the spectacle of a Government at war with itself. This power of compelling a State was proposed in the convention, and rejected. On the 15th June, 1787, Mr. Paterson, of New Jersey, submitted to the convention various resolutions. The eighth was, that the acts of the United States, and treaties, &c. "to be the supreme law," &c.

"And if any State, or any body of men in any State, shall oppose or prevent the carrying into execution such acts or treaties, the Federal Executive shall be authorized to call forth the powers of the confederated States, or so much thereof as may be necessary to enforce and compel an obedience to such acts, or an observance of such treaties."

On the 19th of June, this proposition (with the others submitted by Mr. Paterson,) was voted upon in Committee of the Whole, and negatived; seven States voting against it, and only three for it.

Here Mr. B. yielded the floor to

Mr. POINDEXTER, who moved that the Senate now adjourn. Yeas 11, nays 19.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. BUCKNER then moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill, and to make it the special order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. WEBSTER rose to a point of order. The gentleman from Kentucky had given way, in the usual manner, to a motion to adjourn. Such was the practice in the Senate. But if a gentleman yielded the floor for any other motion, he yielded the right to resume it.

Mr. POINDEXTER said, it must be apparent to the Senate that the question now before the Senate was one of the greatest importance. He had never before seen a disposition manifested by this body to refuse to a member an opportunity for rest and research in order to enable himself to close his argument in a manner which would be satisfactory to himself and to the country. If the Senator from Massachusetts were disposed to speak to the Senate for a week, he would always vote for adjournment when it was requested.

The CHAIR decided that if a Senator yielded the floor for any other motion than a motion to adjourn, he lost the right to the floor.

Mr. POINDEXTER then renewed the motion to adjourn, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered. The question was then taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Buckner, Calhoun, Clay, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Poindexter, Rives, Robinson, Tyler, White.—14.

NAYS.—Messrs. Chambers, Clayton, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Hill, Holmes, Kane, Knight, Robbins, Seymour, Silsbee, Tip-ton, Tomlinson, Webster, Wilkins, Wright.—20.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. BIBB then continued a few minutes longer, when he again gave way; and,

On motion of Mr. MANGUM,
The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 1.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

The Senate having resumed the consideration of the special order of the day, which was "a bill further to provide for the collection of duties on imports"—

Mr. BIBB resumed his argument. Shall we, said he, make war upon South Carolina? Shall we clothe the President with the power to proclaim war against one of the States of this Union? If so, for what cause? In a foreign war it is of the utmost importance that it be just; that it be the only, the last sad alternative between submission forever to grievous wrong, or a forcible redress. Before we authorize war with a member of the confederacy, we should look with yet greater caution to the justice of our cause. We should consider well the cost of the conflict, the probable consequences, and the final result. Lord North's fatal delusion of prostrating America at his feet, his disregard of the just complaints of the colonies, his confidence in the British power, severed the colonies from the mother country. Let us not, by a like fatal delusion, dismember this Union. Our policy to demand nothing but that which is just, and to submit to nothing that is wrong, has given us unparalleled success in our wars and in our negotiations. The justice of our cause, our forbearance to seek justice by war until all other means have been exhausted, have hitherto blessed us with the smiles of Providence. Our tower of strength, our monument of glory, will nod from on high, and totter to their fall, if we rashly and unjustly wage war upon a sister State. Have we justice on our side? What are we to get by the war? Is war the only alternative? Why shall we go to war with South Carolina? She has adopted an ordinance, and passed certain legislative acts; and she has issued a manifesto, all aimed against the system of protection, cloaked under color of revenue.

For years South Carolina and other States have remonstrated against the system of protection as oppressive to them, and unwarranted by the constitution. Is South Carolina right or wrong in demanding a reduction of the tariff? Is not a reduction demanded by justice and expediency? Whilst gentlemen are thrusting at others with the authoritative doctrines of the President, as announced in the proclamation and message, I interpose the shield of the same high authority. The President, in his message at the opening of the session, and again in the message to which this bill professes to be a response, has recommended a reduction of the tariff as due to justice and sound policy. Instead of complying with this, another part of the message is seized, and this bill is reported to execute injustice and oppression by the sword, the bayonet, and the cannon. Can we expect our affairs to prosper under such a course? Can the Union stand this? Will the other Southern States, who are smarting under a sense of the injustice and oppression of the tariff, remain inactive spectators of war and carnage perpetrated in such a cause? Can we expect that an overruling Providence will smile upon a war so begun, and so prosecuted, against a weak sister? We should recollect that justice is an attribute of God himself. The principle is of divine origin and institution, immutable and eternal. Human law and human force cannot convert injustice into justice. Our armies and our navy are but as dust in the balance, compared with the power of Omnipotence to execute the divine decrees of justice. Sooner or later, divine justice will overtake and punish the guilt of nations. We have cause to recollect that the race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong. There is an overruling power; a Providence which attempts the winds to the scorn lamb. Let us turn our ears to the complaints of South Carolina. Let us hearken to the voice of reason. Let us not betray an unmanly passion, because a sister has rebuked our power. Let us be just. Let us come to legislative action on the tariff, the source of complaint and grievance to South Carolina; the fruitful source of discontents elsewhere. Let us see if there is not a speedier and more effectual mode by which the discontents of South Carolina may be healed, by which gladness and joy may be diffused throughout the United States, instead of the baleful gloom which must be excited by the horrid spectacle of a nation at war with itself.

If we make war upon South Carolina to put down her principles, we ought to be certain that those principles are bad, dangerous, and repugnant to those upon which the federal constitution is based.

What are her principles? That in all questions touching her rights and powers not delegated to the Federal Government, she has a right to judge as to the usurpation, and as to the mode and measure of redress. Not that she claims the right to arrest the execution of a lawful act of Congress, but that she has a right, within her jurisdiction, to arrest an unlawful act of Congress; such an act as the constitution has not sanctioned; which is null and void, because it was enacted by usurpation of powers not delegated; unlawful, because the constitution is the supreme law, higher than the Congress, overruling the acts of Congress; unlawful, because the genius of the constitution, if consulted, pronounces it null and void. South Carolina has said that the system of protection, engrafted upon the imposts, is a power never granted by her to the Federal Government. She says that the system of protecting manufacturers is unjust, and oppressive to the people of South Carolina, and destructive of their interests and happiness; moreover, the people of South Carolina have said, that, if the Congress shall attempt to enforce that protective system upon them by force of arms, they will resume all the powers, rights, and prerogatives of a sovereign State, independent of the Union.

Now, Mr. President, I wish it to be distinctly understood, that, whilst I concur in the doctrines of the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions of 1798, 1799, and 1800, I do not mean to approve the time, manner, and occasion in which South Carolina has applied them to practice. They are great conservative principles, not to be carried into practical effect but on great and pressing emergencies, when all other means of staying the hand of lawless aggression have been tried—unsuccessfully tried; and when war and revolution, in Governments differently organized from ours, would be justifiable in the eyes of liberal, enlightened, and impartial men. These great conservative powers and privileges, like all other powers, are liable to abuse in the hands of indiscreet and heated partisans. But yet, as some great conservative power is necessary to control the Government itself, to hold it in subjection to the constitution, to keep it within the limits of delegated power, I believe such regulating check more safely lodged in the whole body of a State—a whole nation of people; and there less liable to abuse than if lodged in the hands of a few, and those few exposed to many temptations to sanction the usurpations, as participators in the power and emoluments of the usurpation.

Having been, I hope, sufficiently explicit to defend myself against misrepresentation in these times of political excitement, by errors unintentional, committed in reporting and relating what has been spoken, I shall proceed to defend South Carolina and the Union against the effects of the bill before us.

Mr. President, I ask to be informed when and where, and by what instrument or act, South Carolina, or any other State of this Union, has divested herself of the right to judge whether the great end and aim of adopting the federal constitution has been attained? Of the right to judge whether her undelegated powers have been usurped; whether the trustees and agents, intrusted with powers for one purpose, have abused and perverted them to another? Of the right, in cases of such abuse, usurpation, and maladministration, to judge of the mode and manner of redress? How or when did South Carolina attempt to surrender, forever, for all generations to come, the right to resist injustice and oppression, and engage the present and all future generations to the doctrines of non-resistance and passive obedience?

An axiom is engrafted into many of our State constitutions, "that frequent recurrence to fundamental principles is essential to the preservation of liberty." The declaration has but too much truth; there is, I fear, great difficulty in getting men in power to hearken to the precept. There are certain rights, declared to be inherent and unalienable. In this, the bill of rights in State constitutions, and the great declaration of all the colonies addressed to the family of nations in 1776, will be found to agree. Mr. B. read from the declaration of independence as follows:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new Government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

It would be tedious to recite from State constitutions all the declarations in accordance with the great principles asserted by the thirteen States in the declaration of independence. All the American Governments are based upon these great principles of human liberty; the federal constitution itself is based upon them; they make a part of it. All its powers and authorities must be construed in subserviency to those unalienable rights.

The State of New York, in the very act by which she ratified the new constitution, did declare "that all power is originally vested in, and consequently derived from, the people, and that Government is instituted by them for their common interest, protection, and security." "That the enjoyment of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, are essential rights, which every Government ought to respect and preserve." "That the powers of Government may be resumed whenever it shall become necessary to their happiness; that every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not, by the said constitution, clearly delegated to the Congress of the United States, or the departments of the Government thereof, remains to the people of the several States, or to their respective State Governments." After enumerating various other rights, the act of ratification proceeds thus: "Under these impressions, and declaring that the rights aforesaid cannot be abridged or violated, and that the explanations aforesaid are consistent with the said constitution," &c., the delegates do, "in the name and on behalf of the people of the State of New York," assent to and ratify the said constitution.

The State of Rhode Island, in her act of ratification, incorporates these principles: "That there are certain natural rights, of which men, when they form a social compact, cannot deprive or divest their posterity; among which are the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety." "That the powers of Government may be re-assumed by the people, whenever it shall become necessary to their happiness." "That at all times the military should be in strict subordination to the civil power." "Under these impressions, and declaring that the rights aforesaid cannot be abridged or violated, and that the explanations aforesaid are consistent with the said constitution," &c., they do, "in the name and on behalf of the people of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations," assent to and ratify the said constitution.

The State of Virginia, in their act of ratification, declared that the powers granted under the constitution are derived from the people, "and may be resumed by them, whenever the same shall be perverted to their injury or oppression;" "and that every power not granted remains with them, and at their will: that no right, of any denomination, can be cancelled, abridged, restrained, or modified by the Congress, by the Senate or the House of Representatives, acting in any capacity, by the President, or any department or officer of the United States, except in those instances in which power is given by the constitution for those purposes."

The State of South Carolina, by her act of ratification, used these words: "This convention doth also declare that no section or paragraph of the said constitution warrants a construction that the States do not retain every power not expressly relinquished by them, and vested in the General Government of the Union."

These ratifications, with the incorporated declarations of certain unalienable rights, and that all rights not delegated are retained, were accepted by the old Congress; and the new constitution was put into operation.

The great principles, that Governments are instituted for the happiness of the people, not for the pleasure of those who are intrusted with the administration of Government; that Governments derive their authority from the people, not that the people derive their rights and liberties from the grants and concessions of kings, princes, potentates, or governors; that happiness and liberty are the ends and aim of Governments, not the shadows and incidents; that the people may resume delegated powers, and alter, reform, and abolish an instituted Government, when experience convinces that the end and aim, liberty and happiness, are not accomplished by means of the Government instituted—are the lights which the American revolution held up to the world; which they have stamped with authenticity; which they have proclaimed as axioms. These principles make the foundations of all our Governments and constitutions, State and federal. They are the pillars of light to conduct the human race to liberty and to happiness. They are the sacred fires which cheer and illumine the temple of Liberty.

I have demonstrated that the old form of Government, instituted by the articles of confederation, was adopted by States. I have demonstrated that the new form of Government was proposed to the States: adopted by the people of the States, acting as separate communities, not as one mass, but each State ratifying for herself. I will now proceed to show that the present federal constitution is founded upon the practical exercise of the principles of altering and reforming, and of resuming the powers granted, so as to accommodate Government to the great ends of human happiness and security.

By the thirteenth article of the old constitution, it was provided and declared: "The articles of this confederation shall be inviolably observed by every State, and the Union shall be perpetual; nor shall any alteration, at any time hereafter, be made in any of them, unless such alteration be agreed to by a Congress of the United States, and be afterwards confirmed by the Legislatures of every State." Nevertheless, the new constitution did declare that "the ratification by the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this constitution between the States so ratifying the same." As soon as the ratifications of nine States had been certified, provision was made for electing the President and Vice President, Senators and Representatives. They were elected, and the new Government was actually put into operation on the first Wednesday in March, 1789, without the concurrence or consent of either North Carolina or Rhode Island. Why was the thirteenth fundamental article of the old confederation violated? Upon what principle could the ratification of nine States be sufficient to make a new Government, in direct contravention of the provision that no alteration should be made but by the confirmation of every State? How were North Carolina and Rhode Island pushed out of the pale of the Union, without their consent, by the ratification of nine States? How can those acts be justified? Upon the great principles, that the right is inherent and unalienable "to alter or to abolish" any form of Government, when it becomes destructive of the ends for which it was instituted; and that powers granted may be revoked and resumed for the like causes. The unalienable and indefeasible right of the people of every community to make their Government subservient and conducive to their happiness justified the substitution of the new, in place of the old compact. When any form of Government comes in conflict with the inherent and unalienable rights asserted in our declaration of independence, those rights must prevail over the Government.

[SENATE.]

A Parliament of England once undertook for themselves, the people, and for all posterity, to surrender their rights to the King. Posterity in England nullified that surrender. We, by our revolution and declaration of rights, have put down the divine right of Kings; have repudiated the doctrines of non-resistance and passive obedience; we have asserted the unalienable rights of man; we have declared that the right to mould the Government so as to consult and preserve his happiness, is inherent and unalienable; we have put to naught the claim of one generation to bind other generations in all time to come. Are Governments for the dead or for the living? Who are to observe the springs and practical operations of Government but the living? The dead feel not the wrongs and oppressions of Government; they heed them not; they see not the defects and decays.

But, sir, is it possible that the people of the United States, who so well understood the difficulty of resisting the usurpations of power, who were so jealous of their liberties, who so well understood the rights of man, could have intended, by adopting the constitution, to surrender forever the rights they had fought for and established at such cost of blood and treasure? Did they attempt to falsify the doctrines embodied in their declaration of independence? Did they intend to fall back to the doctrines of non-resistance, to usurpation and injustice, and pledge themselves and posterity to passive obedience? No, no; they did not so intend; their acts of ratification, their cautious declarations of first principles, their explanations, the amendments recommended and speedily adopted, all prove that they reserved all powers not delegated, and adhered to the rights of man proclaimed in their declaration of independence, as being inborn and unalienable; the very constitution itself, in its provisions, and the propelling power which gave it motion and action, asserted and practised the right of the people of the States to resume powers which had been theretofore delegated to the confederated Government.

And now, Mr. President, we are invited by this bill to make war upon South Carolina, a party to the old confederation, who became a party to the new constitution by an act of ratification, expressly declaring "that no section or paragraph of the said constitution warrants a construction that the States do not retain every power not expressly relinquished by them, and vested in the General Government of the Union." This war is to be waged, because of the exercise, by South Carolina, of a right which she certainly had, as a State, before she adopted this constitution; which right is not expressly relinquished by any part of the constitution; a right which is unalienable, which cannot be relinquished according to the declaration of independence, and which was re-asserted in theory and in fact, and brought into exercise by this very constitution.

The people of South Carolina, in their sovereign character, acting in convention, and in her Legislature, have declared the protective system to be enacted by usurpation of an undelegated power, unjust, and destructive of their interests and happiness. She acts upon the existence of the principles, that, in pursuit of happiness, "the powers of Government may be re-assumed by the people whensoever it shall become necessary;" that "men are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that, among these, are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness;" "to secure these rights Governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that, whenever any form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it." South Carolina, as a State, and by her constituted authorities, desires a reduction of the tariff; she declares the system destructive of their interests and happiness; if the Congress attempt to enforce the tariff by military power, the people of South Carolina say they will re-assume the powers delegated by them to the Federal Government. For this critical state of things, the Senate have two propositions: the one to modify the tariff so as to give peace and happiness; the other to authorize the employment of the army, navy, and militia, against South Carolina, to make war upon her people; to extort, by force of arms, submission to a system destructive of their happiness. If we choose the former, we act in accordance with sound policy, and pursue the end and aim for which Governments are instituted; if we choose the latter, we make war upon the principles contained in our declaration of independence, upon the unalienable rights of man. Should an American Senate long debate which of the two to choose? "Has reason fled to brutish beasts?" Has avarice and selfishness supplanted patriotism and love of the Union? Has power intoxicated its possessors? Was the declaration of independence an idle rant? Have the sublime, self-evident truths announced in that declaration been changed, by political alchymy, into fiction and criminal falsehood?

To my mind, South Carolina has acted rashly, precipitantly. She was proceeding to an extreme before the prospect of redress and conciliation was closed, before the expectation of justice from the action of the Federal Government should have ended in despair. I feel the better authorized to say so, because five other States, who have made common cause with her in remonstrating against the unconstitutionality, injustice, and oppression of the system, who profess the doctrines of the resolutions of Virginia and Kentucky of 1798 and 1799, have yet hopes of a returning sense of justice and conciliation in the Federal Legislature, and especially in the body of the people of the States, whose representatives have hitherto prevented a reduction of the imposts to the just standard of revenue. To my mind, her legislative acts bear the impress of an overheated zeal, rather than that of cool collected judgment and discretion. It is due to candor that I should say thus much in disapprobation of the proceedings of South Carolina. It is due, also, to the great conservative principles of State rights and State interposition, to arrest the progress of usurpation, which I advocate. I desire, for myself, to take care that this holy text shall receive no detriment in public opinion by the conduct of an humble disciple and true believer, which might be if I should acknowledge bad works as illustrations of the true faith. But if South Carolina has been rash, precipitate, and indiscreet, can those indiscretions operate by way of an enlargement of the constitution? Can they disengage and dissolve the obligations of justice due from the federal Union to South Carolina as a member of that Union? If one individual hold an obli-

tion of debt upon another, and the creditor demands payment of the debt in an insolent and indiscreet manner, accompanied by haughty threats, is the debtor thereby absolved from his bond? Does the importunate and indiscreet address of South Carolina for a just reduction of the tariff cancel all obligations of justice due from the Federal Government to South Carolina and the people of the other unoffending States? Shall we persist in refusing to do justice, and seek to hide our iniquity in a war upon South Carolina? Shall she be punished for her precipitancy, by a more precipitate, rash, and indiscreet war upon her? If she has mistaken her measures of redress and relief against the oppressive enactments of the General Government, shall we treat her with a rigor, precipitancy, and haste, which is unusual in our intercourse with foreign nations? Shall we proceed to extremities with a sister State if she is in error, without those preliminaries which would be due to a foreign nation? We have treated the wrongs and aggressions committed by foreign nations with forbearance; we have negotiated with patience; we have trusted to a returning sense of justice, and ultimate reparation. Having so treated foreign nations, we had a right to expect similar forbearance on their part. Against Great Britain we had causes of complaint for non-execution of the articles of the treaty of 1783; we negotiated with forbearance, and never obtained a delivery of the military posts occupied within our limits until after the treaty of 1794. Some subjects of difference, growing out of the treaty of 1783, remain unadjusted to this day. We agreed to submit a question as to a part of the boundary intended to be described and defined in that treaty to the arbitrium of the King of the Netherlands; he made his award; Great Britain was willing to abide the award; we refused, and proffered further negotiation. In so refusing, we acted upon these principles:

1st. That in submitting the difference between us and Great Britain to the umpirage of the King of the Netherlands, we had not conferred on him the sole and exclusive power to judge of the extent of the power delegated.

2d. That, as a party, we had the right to judge for ourselves whether the award exceeded the power delegated in the submission.

3d. That, in our judgment, the award was not obligatory, because the arbitrator had exceeded the powers delegated, by making a new boundary, instead of deciding what was the boundary intended by the description in the treaty of 1783.

Under our example, South Carolina, as a party concerned in the execution of the agreement between the States to delegate certain limited powers, to form a more perfect union, and amend their Government, claims, 1st. That, by the agreement, she did not confer on the General Government the sole and exclusive power to judge the extent of the powers delegated and the powers not delegated. 2d. That, as a party, she has the right to judge for herself whether the power of protection to manufactures was delegated to the General Government, or reserved to the States. 3d. That the power of such protection was not delegated, but reserved; that the protective system exercised by Congress is a usurpation, and the act of Congress founded on such usurpation is not a law, not obligatory, but null and void. With Great Britain, we proceeded by negotiation to obtain the delivery of posts withheld from us. For injuries, by impressment of our seamen, for her attack on our frigate Chesapeake, and her aggressions on our commerce under her orders in council, we negotiated with patience; we tried embargo, and non-intercourse, and negotiation, until patience was exhausted, and all hope of redress was extinguished, before we resorted to war.

With France, with Spain, with Sweden, with Naples, we have waited with patience, and negotiated, until by mutual deference, conciliation, and compromise, our differences were adjusted. In all these negotiations and forbearances we did but our duty. Nations are bound by a moral code, by moral precepts, by the principles of natural justice. Individuals are moral beings, bound by moral ties: in entering into social and political compacts, and dividing themselves into nations and States, they do not divest themselves of moral obligations. States and nations are but aggregated individuals. The great Author of all has bound nation to nation, State to State, potentate to potentate, individual to individual, by mutual relations, mutual wants, and mutual obligations. Man is bound by his nature and Creator to be a moral and a social being. Justice and mercy are attributes of God himself. Divine justice is administered with mercy through the Savior of mankind. Nations can no more escape and absolve themselves from the moral element, from their moral duties and obligations of justice and mercy, than they can escape from the natural elements of earth and air.

All States, potentates, and sovereigns are bound by a circle of morals, including the obligations of justice and mercy, reciprocally acting and reacting. War is the exercise of violence by sovereign command, and is an evil, come when it may; but it may be the choice of a lesser evil. Every sovereign is morally bound to avoid war by all reasonable precautions. If wrong be done by a sovereign, he is bound to make reparation. This obligation draws to it the rights to be informed of the extent of the injury, to be heard in explanation, and, in mutual conference and negotiation, to adjust the nature and quantum of reparation. A potentate who begins and prosecutes an offensive war against another potentate, cannot be justified but by the concurrence of injury committed, and satisfaction refused. Accordingly, wars are denominated just or unjust, moral or immoral, civilized or savage, as these ingredients of violated right, demand of reparation and refusal, shall have been observed, or neglected, or abused. Duly regarding these sacred obligations to avoid war by all reasonable efforts, the United States have been forbearing, patient in negotiations, and always ready to accommodate. Even the mistaken insurgents of Pennsylvania were not pursued with violence by President Washington until messengers of peace had been sent in vain; even the deluded victims of Spanish gold and Spanish intrigue in Kentucky were honored by a messenger to explain and quiet their discontents.

Why shall South Carolina be treated in a style and manner so totally variant from the usage of the Government towards foreign nations? She is a nation, a State. Yes, sir, a high-minded, chivalrous, gallant State, of noble bearing in peace and in war. Her people are renowned for valor and daring enterprise in two wars; famed for generosity, for intellectual and moral cultivation. She has contributed freely and generously in deeds and money, in times of war and of peace; she has furnished her full proportion of talents, and learning, and virtue to the departments of Government, State and federal. Her errors lean to virtue's side. They spring from high intellectual cultivation; from a sense of justice; from a hatred to injustice and oppression; from that enthusiastic devotion to liberty which they have so often displayed in council, and by flood and field.

Why shall we, who have been so patient and forbearing with foreign nations, be now so impatient and eager to rush into battle with a sister State? Has confidence of our strength, and of her weakness, sharpened our courage and blunted our sense of justice?

We have been told that, whether force shall or shall not be used, depends on South Carolina; that if she recalls her ordinance and her laws, there will be no resort to force. This does not satisfy my judgment of our obligations of duty. By this bill, the destinies of the Union will be put at the hazard of exasperated feelings, of heated partisans, of personal resentments, of accidents, of imprudent wicked tale-bearers and mischief-makers. Suppose I should put a magazine of powder in my domicile, with a train, exposed to the daily occurrences of my household; a heedless servant applies a torch; my house is torn asunder and scattered in fragments; my household mangled, and the neighboring buildings wrapt in flames; would I be excused in my own conscience because I had not applied the match? Could I meet the reproaches of my neighbors by impudently telling them, "thou canst not say that I did it?"

This bill provides a dangerous magazine, with trains exposed to the matches of the imprudent, the malicious, the wicked; and we are told that there is no danger in this; it depends on South Carolina. Well, sir, is there no exasperation there? Is this bill not calculated to create higher exasperation? Must it not stimulate the one party to defiance of the authorities of South Carolina; and the majority to indignation at the attempt to place the military above the civil power? That this power conferred upon the President to call out the whole physical force—army, navy, and militia, without stint; to put down by force the Legislature of a State, is too dangerous to be conferred on any individual, I will prove by the high authority of President Jackson himself. It cannot be disguised that, by the letter and spirit of treaties, the United States did undertake to guaranty to the Cherokees their possessions of lands held, in part, within the State of Georgia, until the Indians should choose to sell to the United States. By the laws of the United States, the President was authorized to expel, by force, settlers upon the Indian lands. The treaty and law of the United States and the law of Georgia were in conflict. The President of the United States was called upon, by a resolution of the Senate, for information if the white settlers upon Indian lands within the State of Georgia had been removed, as required by the laws of the United States; and, if not, why the laws had not been executed? This resolution was answered by the President in his message of 23d February, 1831. In that, he assigns for cause of not expelling the settlers from the Indian lands, that the Indians within the State of Georgia are subject to the jurisdiction and control of Georgia; that Georgia had declared her determination to execute her own laws throughout her own limits." And he therein comes to the conclusion that the Federal Government has no right to drive off persons who have been settled upon the Indian lands within the State of Georgia, under the authority of the laws of Georgia; that the law of the United States authorizing the President to employ military force to drive off settlers, ought not to be construed to extend to the settlers in Georgia. He says: "to maintain a contrary doctrine, and to require the Executive to enforce it by the employment of military force, would be to place in his hands a power to make war upon the rights of the States and the liberties of the country; a power which should be placed in the hands of no individual."

By that message, to put down State rights and State laws by military force, under color of a treaty and a law of the United States, was "war;" "to make war upon the rights of the States and the liberties of the country" was a power "which should be placed in the hands of no individual."

I do, in the sincerity of my heart, and in the clearest conviction of my judgment, concur with the President; that, to employ military force to put down persons acting under State laws, is war; that a power to make such war is too great to be confided to the discretion of any individual. And I do believe that this bill confers upon the President a discretionary power to make war.

I may be accused of characterizing this bill too harshly. I entreat Senators to read it, and to reflect upon the state of facts. Is not that which is authorized to be done by the employment of military force, to be in opposition to the ordinance and laws of South Carolina, and to be preceded by a proclamation of the President? Is not this proclamation authorized to be issued upon contingencies, upon events not yet existing, and upon a state of things very uncertainly described? Is not the President to be the judge when that state of things has occurred? Thus, a discretion is conferred upon the President, which, to his mind, was inordinate, and inconsistent with sound legislation. But when the President shall feel himself authorized to apply the military force, he must issue orders to others, to distant officers, not under the immediate eye and control of the President, not acting under the immediate discretion and responsibility of the President, but under their own judgment and construction of their orders. Whenever this military force shall be applied in pursuance of this law against South Carolina, it will be employed in a conflict between that which is declared for law by the Congress of the United States, and that which is declared for law by the convention and Legislature of South Carolina. It will be the employment of the military to put down, forcibly, State authority and State law; a conflict between States, in a dispute about the extent of their respective powers and jurisdictions. If such a conflict, urged by military force, is not war, I cannot understand the definition of war. I am opposed to such a war. I am opposed to transferring from the Congress to the President the power to proclaim such a war. I am opposed to such legislation, and have raised my voice against it, but I fear but too feebly to command respect.

Mr. B. said it seemed to him, that, on looking at this law, and comparing it with one which had been stamped with public odium and execration, they appeared to be very similar in their provisions. He alluded to the sedition law, which had been put down by the people in the majesty of their power. This bill was too much like the one he had designated in many of its features.

He had another objection to this bill. He had a dislike to prison ships. He had heard too much of the Jersey prison ship, and he wanted no South Carolina prison ship. Yet there was a section in this bill which gave authority to the marshal to confine prisoners in houses, dwellings, or other places. Other places! Why was he not authorized to use the fort, or some place which was more distinctly described, so as to be on land, and not on the water? The custom-houses are authorized to be kept on board of ships; and he supposed the intention of the bill is to authorize that prisoners shall also be kept on board of ships as prisons; and, for aught he knew, tried there; for he did not know to what jurisdiction it was proposed to transfer them, after South Carolina, her Legislature, executive, judiciary, and citizens, shall be proclaimed rebels and traitors. He desired to enter his protest against these prison ships; and he entreated the Judiciary Committee not to stamp the bill with so odious a character.

The bill was also objectionable in his view, because it looked too much like the riot act, named by many in Great Britain the "black act." There was nothing defining the number of persons necessary to constitute a riot. It was not stated whether the persons assembled must be armed, for the bill used the phraseology, "armed, or in any other manner." He here read an extract from Blackstone; page 142, describing the riot act. If the present bill was not an act of war, he could not but regard it as a riotous—he begged pardon, he meant a riot act; operating, like the British act, to quell a riot, without defining, as that act did, what was a riot. It was left to the discretion of the President to define it, and to execute his definition by the military; to officers of the army the execution of offenders is to be intrusted. Offenders are to be shot down, not because any act of Congress has defined the crime to be eschewed, but it is hereafter to be defined by proclamation, and by the instructions to officers how to execute the proclamation, and what shall be considered an intention to resist the laws.

It appeared to him that Congress had not the constitutional power to pass this bill, and, if they had, that it would be by no means expedient to pass it, and thus to assert their power by inflicting war upon a State, and by placing a magazine where an unguarded torch from an unguarded hand might set the whole in a blaze. If Congress had the power, he would not consent to make war on a sister State for a mistake. He would first take the beam out of his own eye, that he might see to take the mote out of that of South Carolina.

Instead of passing this bill, he wished the Senate to act in that spirit of amity, and conciliation, and compromise, which gave rise to the federal constitution. The constitution was made in that spirit. In that spirit it was conceived and brought forth. And that was the vital spark that animated it. It was the life-blood of the constitution itself; and if they consented to spill that, they would spill it for all political purposes, as fatally as when the stab of the dagger lets out the heart's blood of man, causing the most excruciating agony and death. He would throw aside all constitutional grounds, and go, on the score of policy, into the discussion of the tariff bill, which was the great cause of complaint in South Carolina. No policy could be sound which was not bottomed on the principles of justice. He could not conceive how that could be sound which was bottomed on injustice and oppression. On such basis the Union itself could not last.

It is recorded in history, that one of the Roman provinces revolted again and again. At last, after their general and a great number of their Senate and people had been killed or taken, the province sent ambassadors to Rome. A Senator asked them what punishment they deserved? The embassy answered, "the same which they deserve who think themselves worthy of liberty." The consul asked how long the peace might be expected to endure, if the punishment was remitted? The ambassadors answered, "If the terms you give be just, the peace will be observed by us faithfully and perpetually; if unjust, it will endure only until we return and make them known." "Si bonam dederitis, fidem et perpetuam; si malam, haud diuturnam." The Senate approved the answers as worthy of freemen; and confessing that no men or nation would continue under oppression longer than compelled by force, said, "they only were fit to be Romans who thought nothing valuable without liberty;" upon which they were all made citizens of Rome, and obtained whatever the embassy desired.

This noble example is worthy to be imitated by an American Senate. Let us give ear to the complaints of South Carolina. Let us give them justice, not war. They who contend zealously for the principles of civil liberty are worthy to be citizens of the United States. They are not fit subjects to be denounced and accursed. The pressure of calamities, the power of arms, may subdue a State to submit to injustice; but she will seize the first occasion to assert her rights and secure her independence. Let us go into an examination and revision of the tariff. Let us reason with South Carolina. Let us treat her as a sister. Let us act as every generous individual would act in a consciousness of his own superior strength, and under the obligations of justice. Can superior strength change the nature of right? Can war dissolve the adamantine chains which bind us to the ever-during throne of justice and of mercy? It does not necessarily follow that every disagreement about the terms and fulfillment of a compact is to be followed by war. Shall we treat a State, one of the mothers of the Union, with less courtesy and forbearance than we show to a foreign nation? Shall we make war against our own doctrines, and belie our own declaration of principles? Let us recollect the gallant spirit of South Carolina, and her noble deeds in our war for freedom and independence. Let us recollect that the discontents against the tariff are not confined to South Carolina, but extend far and wide. South Carolina does but assert the principles of freedom as contained in the declaration of independence, as she understands them. If she has been rash and precipitate, let us recollect she has been long smarting under the rod of injustice and oppression. He whose cause is just may look to Heaven for protection; but the blood of our brethren, spilt in an unjust war against South Carolina, will rise from earth to heaven, and, like the blood of Abel spilt by Cain, cause a mark of infamy to be set upon us by Divine Justice. It is incumbent on us to act cautiously, prudently, justly, and with the forbearance of children to a natural parent. This Government is the offspring of the States. Implore the Senate not to consent that this Government shall raise a parricidal hand against one of its parents; a sacrilegious arm against the fairest fabric of human liberty which Heaven has vouchsafed to mankind; and thus stamp our history with infamy; "dishonor and betray the fairest experiment in favor of the rights of man, and expose their patrons to be insulted and silenced by the votaries of tyranny and usurpation."

Had I the powers of persuasion, I would inculcate upon the Senate the importance, and lead them to the observance, of the divine precept of the Savior of mankind, who commanded us to hope and pray for forgiveness of our trespasses, "as we forgive those who trespass against us." Let us remember that nations and individuals are all amenable to that Eternal Fountain of truth and justice from which this benign precept emanated; and, on that great and solemn day when nations and men shall be summoned to judgment, they must expect to be forgiven as they have forgiven others.

The errors of South Carolina spring not from love of vice or injustice, but from love of justice and virtuous liberty: from the pursuit of "justice," "general welfare," and security "of the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity," which are the ends and aim of the constitution, as expressly declared in its preamble.

That the Ruler of the universe, in his infinite wisdom, mercy, and goodness, may incline us to cultivate that spirit of amity, mutual deference, and concession, which the peculiarity of our political situation renders indispensable to our prosperity, safety, union, and happiness, ought now, especially, to be the prayer of every true American. For myself, I do most heartily desire that the harmony and consolidation of the Union, together with the blessings of liberty, may be secured and perpetuated.

Mr. B. having closed, a motion was made by Mr. SMITH to postpone the further consideration of the bill, and to make it the special order for to-morrow; but on the suggestion of Mr. GRUNDY, that unless the progress of the bill should be expedited, there was no prospect of getting it through,

Mr. SMITH withdrew his motion.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN then obtained the floor. He said that this bill presented to the Senate a most interesting and momentous question. The Chief Magistrate of the United States has, by a special message, applied for legislative aid to enable him faithfully to execute the laws of the United States. He has in that message distinctly represented to Congress the state of things in the country which has rendered it impracticable, without the aid of some means beyond those which are within the reach of the Executive arm alone, to execute the laws. He has, therefore, as his duty requires him to do, applied to Congress to strengthen the Executive arm to enable him to meet the present exigency, and to put down the resistance against the United States which is meditated by one of the States of this Union. With a view to the better understanding of the situation in which the Executive finds himself, I will read (said Mr. F.) a sentence from his message, which will be found in the fourth paragraph on the seventeenth page, which follows a description in detail of the circumstances and acts adverted to.

"Under these circumstances, and the provisions of the acts of South Carolina, the execution of the laws is rendered impracticable, even through the ordinary judicial tribunals of the United States."

In order that the subject should be presented to the Senate with all the solemnity due to its importance, Mr. F. then referred to the third section of the second article of the constitution, which defines, in the following words, the duties of the President: "He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." That is his duty. The duty of Congress is pointed out with equal distinctness in the eighth section. They are "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections," &c. This is their duty.

This brief allusion to the sacred charter of our country, and to the message of the President, he considered as sufficient to sustain him in the view that a solemn crisis in the history of the country had arrived, when Congress has been informed by the Chief Executive officer that resistance to the laws has assumed an attitude so formidable as to prevent him from carrying them into execution, and compelled him to call on the legislative branches to execute their oaths, and fulfil the obligations imposed upon them by their station, to enable him to discharge his own conscience and to preserve the peace and integrity of the Union.

He had but a single answer to make to the whole of the charges which had been made against the friends of the bill, of an intention to go to war against South Carolina, and to urge the country to the brink of confusion and disunion. All I shall say in reply to these charges, (said Mr. F.) is, that we are legislating to enable the Chief Magistrate to execute the laws according to the obligations of his oath. We make no war against South Carolina; we provoke no collision; we do nothing further than is required to acquit ourselves of the duty we owe to ourselves, to our country, and our Maker. If the Senate will but examine this bill with care, they will find that throughout the whole of its provisions this one object is steadily kept in view—to enable the President to execute the laws. And I am yet to learn, continued Mr. F., whether an unauthorized and tumultuous assemblage of individuals, whether acting of themselves, or under the authority of a State, whose object is hostile to the constitution of the United States, and to the Chief Magistrate, and to the laws, is not to be put down, without incurring the charge of making war against a State. If war shall follow the measures thus adopted, we shall be free from the guilt of it; if the stain of war is to rest on the skirts of any portion of the Senate, ours shall remain unstained.

But it has been argued that as this state of things results from the measures adopted by a State of the Union, any legislation against it is a violation of State authority and of the reserved rights of a State. I must go a little farther back than the gentlemen who have maintained that this Union is a mere federal compact, in which each separate member of the compact is to judge of the extent of obedience due to the laws of the General Government, in which each possesses a right to judge for itself; and that this compact is one without a common judge, being made between States acting in their sovereign capacity, and ratified for all these purposes, and in all these views, by the constitution. All this doctrine I do, in heart and mind, wholly or in part, now and forever, deny. I am convinced, and such would be the verdict of thirteen millions of American citizens, that such a compact as is here described never entered the minds of those who made the constitution. It was the very evils of such a compact that they desired to guard against. It was against the confusion and difficulties arising from this condition of thirteen distinct sovereignties, that they sought a refuge in the constitution which they framed. The argument which is now advanced has a tendency to break up the constitution, and to throw back the American people into a condition worse than that in which they stood under the old confederation.

He had another general remark to make. Whether the constitution be the result of a federal compact, or the result of the actual and declared will of the people, in their primary assemblies, was, in his opinion, a point perfectly immaterial; for, whether intended to be so, or not, it was ratified by the people with all the formalities necessary to make it efficient in its object to give peace and security to the American people. He contended that it could be shown, by a plain construction of the constitution, according to its own provisions, as well as contemporaneous constructions, that the assertion that there was any one provision establishing that it was the work of States in their sovereign character, could not be successfully maintained.

My friend from Kentucky, (continued Mr. F.) by referring to the old confederation, has disclosed all its defects. Under that system, every State was puffed up with the notion of its sovereignty; and that word sovereign had been so magnified and so mystified, that the Government found it impossible to get along. Each State made a stand upon its sovereignty. The General Government wanted revenue, and made its requisitions on the several States for their quota. Some of the States could not, or did not, pay their proportions; and hence arise difficulties which impede the progress of the Government. It was this State pride, this everlasting aspiring of State ambition, which prevented the success of that confederation. It is, said Mr. F., that pernicious spirit which I fear is now at the bottom of all this difficulty, as it was at the bottom of that which obstructed the Government under the old confederation. We ought to be instructed and admonished by the result of the interference of this State pride in that earlier period of our history. It was found necessary to make an effort to amend the constitution, and to strengthen the Federal Government, to enable it to resist the dangerous collisions of these State sovereignties. Delegates were chosen to form a new constitution. Did they meet in the character of sovereign States? Had they their commissions from the sovereign States authorizing them to represent the States? No; these delegates came fresh from the people; they did what they came to do in the name and by the authority of the people; and when they had completed their work and returned to the people, the very form of words to commence the great instrument which they had framed was so selected as to put down forever the delusive idea of State interference and State sovereignty: "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union," &c. It was never dreamed then that this constitution was hereafter to be set up as the handwork of the States as sovereignties.

These sovereignties were all thrown back on the elements of social existence. The people were then the only sovereigns. It was an expression of Chief Justice Jay: "the only sovereigns of the United States are the people; and they are sovereigns without subjects, inasmuch as they have only to govern themselves." After the constitution was framed, what was done? How was this instrument ratified? Was it sent for ratification to the States, in their sovereign capacity? No. There was too much wisdom and prudence, to trust to these sovereignties. They had already given the Government too much trouble under the old confederation. The constitution was sent back to the people for their sanction, and they sustained it. Congress received the report from the convention, and transmitted the amendments to the different Legislatures; and for what purpose? Was it for their ratification as States? No. It was for the purpose of submitting them to delegates who should be chosen from among the people. This fact would be found embodied in the resolution of Congress of October 28, and by the resolution of September 17th, which directed that the amended constitution should be submitted to the convention, for the purpose of assent and ratification by the people themselves. Had it been sent to the State Legislatures for them to ratify, it is probable that they would have adhered to the old confederation. Could it then be argued that the States, acting as States, constructed the present frame of Government?

Mr. CALHOUN said he would, by a simple explanation, save the gentleman from New Jersey some argument. The ground which he (Mr. C.) had taken, was, that the constitution was the work of the people, as separate and sovereign communities, and not as a mass—as a single community. He contended, further, that these sovereignties had reserved to themselves rights upon which they could take their stand to resist any usurpations of the General Government.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN resumed. Either the Senator from South Carolina had been very unfortunate in the development of the abstract propositions which he had thrown out in his resolutions, or he (Mr. F.) was too obtuse to comprehend their precise import. The Senator had said that the sovereignty resided in the States.

Mr. CALHOUN: In the people of the States.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN: I know it is in the people of the States. That admission is all I ask.

Mr. GRUNDY rose to ask if gentlemen ought not to be permitted to go on, and present their argument in their own way, and without interruption? He was disposed to let every man tell his story in his own way.

Mr. CALHOUN: Does the gentleman mean any other than a general reflection?

Mr. GRUNDY: None.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN continued. This assertion of sovereignty was the plea in bar of the gentleman from South Carolina; and if he now surrendered that ground, and the only argument presented was whether the Government was framed by the people in States, and in separate communities, or by the people as one community, there was no longer any thing left to contend about.

But my duty, continued Mr. F., is not confined to merely noticing the series of political abstractions contained in the resolutions of the gentleman from South Carolina. He had to reply mainly, as he had been replying, to the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky. [Mr. CALHOUN said he thought the gentleman from New Jersey was replying to him, or he should not have interrupted him.] I was saying, said Mr. F., that this constitution was ratified by the people, and not by the States. The Senator from Kentucky had contended that the ratification was by the States. It had been said that Massachusetts came in as a State, and ratified the constitution as a State. Here Mr. F. referred to the language of the ratification by Massachusetts and the other States. In the very terms of these ratifications it is declared, from the beginning to the end, that it was done by the people. It was all done by the authority of the people; by the delegates of the people. But we had been told that all this was done by the sovereign States; that it was the work of the State sovereignties. To show this, a reference had been made to the ratification of New Jersey; and it had been suggested that it was the work of the State of New Jersey—of the State, acting in its sovereign capacity. Now, there was nothing in the ratification of New Jersey or any of the other States, to sanction any such impression. The reason for submitting the amendments to the people in the different States was because the people had been originally divided into separate colonies; otherwise, they would have been submitted to the whole people at once. But they were sent to the people, in their separate communities, because it was the most convenient and the most rapid mode of obtaining the sense of the whole people. The amendments were sent to the State of New Jersey, but they were not submitted for ratification to the Governor, and Council, and the House of Assembly, but to the people acting in their primary assemblies. What did the convention do? They were chosen for the purposes stated, for the simple purpose of deliberating on the provisions of the constitution and ratifying it. They carried into effect the resolution of the convention of 1787, which ran thus:

“Resolved, That the preceding constitution be laid before the United States in Congress assembled; and that it is the opinion of this convention, that it should afterwards be submitted to a convention of delegates chosen in each State by the people thereof, under the recommendation of its Legislature, for their assent and ratification,” &c.

In every State where it was ratified, it was done by the people, or by delegates specially elected for that purpose, acting in the name and with the authority of the people.

And what was this work, which embodied so much labor and virtue, as to attract the admiration of the whole civilized world? What does it propose to accomplish? “To form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.” Every noble object which had been the aim of any Government since the foundation of the world was embraced in this summary; harmony, justice, peace at home, domestic security, the happiness of our fireside, and the safety of the whole. Yet, what are all these, said Mr. F., if we are to believe the abstractions of the gentlemen on the other side, which regard this as a mere federal compact, not a Government; as such a sorry thing, that, according to the theory of the gentleman from South Carolina, there is not a being who breathes its atmosphere, and moves about its soil, that owes it any allegiance? All allegiance, according to these theories, is due to the States. It is a mere compact, the benefits of which each State may enjoy just as long as it pleases, and no longer. But it ought to be remembered by those who take this view, that this compact has conferred power on the Federal Government to make war, to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a navy, to declare the punishment of treason, &c. Yet we are told that no mortal man owes to this Government any allegiance. Was ever so absurd a proposition advanced in seriousness? The Federal Government may hang for treason; yet we are to be told that there is not an individual enjoying its protection that owes it any allegiance! What is treason? Must we go back to law books to learn the common meaning of language? He had always been taught that treason could not exist without allegiance.

The provisions of the constitution looked to two distinct Governments: while in their primary assemblies the people framed a constitution which should give to the Congress and the Federal Executive power over the general interests of the whole, and the commercial relations and foreign intercourse, they also committed their domestic concerns to the State Governments. But the federal representation was distinct from that of the State, as may be seen by reference to the 1st clause of the second section of the 1st article of the constitution, which declares that “the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States,” &c. Does this appear like a delegation of power on the part of the State sovereignties? Reference had been made to the case of last session concerning the Maine boundary question. That was a case which was easily comprehended. The arbitrator had exceeded his powers in the award which he made, and the Senate had refused to confirm it. All this was easy to be understood. But when it was contended that this great work of the people was a mere powerless compact, he must confess that it was a proposition beyond his comprehension. Here are legislative powers expressly given and defined by the constitution; here are executive powers vested in a Chief Magistrate: here is a judiciary department to be administered by judges to be appointed in a certain mode. What else is requisite to make this compact a powerful Government? Each Government moves in its own prescribed sphere, and there is a representation of the people in the State Legislatures, as well as a representation of them in Congress. The State of South Carolina makes her elections in the fall. She elects them both to Congress and to the State Legislature: one set of representatives stops at her capital, and the other continues on to this place. What difference is there in their obligations and their responsibilities? They all owe the same amount of allegiance to the people by whom they were elected. The people never intended so to act as to prevent the establishment of an efficient and an undivided Government.

Although the gentleman from Kentucky had argued that this is merely a federal compact, he had admitted that we have the power of making laws. The Senator, who had pushed this doctrine further than he had ever before heard it pushed, still grants that we have the power to make laws. Now, said Mr. F., I ask nothing more. That admission gives all power. What is meant by making laws? It is not to give advice, but to enact statutes for the protection of society and the punishment of crime. What power exercises judicial authority in the State of South Carolina? In matters concerning only the citizens of her own State, her own judiciary exercises jurisdiction. The power of the federal judiciary is expressly defined in the constitution. It extends "to all cases in law and equity, arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and the treaties made or which shall be made under their authority;" also "to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States, between a State and citizens of another State, between citizens of different States," &c. "Controversies between two or more States." Yet gentlemen say that the Government of the United States has no power over the States, while they possess all power. Sir, said Mr. F., the constitution intended to humble this proud State sovereignty, to prevent the States from encroaching upon each other, as well as to prevent any collisions between them and the United States. But we have already had an exposition, in the case of a citizen of Georgia, who instituted suit against a State, and brought it before the Supreme Court, where it was argued; and the court, in an unanswerable argument, decided that a citizen could bring suit against a sovereign State. This led to an amendment of the constitution on this point. Yet the 11th article in the amendments only limits the power of the federal judiciary as regards a suit "against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State." As to the other powers vested in the judiciary in controversies between two or more States, &c., they were all left undisturbed.

At this point of his remarks, Mr. F. yielded to a motion for adjournment, and the Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 2.

The bill to provide further for the collection of the duties on imports again coming up—

Mr. PRELINGHUYSEN resumed his remarks: When the Senate adjourned yesterday, said Mr. F., I was referring to the acts of Congress organizing the judiciary of the United States, and thereby preserving, in full spirit and energy, the principle that the laws and the constitution of the United States shall be considered the supreme law of the land. This provision of the constitution, and the legislation upon it, constitute an impregnable fortress, against which speculation and sophistry will spend their force in vain. There is no tyro in the schools, there is not an honest independent yeoman who tills our soil, who cannot comprehend the whole argument on this subject. Any man, when he finds that the laws of Congress are the supreme law of the land, and finds laws carrying out this provision, knows where sovereignty is placed by the constitution a thousands times better than all the abstract propositions in the world would teach him. The people are not to be speculated out of their senses, and of this we have had a recent and very satisfactory assurance. The principles of the proclamation were greeted with almost universal approbation throughout the land; no paper, except the Declaration of Independence, had ever been received by the people with more heartfelt satisfaction; none need be, except that sacred instrument; for in those by-gone days, there were many discordant voices heard amid the general rejoicing. But now there is but one voice, from Georgia to Maine, with the exception of that which comes from a single quarter. Who can fail to bless God that the people are thus true to the principles of their fathers, and are thus ready to protect and maintain the work of their fathers? If nullification receive not its condemnation in our days, I know, said Mr. F., it will receive the execration of all posterity.

Why was it that, in our constitution, the State judiciary was required to regard the authority of the laws of Congress as supreme? Why was it that in the 25th section of the judiciary act, an appeal from the State to the federal courts is granted? The fathers of the constitution knew no other way to support the supremacy of the laws of Congress than this. They provided that all questions arising under the constitution should be referred to and decided by the judicial department of the Government. They, with that temperate wisdom which characterizes all their acts, suffer the disputed questions to go from court to court. They try the judicial conscience of every court; and if the State tribunal decides unconstitutionally, the Supreme Court of the United States has power to reverse their decision. No argument which he could urge would add to the weight which those wise provisions would have in settling this question. They prove the high regard which our fathers had for this principle of the constitution, and their extreme anxiety to preserve and perpetuate it.

As a matter of history, it would be interesting to look at the circumstances attending the passage of the judiciary bill. In what we sometimes call the popular branch of Congress, in the House of Representatives, it met with such unanimous support, that the yeas and nays were not called for when the question was taken. In the Senate, where the bill originated, fourteen voted in the affirmative, and six in the negative. Three of the negatives were from the South, and three from the North. Two of the Southern negatives were from the Senators from the State of Virginia. But he was persuaded that the opposition of Virginia to the bill did not arise from any objection to this mode of preserving the constitution and laws. Virginia opposed all the provisions of the judiciary system, as we organized it, from objections which she had to the form, not to the object of its establishment. That the Commonwealth of Virginia did not oppose the principle that the Supreme Court of the United States is the arbiter in the last resort, he would show, from a previous piece of history, which he took great satisfaction in bringing before the Senate. former times, to contemplate those acts of our predecessors, which have illustrated their own and our fame, was always pleasing and profitable; and it was with great satisfaction that he could bring up, on this occasion, the voice of good old Virginia in favor of the constitution; and he hoped it would put down forever those speculations which would ruin the constitution, and defeat the hopes of the world. The opinion of Virginia, to which he should refer, was given at an interesting time. The State of Pennsylvania, one of the proudest States of the Union, (he meant no invidious distinction, she was one of the largest, wealthiest, and most powerful of the States,) the State of Pennsylvania had determined, in the Olmstead case, to resist the decision of the United States court, and to resist it unto blood. The Legislature went so far as to pass laws to call out the militia to resist the federal process. The judiciary went on in its quiet steady way. Notice was given to the marshal and to the President, that the State of Pennsylvania would resist the process, but there was no flinching in that day. The marshal was ordered to execute the law and the decree of the court. An order was given to imprison the defendants. Even gallantry was overlooked, (for ladies were the defendants;) and, in a case where the life of the constitution was at hazard, they would not even stop for them, and the issue was about to be tried by arms. Pennsylvania, at this point, was patriotic and prudent enough to retire, and give up the contest. Notice was given to the marshal to make up the debt and costs, and the amount was forthwith paid. Pennsylvania would not, at the last pinch, encounter the constitution. Many patriots appeared then, and offered to devote themselves to the cause, and to die in the last ditch. The same language was used then, as we hear from South Carolina now. But Pennsylvania had too much patriotism to push her opposition to the extremity of war. She gave up the point, and proposed an amendment to the constitution, for the establishment of a tribunal to settle all disputes between the Government and the States. She took the advice of Virginia, and recorded her response as follows:

"Preamble and resolutions on the proposition of Pennsylvania to amend the constitution of the United States:

"The committee to whom was referred the communication of the Governor of Pennsylvania, covering certain resolutions of the Legislature of that State, proposing an amendment to the constitution of the United States, by the appointment of an impartial tribunal to decide disputes between the State and federal judiciary, have had the same under their consideration, and are of opinion that a tribunal is already provided by the constitution of the United States, to wit, the Supreme Court, more eminently qualified from their habits and duties, from the mode of their selection, and from the tenure of their offices, to decide the disputes aforesaid in an enlightened and impartial manner, than any other tribunal which could be erected.

"The members of the Supreme Court are selected from those in the United States, who are most celebrated for virtue and legal learning; not at the will of a single individual, but by the concurrent wishes of the President and Senate of the United States; they will therefore have no local prejudices and partialities.

"The duties they have to perform lead them necessarily to the most enlarged and accurate acquaintance with the jurisdiction of the federal and several State courts together, and with the admirable symmetry of our Government.

"The tenure of their offices enables them to pronounce the sound and correct opinions they may have formed, without fear, favor, or partiality.

"The amendment to the constitution proposed by Pennsylvania seems to be founded upon the idea that the Federal Judiciary will, from a lust of power, enlarge their jurisdiction, to the total annihilation of the jurisdiction of the State courts; that they will exercise their will instead of the law and the constitution.

"This argument, if it proves any thing, would operate more strongly against the tribunal proposed to be created, which promises so little, than against the Supreme Court, which, for the reasons given before, had every thing connected with their appointment calculated to ensure confidence. What security have we, were the proposed amendments adopted, that this tribunal would not substitute their will and their pleasure in the place of the law? The judiciary are the weakest of the three departments of Government, and least dangerous to the political rights of the constitution. They hold neither the purse nor the sword, and even to enforce their own judgment and decrees must ultimately depend upon the Executive arm. Should the federal judiciary, however, unmindful of their weakness, unmindful of the duty which they owe to themselves and their country, become corrupt, and transcend the limits of their jurisdiction, would the proposed amendment oppose even a probable barrier in such an improbable state of things?

"The creation of a tribunal such as is proposed by Pennsylvania, so far as we are enabled to form an idea of it from a description given in the resolutions of the Legislature of that State, would, in the opinion of your committee, tend rather to invite than prevent a collision between the federal and State courts. It might also become, in process of time, a serious and dangerous embarrassment to the operations of the General Government.

"Resolved, therefore, That the Legislature of this State do disapprove of the amendment to the constitution of the United States proposed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania.

"Resolved, also, That his excellency the Governor be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit forthwith a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to each of the Senators and Representatives of this State in Congress, and to the Executive of the several States in the Union, with a request that the same may be laid before the Legislature thereof.

"January 23, 1810.—Agreed to, unanimously, by the House of Delegates.

"January 26, 1810.—Agreed to by the Senate, unanimously."

This doctrine is as sound as pure gold seven times tried. Here is the very issue which South Carolina seeks to try. Pennsylvania called out her militia to uphold her sovereignty, and in a well-advised hour retracted her appeal to force, and proposed an amendment to the constitution, for the purpose of effecting her object. But good old Virginia respected the wisdom of our fathers, and declared that the constitution which they had provided could not be bettered by amendments. She refused to sanction an amendment which would dispense with the judiciary of the United States. Now, Mr. President, in this view of the subject, what a most admirable system of Government is ours. It is not to be wondered at that tyrants and the friends of power all over the world look at it with envy and jealousy. We cannot but perceive that, by the General and State Governments, each acting in their respective spheres, the principles of liberty must ever be preserved. New York cannot infringe upon the rights of Pennsylvania, nor Pennsylvania upon the rights of Virginia. The States cannot come into conflict with each other, nor can the General Government interfere with the rights and jurisdiction of the several States. But as we have great interests in common, the wisdom of our predecessors provided a sovereignty, above that of the several States, to attend to the common interests. This constitution was watched over with sleepless vigilance, as he hoped it always would be, and effectually guarded against all encroachments. What can the General Government do to prostrate the liberties of the States, when twenty-four of those States support it and continue its existence and power? Since he had had the honor of a seat here, he had often been sorry to hear the General Government gravely spoken of as an alien excrescence. Our own work, the dearly cherished constitution, bequeathed to us by our fathers, had been scouted at as an odious foreign importation; and the Supreme Court, which keeps in check the different powers of the State and Federal Governments, had been spoken of as a thing down below which the sovereign States ought not to submit to. He rejoiced that this subject was now fully before the people. He believed that the crisis had been brought to them, in the benignity of Providence, that they might rally around the constitution, and that tribunal which preserves all the principles of the constitution in purity. How, Mr. President, could we take a single step in the improvement of our condition, without this General Government? Have we not intrusted to it all the concerns of commerce, the collection of the revenue, the vast concerns of the public lands, our Indian relations, &c.? How can we take a single step to preserve our great common interests, if the State sovereignties can annul our acts at pleasure? Suppose a case of war waged by us, in defence of our national rights, against a foreign nation. If three or four ill-advised States can throw themselves on their sovereignty, refuse to take part in the war, and nullify the acts declaring it, our country, instead of being a name and a praise among nations, would become a name of reproach, and subject to the contempt of the whole civilized world. He would much rather go back to the old confederation, in which each State was bound, in honor, to pay its quota towards the public exigencies. Nothing can give us security for a single hour against State nullification.

He had said, with submission, that the Supreme Court was intended by the constitution to be the great arbiter in regard to questions within and without the powers conferred upon it. In answer to this, it was said, suppose the Supreme Court transcends its powers? He would reply, in the language of Virginia, that we had adopted the best system which we could devise. If it failed in practice, the failure would be owing to the imperfection of all human institutions. No prudent man will push such a supposition to its extremity, and upon the faith of it give up our constitution. Should it fail of its object, we shall have but to mourn over the frailty and insecurity of this as well as of all terrestrial things. What experience has justified the supposition that the authority given to the Supreme Court will be abused? For fifty years we have prospered with it; and the venerable and illustrious man who has given to it high renown in the world, still lives to give it his beneficent energies. The judiciary holds neither the purse nor the sword, and depends wholly upon its moral power, and the aid of other departments of the Government, for the enforcement of its decrees. It is the great peace arbiter. Let us then cherish and support it. Let us select the best men to fill its seats, and we shall have no cause to distrust it. But what is done with the State courts? He put it to South Carolina to answer. She has a constitution and a judiciary. When her Legislature enacts an unconstitutional law, what is done by her citizens? Do some of them call a town meeting and nullify it? No; they put in the plea before the State court, that the law is unconstitutional, and the court decides the question. This had been done in his State a dozen times. The supposition of the Senator from Kentucky was the merest imagination that ever afflicted the human intellect. That Senator's imagination carried him to the extremity of fear. What fear? That Congress would break the constitution, by putting in operation a wicked law. The bill of abominations would come to the Senate, and they would join the other House in the conspiracy against the rights of the people and the States. Then it would go to the Supreme Court. And who were they? They were made, he says, by the Senate, and were impeachable only by the House of Representatives; and therefore they were all of a piece, and might conspire together to defeat the purposes of the constitution and the rights of the States. This general conspiracy draws into its vortex all the reserved rights of the people. Thus far his fears alarmed him. Was it wise, in a grave nation—he spoke in the abstract—to indulge in such violent suppositions? Such imaginations would drive a man to shut himself in a cave, seclude himself from all association with his kind, lest the first man whom he may happen to meet should contrive a plot against his life. Because the judiciary may turn traitors to the Government and the constitution, and the legislative department may support them in their treason, shall we have no Government? Shall we therefore unloose all the bonds of Government, and return, to a state of anarchy? Because fathers may turn tyrants, and mothers prove monsters, shall we abolish those dear relations and extinguish those sacred charities which they enkindle and cherish? Shall we draw rules of civil and social conduct from such violent suppositions? After all, we must confide, to a greater or less extent, in our fellow man; more or less we must trust to others every moment of our lives. Shall we then sit down in inglorious ease, merely because our confidence may be abused? Rather should we use the best means which our Maker has given us to plant such safeguards as we can around our constitution; and if we are not traitors to ourselves, if we dig not our own graves, we shall be free and prosperous.

But it is said, that the judiciary is not competent, from its organization, to settle political controversies. What is meant by political powers? Every power is political to some extent. Did Chief Justice Marshall mean to say, in the speech cited by the Senator from Kentucky, that the judiciary could not decide a question arising out of the tariff laws? Never. His head was too sound for that. Besides, a political speech is not the best authority which can be adduced for judicial opinions. He marvelled not a little when the Senator from Kentucky introduced it as authority. When he came to look at it, he found that it was a speech made in Congress, in high party times, upon a case which involved great political and party excitement at that day—the case of a British subject who was seized as a deserter, given up, and put to death. But he rejoiced to find that the illustrious individual who made the speech referred to was perfectly at home in discussing the subject, and that the views which he took of it displayed the soundness of his head and the purity of his heart. "To come within the description, (of the powers conferred upon the judiciary,) a question must," he says, "assume a legal form, for forensic litigation and judicial decision. There must be parties to come into court, who can be reached by its process and bound by its power; whose rights admit of ultimate decision by a tribunal to which they are bound to submit." The case must have a legal form, and parties, and must be submitted to the court; there are all the forms which are necessary to place it within the powers of the judiciary. When something is to be adjudicated, something to be given and taken away, then the judicial power may be exercised, though the case result from a treaty. In the dispute concerning the northwestern boundary, referred to by the Senator from Kentucky, there were no parties but the two States. But the case made by South Carolina has all the attributes which the doctrine laid down in the speech referred to requires.

The tariff law is individual in its effects, and makes parties by which the case can be submitted to the court. A merchant belonging to New York sojourns in Charleston for commercial purposes. He imports goods from Great Britain. He is required to pay the duties on them.

SENATE.]

Revenue Collection Bill.

This makes a plain case of law, involving a personal claim. The merchant tells the collector that he cannot pay these duties. Why? Here is the law of the United States, says the collector, and I am bound to enforce it. That law has been nullified, replies the merchant; and here is the ordinance of nullification, passed by some citizens of this State who assembled the other day for that purpose. What will be the rejoinder of the officer? He will say, Sir, I act under the authority of the United States, and you must pay the duty. The merchant insists, and pleads in bar of the law the laws of South Carolina. Is there any political question here to which the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court does not extend? Where is the usurpation in this case? On the part of the United States law, or this ordinance?

I have done, continued Mr. F., with this part of the case. For the purpose of keeping all power in check, the judiciary was established. The framers of the constitution hoped to obtain, through it, a peaceful mode for the adjustment of all constitutional questions. In a country of wider extent than all Europe, and embracing under one Government many distinct communities, they hoped to secure perpetual peace and tranquillity by this arbiter of peace. Compare the operation of this peaceful check with the resort to which Europe is accustomed for the preservation of the balance of power. Must we have the sword or the court as our arbiter? Europe has tried the sword, and has shed rivers of blood in the vain pursuit of the balance of power.

We rely upon the peaceful energies of our institutions. Europe on the thunder of her cannon and the clangor of her arms. Poor Holland is about to pay dearly for this balance of power. For two hundred years it has deluged Europe with blood. Here we have it in a peaceful tribunal, by which the tranquillity of the country and the safety of our institutions may be preserved for years to come. Just and certain retribution will come upon those who destroy this peaceful arbiter, and set up the sword in its stead. Here is the system, sir, as I understand it, as I honor it, and as I, with my latest breath, will maintain it. I regard this system as by far the greatest political blessing ever given by Providence to any people. To it I trace all our happiness and prosperity. In this day of our highest prosperity, when our fountains are all full, and our streams running over, do not let a sister State rashly overturn the institutions which are the sources of our happiness. How painful is the crisis which seeks disunion, and which would split us up into disgraced and bleeding fragments. This nullification, if it prevail, will yet meet a tremendous retribution, in the execrations of all future times.

Is not this, continued Mr. F., a plain question, whether the constitution confers the powers claimed upon the Federal Government? He cared not how it was framed; whether the States made it, or the people, in their primary assemblies. How does the bond read? If that gives the power, it is enough; for the instrument was made by competent authority. I cling to the bond with a Shylock's grasp. I care not how it was executed: here is the seal affixed to it. I will exact the last tribute of power which this instrument confers upon the General Government.

It is, after all, continued Mr. F., a delegated power. I maintain that the people intended to act in the business. There was no sovereignty about it, although learned gentlemen were pleased to call this a political convention among sovereignties. I maintain, that as we gave up the old confederation, the people reverted to their primitive powers. They knew what they were about, when, acting on their sovereignty, they clothed this Government with power. There was one class of their interests which it was necessary to cherish and defend at home, and this was committed to the care of their State Executive and Legislature. There was another class, which was commingled with the greater interests of the whole community; these they intrusted to the General Government, which was fully invested by the convention with executive, judicial, and legislative powers. Both were clothed with sufficient power to protect and preserve the general interests. Where was the want of harmony? The Legislature of South Carolina moved in her sphere; the Federal Government moved in its sphere. If either attempt to traverse in the track of the other, the federal judiciary is to check and bring back the one that encroaches. The system is as orderly and as melodious as our planetary system, of which the sun is the centre. It is only when States, in their excessive jealousy, run a tilt against the laws, that disorder can ensue. It is only when States, urged on by an aspiring ambition to thrust their heads against the Federal Government, that the door is opened for collisions. New Jersey was sovereign and independent as to the regulation of her own concerns; but let her beware how she thrusts her head between the Federal Government and its obligations. It would be well for gentlemen to return to their homes, and take care how the State sovereignties again throw themselves across the path of the federal powers.

Reference had been made by the gentleman from Kentucky to the opinions of Judge Marshall as a politician. He wished that gentleman to listen now to the language of the same distinguished individual, sitting as a judge. In either character he was entitled to be listened to with great respect. But he wished now to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky to his opinions, delivered under more solemn circumstances, in his judicial administration, acting under an obligation to prevent the encroachments of these sovereignties upon each other. In a case brought before the Supreme Court, M'Culloch vs. the State of Maryland, it was insisted in argument that this was a mere federal compact between the States as independent sovereignties. Such was the argument: in effect, that this was not a Government, but was to be regarded as only a compact, with certain restricted powers. The argument then was precisely the same as it is now. There was a similar argument also as early as 1792, in 2d Dallas, when there arose a controversy about the powers of the General and State Governments. It was then held that this was a compact between the States, and that the people had nothing to do with it. The opinion given by Judge Marshall in the case M'Culloch vs. the State of Maryland, was so powerful in argument, and disposed of in so able a manner, that he must be permitted to read the following extract:

"In discussing this question, the counsel for the State of Maryland have decreed it of some importance in the construction of the constitution, to consider that instrument not as emanating from the people, but as the act of sovereign and independent States. The powers of the General Government, it has been said, are delegated by the States, who alone are truly sovereign, and must be exercised in subordination to the States, who alone possess supreme dominion.

"It would be difficult to sustain this proposition. The convention which framed the constitution was, indeed, elected by the State Legislatures. But the instrument, when it came from their hands, was a mere proposal, without obligation or pretension to it. It was reported to the existing Congress of the United States, with a request that it might 'be submitted to a convention of delegates, chosen in each State by the people thereof, under the recommendation of its Legislature, for their ratification.' This mode of proceeding was adopted, and by the convention, by Congress, and by the State Legislatures, the instrument was submitted to the people. They acted upon it in the only manner in which they can act safely, effectively, and wisely, on such a subject, by assembling in convention. It is true, they assembled in their several States; and where else should they have assembled? No political dreamer was ever wild enough to think of breaking down the lines which separate the States, and of compounding the American people into one common mass. Of consequence, when they act, they act in their States. But the measures they adopt do not, on that account, cease to be the measures of the people themselves, or become the measures of the State Governments.

"From these conventions the constitution derives its whole authority. The Government proceeds directly from the people; is 'ordained and established,' in the name of the people; and is declared to be ordained 'in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity.' The assent of the States, in their sovereign capacity, is implied in calling a convention, and thus submitting that instrument to the people. But the people were at perfect liberty to accept or reject it; and their act was final. It required not the affirmation, and could not be negatived by the State Governments. The constitution, when thus adopted, was of complete obligation, and bound the State sovereignties.

"It has been said, that the people had already surrendered all their powers to the State sovereignties, and had nothing more to give. But surely the question whether they may resume and modify the powers granted to the Government does not remain to be settled in this country. Much more might the legitimacy of the General Government be doubted, had it been created by the States. The powers delegated to the State sovereignties were to be exercised by themselves, not by a distinct and independent sovereignty created by themselves. To the formation of a league, such as was the confederation, the State sovereignties were certainly competent. But, when 'in order to form a more perfect union,' it was deemed necessary to change this alliance into an effective Government, possessing great and sovereign powers, and acting directly on the people, the necessity of referring it to the people, and of deriving its powers directly from them, was felt and acknowledged by all.

"The Government of the Union, then, (whatever may be the influence of this fact on this case,) is emphatically and truly a Government of the people. In form and in substance it emanates from them. Its powers are granted by them, and are to be exercised directly on them, and for their benefit.

"This Government is acknowledged by all to be one of enumerated powers. The principle that it can exercise only the powers granted to it, would seem too apparent to have required to be enforced by all those arguments which its enlightened friends, while it was depending before the people, found it necessary to urge. That principle is now universally admitted. But the question respecting the extent of the powers actually granted is perpetually arising, and will probably continue to arise as long as our system shall exist.

"In discussing these questions, the conflicting powers of the General and State Governments must be brought into view; and the supremacy of their respective laws, when they are in opposition, must be settled.

"If any one proposition could command the universal assent of mankind, we might expect it would be this: that the Government of the Union, though limited in its powers, is supreme within its sphere of action. This would seem to result necessarily from its nature. It is the Government of all; its powers are delegated by all; it represents all, and acts for all. Though any one State may be willing to control its operations, no State is willing to allow others to control them. The nation, on those subjects on which it can act, must necessarily bind its component parts. But this question is not left to mere reason; the people have, in express terms, decided it, by saying, 'this constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof,' 'shall be the supreme law of the land,' and by requiring that the members of the State Legislatures, and the officers of the executive and judicial departments of the States, shall take the oath of fidelity to it.

"The Government of the United States, then, though limited in its powers, is supreme; and its laws, when made in pursuance of the constitution, form the supreme law of the land, 'any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.' "

"It is the Government of all; its powers are delegated by all; it represents all, and acts for all." If these premises are correct, the conclusion cannot be resisted without a violation of common sense. How is the General Government to take care of the interests of all? How is the Government to take care of the interests of thirteen millions of people, unless its administration can be felt over that extent of population? It was not to be wondered at, if the Chief Justice said that the proposition commanded universal assent; that, within its enumerated powers, the Federal Government was supreme. One can hardly turn to a page of the constitution without seeing that this has always been regarded as one nation. As a matter of fact, he thought it was deeply to be deplored that, in the face of the world, it should be declared on this floor that we are no Government. He had always supposed that the name of American citizen was a passport over the world, and that a man needed no better passport to ensure him respect. Yet he had now to learn that this was all a mistake, and this Government was merely an ignis fatuus, existing only by the light which it borrowed from the State Governments.

The constitution declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." A citizen of New Jersey is thus a citizen of all the United States; and wherever he may sojourn or abide throughout the whole confederacy, he has the privilege of the citizen of the State and of the United States. How can the interests of the States and of the United States be more commingled than by this clause in the constitution?

Congress has passed laws of naturalization. The foreigner who comes hither is naturalized under these laws, and is admitted to the privileges of a citizen of one State and of all the United States. Yet this is to be regarded as no Government; is to be held as liable to be put down whenever the States shall choose to recall their delegated powers. If Congress were to attempt to vote up such an abstraction, the people would vote it down just as fast as it was sent out to them.

Having arranged these premises, he would come now to consider the bill itself. This bill had been severely attacked, by calling it hard names. The gentlemen on the other side, not contented with calling it a bill worse than an abomination, a bill to repeal the constitution, to erect a military despotism, to create a dictator, had yesterday called it a Boston port bill, a riot act, a prison-shab bill, &c. Every appellation which could be devised to make the bill odious had been heaped upon it. He would adopt no such mode of warfare. He would use no such weapons; and if they were offered to him, he would request that the persons who might offer them would take them away from him. The people of the United States have become so enlightened now that they will require arguments of sounder stuff than hard words to work convictions in their minds. They have too far advanced, and if gentlemen do not quicken their speed, the constituents will soon go ahead of their representatives in the science of politics, and leave them far behind in the wilderness. Such an array of names would not carry a question even in a town meeting. It would not excite an emotion even in an assemblage of five hundred citizens out of the thirteen millions which compose our population. So much for the nomenclature. It had been said that, to pass this bill would be conferring extraordinary powers on the Executive. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had informed the Senate, the other day, that with the exception of a single clause in the first section, it was perfectly familiar to our legislation.

The Senate would remember the intercourse bill of 1802, regulating our trade with the Indians. That bill contained a clause to this effect: "and it shall moreover be lawful for the President of the United States to take such measures, and employ such military force, as he may deem necessary to remove from the lands of the Indian tribes any persons who have made, or may make, settlement thereon." "Employ such military force," &c. Here Congress delegated the power to employ the force, and left it to the discretion of the Chief Magistrate to fix the amount of force necessary, and to employ that force in such manner as he should deem best to drive off the settlers from their lands, whether they were situated in South Carolina or in Tennessee, or in any other State. Here was a plain duty to be performed. A treaty had been made with the Indians, and to fulfil this treaty the law was passed. This law stands unrepealed in the statute book, and has been frequently enforced without causing any excitement. Whenever it was necessary to employ force, the President had left it to the officer to determine what force was necessary to give sufficient strength to the Executive arm to effect the object. This was not an unadvised discretion. In these emergencies, it was impossible for Congress to know the strength of the intruding families, and, consequently, to apportion the adequate force. General Washington, on one occasion, sent a message to Congress, stating that five hundred families had intruded, and asking Congress if he should use military power to expel them? They unanimously answered, yes; and referred the message back to him. The Executive must use power. The Congress of that day was not distracted by fears on the subject, and why should we? Why should we, when our laws are counteracted, and when we are told that our efforts to collect the revenue in South Carolina shall be resisted, and put down by the interposition of her civil and military power? What was to be done, when our authority was thus defied? were we to sit still and do nothing? Surely, even the gentlemen on the other side would not advise this course. The President has told us that it is impracticable to execute the laws without further aid from Congress.

The measures proposed by the bill are revenue measures. Looking at them in this view, he referred the Senate to the act to provide for the better security of the duties imposed on foreign goods, by which the President was authorized to cause to be built and equipped twelve revenue cutters, &c. Here twelve revenue cutters were authorized to be armed and equipped, and, at the discretion of the President, to be used for collecting the revenue. But there was another provision in this bill, which was of great importance. In case any vessel should not bring to, on being summoned, after hoisting the pennant, and firing a gun, it was made lawful for the cutter to fire into such vessel. Here, then, was a tremendous power given to the President; to arm and equip twelve cutters, and to authorize the officer commanding a cutter, if a merchant vessel refused to come to when hailed with all the accustomed formalities, to discharge his whole artillery into the bosom of the vessel. What was this? It was making war on our citizens quite as efficiently as can be done under any of the clauses in this bill. Merchant vessels are not armed, therefore the number of cutters was limited. In the bill concerning the Indian lands there could be no limitation of power, because it was impossible to estimate the force against which it would have to be employed. There were also other laws to which he might refer the Senate; the law of 1790; of 1795, authorizing the President to call out the militia to execute the laws, to suppress insurrections, &c.; of 1807, similar in its character, authorizing the calling out of the militia, and such part of the naval and military force as might be necessary, in case of insurrections or obstructions of the laws.

He would ask, then, if those were not groundless fears which would restrain gentlemen from again confiding such powers to the President, who is made by the constitution commander-in-chief, and is required by another clause to see that the laws are faithfully executed. Who was to be trusted, if he could not? Who was to be trusted, if not the President? Who would execute the power under his responsibility to Congress? Gentlemen could not terrify him with the cry of despotism. Why, if it were now to be put to decide whether he would have a despotism controlled by law, or a despotism without law, or in defiance of law, he should prefer the first. He would prefer the despotism of law to the despotism of nullification. He would discard the despotism of a faction, of a small portion of this federal community, and would run in the broad path marked out by the constitution, where, if he met danger, he should be supported by his conscience, and by the virtue of the country. It was a singular argument to say, take care you do not create a despotism, and, at the same time, as the gentleman from Kentucky had said, take care how you make war on South Carolina. Who makes war on South Carolina? Who meditates war? If there is to be a war, she will make it herself. It will be her own hand which will lay the axe to the root of her prosperity. What have we done? We have passed a law operating on her, as well as on all the other States. What else have we done? The coat he wore was one on which he paid a duty to the treasury. And she would make war rather than submit to pay this tax common with the rest of the Union. He submitted that all the features of the bill were defensive in their character, and not warlike in any one of their attitudes. Instead of making war by brute force, the bill was only intended to come in to the aid of law, to enforce the laws, and to make them respected; to make the State of South Carolina obey the law. He would proceed to prove this.

The first section of the act provides for the removal of the custom-house. He hoped that gentlemen would be just to the motives of the Executive. There had been many fulminations against the President for this clause. In his message he recommends the removal of the custom-house with a view to prevent collisions. What says the message?

"There would certainly be fewer difficulties, and less opportunity of a direct collision between the officers of the United States and of the States, and the collection of the revenue would be more effectually secured, (if, indeed, it can be done in any other way,) by placing the custom-house beyond the immediate power of the country."

The motives of the President, therefore, were pacific. It was to prevent collisions that he advised the removal of the custom-house. If, in an unhappy hour, South Carolina should push her State sovereignty to the dreadful emergency of opposing resistance to the officers of the United States, the President suggests, in order to avoid this contingency, the removal of the custom-house. Was this the conduct of a tyrant? Was this a course indicating a disposition to hurry the country to the verge of a precipice? Nothing like it. If this was a question with a foreign Government, policy would forbid this concession, and would require that we should keep the custom-house where it is, and stand by it there. With a foreign Government he would contest it to the very last punctilio. He would consider it important to take a determined position until the last tribute should be exacted. But with our sister State of South Carolina, he would forbear. If, said Mr. F., she urge me from the custom-house on land, I would retire to a vessel; and if there were some bleak and desolate rock, I would be willing to retire thither. I would not suffer myself to forget, misguided as she has been, that she is a loved and honored sister. I would not forget that her soil contains the sepulchre of many of that gallant band who fought and bled to establish this Union. I would retire backwards even to the walls, and permit her to pursue me with her menaces, until that awful moment when longer forbearance would be treason; until the last fearful issue should be, strike, or surrender the honor, the dignity, and security of the Union. There had been some who suggested that a stand ought to be made at the custom-house where it is; but the committee had been anxious to respond to the recommendation of the Executive, and thus to prevent collision, and the shedding of fraternal blood.

It had been said that a dangerous discretion was given to the President in the last part of the first section, which authorizes the President to employ force to prevent any obstruction, &c. He would put it to the gentlemen who entertained this view whether it was well founded. The collector goes to the custom-house on the arrival of a vessel or cargo, and makes a demand of the duties. The captain refuses, and throws himself behind the shield of the State of South Carolina. The collector then makes his seizure. When does the President act? Not until an effort is made to rescue the vessel, and the violators of the laws are about to carry off the goods, triumphing in their success. The constitution lays it down that the President is to take care that the laws are faithfully executed. He is now required to perform this duty, and if he cannot do this by any other means, he is authorized to use the military arm. Similar powers have been formerly conferred on the Executive three different times, as will appear by the statute book. It had been said, this was making war on South Carolina. If South Carolina can justify such opposition to the laws, and if she, or any other of the States, should prefer the protection of her ordinance to the alternative of obedience and union, she must lie down on the bed of her own making. But we are not to give up our laws. While the other States are paying high duties, can South Carolina, continuing a member of the Union, be permitted to import her goods duty free, which her enterprising citizens would pour into all the neighboring States? Could it be expected that she would thus be permitted to set the laws at defiance? The bill is not making war on South Carolina. It is only to remove obstructions out of the way of collecting the revenue. It is a case in which the execution of the laws is put beyond the reach of the Executive; and Congress has often given this power before.

The next clause gives jurisdiction to the circuit court of the United States for the purposes specified. It was altogether defensive in its character. Mr. F. made various references to the ordinance and the replevin act of South Carolina, to show the necessity for this section.

The third section of the bill was defensive. It transfers jurisdiction from the State courts to those of the United States, and was intended by a judicial course to counteract the policy of South Carolina. He could not help here remarking, that the judicial policy adopted by South Carolina was the most extraordinary he ever had seen. It had no parallel. It had become indispensable to protect the United States' officers. What does South Carolina do? She professes her willingness to meet this question on great judicial principles. We are willing to meet her on that ground, and let her have a fair chance. We have our judiciary, and we are willing to meet her there and try the issue. Why does she not come here? She says we have given to our bill a wrong title. Why not bring her controversy with us to the proper tribunal? We are here ready to meet her. It is urged that the constitution should be amended. The constitution provides that this may be done, but not without the concurrence of three-fourths of the States. Why, then, should South Carolina, of herself, usurp the right of violating the laws, and breaking down the constitution? He would like to see this question answered. Why had such a convention been called? The Senate had been told that there had been a majority of Congress opposed to it, and therefore the State of South Carolina had no chance of satisfaction by this constitutional mode. That State also passes by the judicial tribunal which is authorized by the constitution to decide in matters of controversy. She dares not come to the Supreme Court. It is probable that she believes in her conscience that that court would decide against her. I believe it would. Thus, when she is guilty of these infractions, she cannot amend the constitution to her wishes, because there is a majority every where against her. The Congress is against her; all the States are against her; and if there is any reliance on the statements in the newspapers, all the country is against her. Now we are ready to meet South Carolina in the Supreme Court, and to plead with her; and if the Supreme Court shall decide that it is unconstitutional, we will give up the tariff. Not a State interested in that policy, not a State in all the north and east will offer to nullify the decision of the court. But South Carolina will not come and meet us there; yet she says she will refer the controversy to the judicial tribunals. She will not come here to our court, but she has invited us to come into her courts. Mark the jealousy which her conduct exhibits. She is afraid of the Supreme Court. She is afraid of the federal tribunals. She is even afraid of herself. She will not trust her own tribunals. The Supreme Court is to be dragged before one of her county courts, where she has taken care to have every judge and juror sworn to decide against us. Would you, sir, agree to carry a cause into any court under such circumstances? We are gravely asked to go into a court for trial where all are sworn against us! In all fairness, this was the last mode of settling a controversy I have ever heard of. It shows the deep, thorough, and heartfelt conviction which South Carolina feels of the injustice and the unsustainable character of her own cause.

How has New Jersey acted in similar circumstances? She is one of the sovereignties: a little sovereignty, I admit, among all these great sovereignties, and not to be named with the others. She had a controversy. Her Legislature took a course not warranted by the constitution. It was brought here to the Supreme Court, and that court put down the legislation of the State, and all the people submitted at once, as they ought, to the decision. Maryland, too, has had her controversy, and has submitted. Pennsylvania resisted the Federal Government, almost to the point of the bayonet; yet, to her immortal honor, she also submitted, rejected the misguiding councils by which she had been led into error, and returned to her duty. Old Virginia, too, the Ancient Dominion, whose independence is sung from east to west, she opposed herself to the General Government, and she also submitted. Now, South Carolina has set up her ordinances and laws against those of the United States, and puts herself in an attitude of defiance; and, assuming the post of a creator, points down below to the creature called the Supreme Court, refuses to permit that court to interfere, insists on the Supreme Court going to her courts, and will not even permit us to go to her tribunals until she has sworn all the judges and jurors to decide one way. Gentlemen, after all this, talk of despotism. Why, there is a despotism never before heard of at this moment now operating in the State of South Carolina, where that noble, independ ent, brave, and honorable body of men, the Union party, are subjected to the most cruel proscription.

Every man who did not yesterday take the test oath lost any situation of trust which he filled, and was rendered incapable of enjoying any State office, according to the provisions of the ordinance. What a despotism is this! I would rather, said Mr. F., give the President 50,000 men at his disposal, to put down this spirit of hostility to the laws, than suffer such a despotism to continue. What! after inflaming the public mind throughout the State by publications and speeches at patriotic meetings, shall these opposers of the laws be permitted to drive, by the force of their test oath, the most honorable of their fellow-citizens into absolute occlusion from all the immunities of their condition, unless they will come in and give their adhesion to blind measures which their consciences refuse to approve? Shall they be permitted to say to this conscientious and orderly band, "You must take that oath or lose your commission?" But that is not all. If the judges decided against the United States, and the marshal should (and what marshal would not?) go into the courts of the United States to make complaint that he has had his goods seized, he is then liable to fine and imprisonment. Here, then, it appears, that South Carolina passes by all the known tribunals of the country; swears her own judges to decide according to her own views; and if the officer of the United States dares to go to the United States courts with his complaints, fines and imprisons him. And this is called a peaceful remedy. It is a remedy which sets at defiance all the principles and elements of peace. And if we dare to interrupt South Carolina in this course, we are told that we are making war against South Carolina. If we were to carry this controversy into any court which has not been thus sworn against us, we should have a fair prospect of a decision in our favor. I should like, continued Mr. F., to see any judge, who would come to the consideration of this case with an unbiassed mind, give a judgment upon it. Yet under the ordinance and laws of South Carolina, the marshal cannot carry his complaint into an impartial court, but on pain of fine and imprisonment.

The next section refers to the furnishing a record of any case, where a record cannot be obtained from the State court. A copy of the record may be obtained on the affidavit of the refusal. Mr. F. read the following paragraph:

"And it is further ordained, that in no case of law or equity, decided in the courts of this State, wherein shall be drawn in question the authority of this ordinance, or the validity of such act or acts of the Legislature as may be passed for the purpose of giving effect thereto, or the validity of the aforesaid acts of Congress, imposing duties, shall any appeal be taken or allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States, nor shall any copy of the record be permitted or allowed for that purpose; and if any such appeal shall be attempted to be taken, the courts of this State shall proceed to execute and enforce their judgments according to the laws and usages of the State, without reference to such attempted appeal; and the person or persons attempting to take such appeal may be dealt with as for contempt of the court."

The Senate would then perceive that this provision is necessary to meet the obstructions therein in the way of judicial proceedings. All the principles contained in the above paragraph have been embodied into the legislative acts of the State, with some trivial exception.

The fifth section of the bill authorizes the employment of the military and naval force. Mr. F. read the section, and continued: If the crisis provided for in this section should arrive, the President is not even then, in the first place, to resort to force, but merely to issue his proclamation, and thus to reason with the misguided citizens. Should all this fail, and the crisis be hurried on, when there is no other alternative than that the dignity and union of the States is to be upheld or surrendered, then he is authorized to call out and employ the force placed by that section at his disposal. What are the powers of a sheriff of South Carolina, if he should be called upon to resist the execution of the laws? He may call out the posse comitatus; he may invoke the whole power of the county. What is the whole power of the county? Every man in it capable of bearing arms. If Gen. Hamilton and his 10,000 men were at hand, the sheriff would call on him, as the Executive of the State, to execute the laws of the State; in the same manner as the President of the United States is now required to execute the laws of the Union, with the aid of the force of the United States.

Here, continued Mr. F., our recollections have been refreshed by a reference to the Jersey prison-ship, and all its horrors. He referred the Senate to the replevin act to show the situation in which the officer of the United States is placed, whenever he shall attempt to repossess any goods; being subjected to fine and imprisonment, even although he shall go into the State with the broad seal of the Supreme Court. He is thus treated as a malefactor in the State for going there to do his duty, and to obey the laws, by enforcing the process of the court. This is nullification; but that is not all. In order to banish every shred of federal authority from the State, it is decreed that if any offender against the laws of the United States shall be taken, no citizen shall be at liberty to offer a place for his confinement. Yet the gentleman from Kentucky says, the feature in our bill which meets this contingency is an odious one, because it leads back his recollections to the old Jersey prison-ship. Why, Congress, so long ago as 1791, in a resolution, conveyed a power precisely similar to this. In many of the States there were not, at that time, any jails for the reception of the debtors of the United States; and that resolution authorized the marshal to hire temporary dwellings for the purpose of jails. The provision was precisely similar to that contained in this bill.

He had thus gone over all the material provisions of the bill, and he would most earnestly submit to the Senate whether there could be any well-grounded fears on the subject of the passage of this bill. It was not intended, as he said in the opening of his remarks, as long as the judicial legislation of South Carolina could be met by legislation and the judiciary of the United States, to resort to force. When the State should assail the custom-house on land, we would retire with it to the water. But when unlawful and dangerous combinations put the peace of the country in danger, the Executive is clothed with the authority to put them down.

I have been asked, continued Mr. F., and I regret that the reference has been made to me, whether any of the neighboring States are likely to take up the cause of South Carolina. The question was, "Would Virginia, or North Carolina, or Georgia, send forth their militia on a call from the President of the United States?" I can anticipate no other result, when such call shall be made on these States to enable the Executive to perform the duties imposed on him by the constitution. I cannot doubt that all these States would join to enforce the execution of the laws. I cannot anticipate the painful spectacle of Virginia and North Carolina reaching forth a helping hand to uphold resistance to the majesty of our laws. Sir, should such an exhibition ever be made, should these honored States suffer our laws to be defied, the public authorities to be contemned, the dearly cherished stars and stripes of our Union to be struck in disgrace and trailed like a loathsome weed in the dust, the occasion would be the death scene of the American Union. The moral bond of sentiment and good feeling will be then cruelly smote on all its links, and the pall of despair will envelope forever the best hopes of freedom here, and under the whole heavens.

Revenue Collection Bill.

[SENATE.]

He concluded with expressing his hope that the issue of this debate would be a response to the voice which had reached the Capitol from all parts of the Union.

Adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 4.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

The Senate having again proceeded to consider the bill to provide further for the collection of the duties on imports—

Mr. BROWN, of North Carolina, rose. He did not believe, he said, that he should be able to say any thing to equal the high intellectual entertainment which the gentleman who preceded him in this discussion had furnished to the Senate. But he would endeavor to remunerate whatever attention the Senate might give to his plain, homely effort, by the brevity of his remarks. If he had consulted the admonitions of discretion rather than of duty, he should have been silent, nor have offered to oppose his views to those of gentlemen of such distinguished ability. But the bill before the Senate involved questions of such magnitude, that he could not content himself with a silent vote upon it. The subject was of high interest to the State which he had the honor, in part, to represent, both as a member of the common Union, and in reference to her peculiar position, bordering, as she does, upon the State out of whose legislation arose this question. This obligation of duty derived additional force from the resolutions of the State of North Carolina, instructing her Senators to exert their influence to obtain a "peaceable adjustment of this controversy," and to produce a restoration of harmony between the Federal Government and the State of South Carolina. While it always afforded him pleasure to comply with the requests of his constituents, in obeying their injunctions on this occasion, he followed also the dictates of his own judgment and ardent wishes. It was his earnest hope that this contest, which was now assuming an angry and threatening aspect, should be settled in a peaceable manner. He need not say that he disapproved of the course of South Carolina, or that his State disapproved of it. Her course, he thought, had been rash and uncalled for by the exigency of the times. She should have relied, as he did, upon a constitutional remedy; upon the returning sense of justice in the people of the Northern and Eastern States; and upon the wisdom and patriotism assembled in the legislative halls of the country. But the State of South Carolina thought differently, and took redress into her own hands. She was responsible to herself for her course. It was not his business to sit in judgment upon her, but to express, on his own part, and that of his State, disapprobation of her course.

The bill, though proposing on its face to be general in its application, was manifestly intended to be applied to South Carolina alone. Though the name was not written under the picture, he who runs may easily read. What is the proper way of settling this question? What course is most likely to lead to a peaceable adjustment of it? This is the question before us. The Committee on the Judiciary must excuse him, if, notwithstanding the high respect he entertained for their talents, he should wholly dissent from the specific remedy which they propose. He did not believe that the bill by them presented to the Senate was calculated to carry out the glorious, the inestimable principle of our institutions, that our Government should be essentially pacific in its remedies. He believed that, in its consequences, it would be attended with violence, and perhaps lead to civil war. He objected to the provision which authorized the repulsion by force of any attempt to execute the laws of South Carolina in reference to the revenue. To that provision he mainly objected, but there were some other provisions of minor importance which did not meet his assent. If any one principle was better established than another, in reference to our institutions, it was that the military should be subordinate to the civil authority. If any one principle was sacred, it was this. It was one which no emergency justified us in departing from; one which constituted the very essence of a republican form of government, and without which free institutions could not exist. When we establish the doctrine that military authority may step in to execute the law, before the judiciary has exerted its powers, then the essence and spirit of our institutions are essentially changed. It has been our boast that in cases where other nations resort to war, we resort to a peaceful mode of attaining a settlement of the question; and to the judicial tribunals is committed the administration of these peaceful measures. He did not at all object to the due administration and operation of the laws of the United States. He wished the laws to find support in the energy of the constitution. It was vain to say that coercive measures are necessary in this case; for there is an inherent energy in the constitution which will enable the laws to triumph without an appeal to force.

The Senator from Pennsylvania asked us the other day, if we were unwilling that the powers proposed to be given to the Executive by the bill should be confided to the present President of the United States. But that was not the question. He would say that the past course of the President had been such as to entitle him to unlimited confidence, and there was no individual to whom he would more willingly confide this power than to the President. But there was no man, however elevated in station and ennobled by virtue, however pure his integrity and honest his purposes, to whom he would give a power which was unwarranted by the constitution. We are told that a jealous watch over the repositories of power is the only way of preserving liberty. He could not believe for a moment, that, if this power were given to the President, he would abuse it. But it might, in worse times than these, and in worse hands than his, be abused to the destruction of our institutions. We may be told that the power will be limited as to continuance and application. But what does history teach us? That the fact of to-day becomes a precedent to-morrow. Our own history shows us instances of powers, some well established as constitutional, which the framers of the constitution and its early friends would have shrunk from with dread. The General Government has been gradually drawing to itself the exercise of doubtful powers. When told that they are not given by the constitution, they reply that they are justified by precedent.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, in the course of his remarks, spoke of the submissive manner in which that State would yield obedience to the most unjust and injurious legislation of Congress. The history of that State was illustrated by the virtues and patriotism of her citizens, but the Senator would pardon him if he should say that the State of Pennsylvania was not quite exempt from the faults which are imputed to the State of South Carolina. The course of Pennsylvania, in the famous Olmstead case, had some agency in bringing about the present state of things in South Carolina. Though South Carolina had not derived her impulse from that source, yet the doctrines once contended for by Pennsylvania were appealed to in justification of her present course. The opinions and principles of Pennsylvania in the Olmstead case had been cited in the discussions in South Carolina, as justifying her resort to self-redress. He did not stamp his approbation on them, nor on those of Carolina. [Mr. B. then read extracts from the report made in the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania, on the message of the Governor, relative to the mandamus of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Gideon Olmstead, as follows:]

SENATE.]

Revenue Collection Bill.

"That the subject referred to them has not failed to engage their most serious reflection. They have viewed it in every point of light in which it could be considered. It is by no means a matter of indifference. In whatever way the Legislature may decide, it will be in the highest degree important. We may purchase peace by a surrender of right, or exhibit to the present times, and to late posterity, an awful lesson in the conflicts to prevent it. It becomes a sacred duty we owe to our common country, to discard pusillanimity on the one hand, and rashness on the other. In either case, we shall furnish materials for history; and future times must judge of our wisdom or our weakness. Ancient history furnishes no parallel to the constitution of this united republic. And should this great experiment fail, vain may be every effort to establish rational liberty. The spirit of the times gives birth to jealousy of power; it is interwoven in our system; and is, perhaps, essential to perfect freedom and the rights of mankind. But this jealousy, urged to the extreme, may eventually destroy even liberty itself. As connected with the federal system, the State Governments, with their inherent rights, must, at every hazard, be preserved entire; otherwise the General Government may assume a character never contemplated by its framers, which may change its whole nature."

"Resolved, That in a Government like that of the United States, where there are powers granted to the General Government, and rights reserved to the States, it is impossible, from the imperfection of language, so to define the limits of each, that difficulties should not sometimes arise from a collision of powers; and it is to be lamented that no provision is made in the constitution, for determining disputes between the General and State Governments, by an impartial tribunal, when such cases occur."

"Resolved, That from the construction the United States courts give to their powers, the harmony of the States, if they resist encroachments on their rights, will frequently be interrupted: and if, to prevent this evil, they should, on all occasions, yield to stretches of power, the reserved rights of the States will depend on the arbitrary power of the courts."

"Resolved, That, should the independence of the States, as secured by the constitution, be destroyed, the liberties of the people, in so extensive a country, cannot long survive. To suffer the United States courts to decide on State rights, will, from a bias in favor of power, necessarily destroy the federal part of our Government; and whenever the Government of the United States becomes consolidated, we may learn, from the history of nations, what will be the event."

Those papers show what were the doctrines of Pennsylvania at that time; and it is well known that she went on to carry those into practical operation. She called out her whole military power to resist the decree of the court, and steps were taken to bring her military force into actual service. He did not adduce this fact because he approved of the doctrines of Pennsylvania, for, in his opinion, she went too far. But he meant to show her rashness did not draw down upon her the power of the Union. The administration of that day had not recourse to military coercion. The decided stand which the State had taken was known to the Government and to Congress, but they did not consider that any coercive measure was necessary before the judicial tribunals had tried their remedy. No bill was introduced in Congress, no measures recommended by the President for meeting the measures of Pennsylvania with military force. They trusted to the force of our institutions, without other remedy, and those institutions triumphed.

Should not the recollection of this transaction inculcate upon Pennsylvania moderation, and unabated confidence in a peaceful remedy? The case addressed itself particularly to that State, and bound her to practise the same moderation towards Carolina which the Union practised towards her, when, in a moment of high excitement, she opposed herself to the laws of the Union. He would, in further support of his views, read from a speech delivered by a highly distinguished citizen of Pennsylvania, a passage which was fraught with just and liberal sentiments. [From the address delivered before the literary societies of Jefferson College, at the annual commencement in September, 1832, by the honorable W. WILKINS, he read the following passage:]

"If we start with horror from such frightful consequences, let our efforts be directed to avert the evil which brings them in its train. Ever keep in mind the spirit of compromise in which our constitution had its origin. Instead of defiance and derision, let us adopt the tone of conciliation, and, where practicable, of concession. Instead of hunting up materials, from spiteful comparisons between different States or districts, let us remember only what is glorious in the history, or estimable in the character of each; adopting the happy quotation of Lord Chatham, when deprecating that stubborn and contemptuous defiance which led to the dismemberment of the British empire; let each State, in reference to every other,

'Be to her faults a little blind,
'Be to her virtues very kind.'"

In dwelling on the common efforts and the common sacrifices—on that precious fund of glorious recollections which two wars have accumulated for the whole country—there must be kindled a generous and sympathetic ardor which will prove the most powerful of centripetal forces. I agree, continued Mr. B., that the spirit of compromise and conciliation is the strongest bond which binds us together, and it is that tie which unites us, and not the strong arm of military power.

The gentleman from New Jersey, in the course of his remarks, said that the constitution was ratified by the people; that it was submitted to the States merely from convenience; and that the people had clothed the General Government with its powers. To that position he would not assent. It brings up the great question of consolidated powers. The establishment of this doctrine utterly annihilates the constitution as it was expounded by the most enlightened republicans of '98 and '99. If that doctrine had been constitutional, then it was only necessary that the constitution should be ratified by the majority of the people. The ceremony of submitting the instrument for the ratification of the States was an idle mockery, if the powers granted by the constitution were not granted by the sovereign States, but by the people in mass. He would refer to the history of the transaction. Eleven States had ratified the constitution, constituting an overwhelming majority of the people; but still North Carolina refused to ratify it, and so did Rhode Island. As sovereign States, they refused their sanction to it. If the doctrine of the Senator from New Jersey was correct, North Carolina was, at this time, guilty of resistance to the constitution and laws. Little Rhode Island was guilty of opposition to the supreme law of the land, for she did not come into the Union for some time after North Carolina. That single circumstance shed much light on this subject. The State of Rhode Island, a small State, but little larger in population than some of the counties in New York, yet exercising on that occasion a sovereignty co-extensive with that of New York, Pennsylvania, or any other State in the Union. Another fact repudiates the doctrine here advanced, that the constitution is the work of the people. It is only necessary for a majority of the States, constituting one-fourth of the people, to refuse to elect Senators, and an end is put at once to the General Government. This consideration puts to flight all the arguments urged to prove that this is a consolidated Government. He was aware that it had been said, in reply to this remark, the meaning of the quorum, which was necessary to enable the Senate to transact business, would in this case be construed to mean a majority of the States actually represented; and the States not represented would not be considered as belonging to the Union. But this objection would drive gentlemen to an admission of the right of secession—a doctrine which, perhaps, they would not be willing to allow; for if a State has not the right of secession, no act that she herself may do, or omit to do, can place her out of the Union.

But if the origin and nature of our Government did not put this idea to rest, the character and extent of our country would have done so. The people of so wide and various a surface would never have delegated the powers to make a consolidated Government. They knew that no such Government could exist here. What says Mr. Hamilton in the Federalist? What says Mr. Madison on the subject? Why, that to adopt a consolidated Government would be destroying the principles of the revolution, and would inevitably lead to monarchy. And why? Because whenever a majority, having adverse interests to the minority, should combine to oppress the smaller portion, the latter would have to intrench themselves behind their reserved rights, and make resistance to the oppression, or be annihilated.

What would be the consequence of this resistance? So soon as the minority discovered that the majority were forcing interests adverse to their own, and they began to resist the encroachment, the military arm of the Government would immediately be strengthened, and there would be but one step beyond—that of a monarchy.

The gentleman from New Jersey had said that it was the aspiring pride of the State sovereignties which had led to this state of things. The aspiring pride of the State sovereignties! It was an avowal of doctrines such as these which was so repugnant to his feelings. It was well known that in the origin of the Government the country was divided into two great parties. One of these parties contended in favor of the reserved rights of the States, and to restricted powers of the General Government. The other was for conferring on the General Government unlimited powers. This last was called the federal party. With a loud note they proclaimed the necessity of investing the General Government with a vast range of authority. Some of them even went so far as to propose a form of Government which would have been substantially a monarchy. Mr. Hamilton, in the convention which framed the federal constitution, had advocated the appointment of a chief Executive Magistrate, and a Senate during good behavior, which was equivalent to appointing them for life. Such, said Mr. B., is my remembrance of the subject. The history of these times will show the fact. The doctrine of State rights, and of the reserved powers of the State sovereignties, was abhorrent to the leaders of that party. They did not, however, succeed in carrying their enlarged views into effect. He did not intend to characterize the whole of that party as entertaining these views. But such were the sentiments of some of its leaders. Nor did he intend to impugn the motives of these gentlemen, though he doubted not they were actuated by feelings as patriotic as those which actuated any men. But it was well known that the high-toned part of the federal party did doubt the competency of the people to self-government. They were for arming the federal power with all authority, in order, as they said, to save the people from their own worst enemies. There were some of the prominent men of the country who did not subscribe to that principle, but who did believe that the people were competent to self-government; that they were fully able to go through the work which they had begun, and to carry out that beautiful theory of republican rule. Happily for the country, they prevailed. Happily for the country, the principle was established, that the States were sovereign and independent, as to all powers which they had not delegated to the General Government. And some of the republican party went so far as to believe that the States themselves had the right, in the last resort, to determine for themselves what were the precise powers which they had delegated. He was well aware that the doctrine of nullification, as it now prevailed in South Carolina, was about to be made use of, not against that doctrine alone, which he did not rise up to defend, but for the purpose of founding upon it a war of extermination. It was against that that he desired to enter his protest; under this masked battery, he saw that it was intended to fire upon the rights of the States. Gentlemen held up the flag of nullification, rang all the changes upon the word, sounded the tocsin of alarm throughout the country, and presented the whole matter in a light the most unfavorable to South Carolina, in order to justify to the other States the war which they were disposed to wage. It was a war, too, which would admit of no neutrals. The gentlemen who have taken the strong ground, like Napoleon, have thrown out the declaration that there must be no neutrals.

I take my stand, said Mr. B., on the reserved rights of the States. I repudiate the doctrine of nullification. I repudiate also the high-toned doctrine of the federal party. I believe it is to that high-toned doctrine that we are to attribute nullification. I believe that doctrine produced it; is the parent of it. It is by an improper pressure of the Federal Government on the rights of the States, and by exercising doubtful powers, that the State of South Carolina has been thrown into this position. He did not mean to justify the course of that State. But whether she was right, or whether she was wrong, this furnished her with something like an excuse for her conduct. He believed that the principle was as susceptible of demonstration as any principle of mathematics; that almost any attitude of resistance against the Federal Government, in which States had been seen, arose out of the unwarrantable exercise of doubtful powers by the United States. They had always been inclined to tranquillity. They had always been disposed to make a child's bargain with the United States: If you will let us alone, we will let you alone. They would never have admitted the idea of rising in opposition to the United States, unless there had been some exciting cause. The whole history of the world proves this fact. There is no precedent where a people have arrayed themselves against a supreme power without any occasion, because the great body of mankind has always been found more ready to acquiesce in oppression than to resist it. He desired gentlemen to produce a single precedent where a people whose pursuits are peaceful and agricultural for the most part, were willing to cast away "the piping times of peace," and for the mere love of glory to rush into a conflict against power, and that power twenty times larger than itself. Could gentlemen produce an instance where any State, without provocation, had ever offered resistance to the General Government? He had thus, he believed, established the great principle that the States themselves were always willing to be quiet, and that most of the opposition which had been manifested against the General Government had arisen from the exercise of doubtful power by that Government, by which had been provoked that State pride which the gentleman from New Jersey so earnestly denounced. Without that pride this republic would now have been as nothing. To justify this principle, that most of the controversies which had arisen, have arisen from the circumstance of the Federal Government taking their debatable ground, he would read an authority which would meet with the approbation of all pure democrats. It was the authority of George Clinton, a name deserving of all respect; clarem et venerabile nomen; a man distinguished for his steady adherence to democratic doctrines. When he was President of the Senate in 1810, he gave his casting vote against the bank. It was on that occasion that he used the following language:

"In the course of a long life I have found that Government is not to be strengthened by the assumption of doubtful powers, but by a wise and energetic execution of those which are incontestable; the former never fails to produce suspicion and distrust, whilst the latter inspires respect and confidence.

"If, however, after a fair experiment, the powers vested in the General Government shall be found incompetent to the attainment of the objects for which it was instituted, the constitution happily furnishes the means for remedying the evil by amendment; and I have no doubt that, in such event, on an appeal to the patriotism and good sense of the community, it will be readily applied."

What was the result of his experience? That the Government was never strengthened by the exercise of doubtful powers. A doctrine which still prevails among the distinguished leaders of the party in the State of New York, and which they can never consent to surrender, unless they should become recreant to the great principles which they have always maintained. But he would not only quote authority, but he would also quote facts. What was it which excited the first controversy between a State and the United States; a conflict which threatened to bring ruin on the country, and which was designated the reign of terror by the republican party, as it well deserved to be characterized? He referred to the alien and sedition law, which, by usurping the power of trampling into dust the liberty of speech, the freedom of the press, and all the rights and securities which the people had enjoyed, called forth a movement the most glorious to the country that could be imagined. It drew forth the celebrated report of Mr. Madison, a report to the merits of which he was totally inadequate to do justice. This was a movement of the aspiring pride of the State sovereignties, which, instead of destroying the Union, brought back the Government to its first principles. So much, then, for State pride. If that State pride had preserved the constitution at its last gasp, it ought not to have called down upon it such unqualified reprobation. The doctrines of Virginia saved the confederacy in that dangerous crisis. They produced a civil revolution, which brought into power the wisest and the ablest statesman who ever lived in any country. This was one of the benefits which had resulted from State pride.

In the case of the establishment of the United States Bank there arose also a conflict of powers. There were many who believed that it was an assumption of power not delegated to the Federal Government. Ohio was one of the States which held that opinion. This matter also was finally adjusted. What was the next question which agitated the country? It was the exercise of the power of internal improvement. That was not an expressed power granted to the General Government. It was among the doubtful powers, and the right to exercise it was denied by several of the States. It was denied by the State of New Hampshire, and by a very respectable portion of the State of New York, which held that it was one of the doubtful powers. The right of appropriating money to all or any objects was another of the doubtful powers. The State of New York, and some other of the States, disputed the right of the Federal Government to appropriate money except for the purposes pointed out by the constitution. Such are the contentions which had arisen from the exercise of doubtful powers by the Federal Government.

The case of Georgia was the next to which he would call the attention of the Senate. The usurped powers which the United States attempted to exercise over her provoked the pride of that State, as well it might. When the Government of the United States undertook to tell her that she could not extend her jurisdiction over the whole of her own soil, she might well resist. This contention, arising also from the exercise of doubtful powers by the United States, was at one moment pregnant with awful menace.

The last, but not the least, of the conflicts which have arisen from the exercise of doubtful powers by the General Government, was in relation to the protective system. Here the Government of the United States had assumed the right of unlimited taxation, of taxing one portion of the community for the benefit of another and a more favored portion. He hoped that he had thus succeeded in establishing the position that most of the controversies which had arisen had their origin in the exercise of doubtful powers by the Federal Government, operating against those rights which the States deem necessary for the preservation of their existence in a sovereign capacity.

The gentleman from New Jersey had held up the constitution in his hand, and, with all that patriotic ardor for which he was distinguished, said he should cling to the bond. I, too, said Mr. B., will cling to the bond; and while I will willingly allow the gentleman to take full usage, I hope that, in taking the pound of flesh, he will not spill one drop of blood. The gentleman had also said, that old Rome never submitted to the dictation of any of her provinces. This was a luminous commentary on the rest of his remarks. No wonder that he had spoken disparagingly of the States, when he compared them to Roman provinces. This sufficiently accounted for the consolidatory principles of the gentleman from New Jersey. But old Rome was always ready to extend justice to her provinces. Whenever the deputies of a province came before her Senate, she did not fear to do them justice. We may all becomingly fear to do wrong, but we should not fear to do justice.

The gentleman from New Jersey had said he would not strike a sister State, but would retire to the wall. He, Mr. B., admired this principle, which so admirably accorded with what he knew of the private worth of the gentleman from New Jersey. But when the gentleman went on to say that the dignity of the country required that the laws should be executed, he could not avoid asking him in what that dignity consisted? Did it consist in calling out the military power, in bringing citizen into conflict with citizen, and deluging the country with the blood of her children? If that was the meaning of the dignity of the country, he, Mr. B., prayed Heaven to deliver him from such dignity. He considered that the dignity and honor of the country would be best promoted and established by doing justice, and carrying out peacefully and efficiently the principles of the constitution. This would be worth all false glory, all the national glory of which we have heard so much. It would eclipse all the glory of imperial Rome and of imperial France, which was nothing to the glory of a just, equal, and benignant dispensation of the laws.

One of the reasons which had mainly induced him to rise was, to show that every peaceful remedy should be resorted to. The constitution was framed in a spirit of mutual deference. It was ratified in that same spirit of deference, and so it ought to be administered. The whole history of our country conforms to that principle; a mutual deference to all great interests of the country. The practice of the Government has been invariably marked with the spirit of conciliation.

The State of Kentucky, in 1794, was dissatisfied with the Government of the United States, because the free navigation of the Mississippi had not been secured. The Legislature of that State made a strong remonstrance on the

Revenue Collection Bill.

[SENATE.]

subject to the General Government, claiming that free navigation as their right. They asserted that God and nature had given them this right; and they menaced a withdrawal from the Union if it was not obtained for them. What was the course of Washington? What was the course of the American Congress on this occasion? They did not assume the ground that they would not legislate while this menace was held over them. Yet no one could doubt the courage of Washington. No one could doubt that he was not prepared for every emergency. He said that the Government had been established in a spirit of compromise, and he recommended that a respectful reply be given to the State. He laid before the Legislature the facts in the case, and the free navigation of the Mississippi was obtained.

There was also another case, which was the assumption of the State debts. At the close of the war of the revolution, besides the national debt, each State had contracted its debt; and it was demanded by the Eastern States that the General Government should assume the payment of these debts of the States. Such was the dissatisfaction which resulted from Congress delaying the payment of these debts for five years, that a dismemberment of the Union was expected. In making this reference, he had no intention to cast an imputation on the States, but merely to state facts. The General Government ultimately assumed these debts. Suppose that, instead of taking this course, the General Government had acted on the idea thrown out by the gentleman from New Jersey, that the pride of the State sovereignties ought to be checked; we should not, said Mr. B., be at this moment engaging in this discussion, and enjoying the privilege to which this floor entitles us.

The next instance was the repeal of the embargo law in 1807. This was a measure of Mr. Jefferson, and one to which he was greatly attached. But when he saw that, by the continuance of this embargo, the Union was likely to be dismembered, did he say that the law must be enforced at all hazards? No such thing. Acting on the conviction that this is a Government of compromise, he repealed the embargo. In his works published since his death, it is made apparent that this was a very favorite measure with him. Yet on the approach of so dangerous a crisis, he hesitated not to abandon and repeal it.

This is another instance of concession on the part of the General Government to States, which resisted the exercise of doubtful powers.

Mr. B. said, as he had stated his objections to the course which the honorable Judiciary Committee had advised or recommended to the Senate to adopt, and deeming it not calculated, as honorable gentlemen had observed, to preserve the Union, but, on the contrary, calculated, if carried into practical operation, to destroy this glorious Union, it was proper that he should state what he thought would best meet the present crisis. He considered the true remedy a peaceful remedy, that of conciliation, according alike with the genius of the constitution and the practice of the Government. The revenue should be reduced to the wants of the Government; and the oppression which the Southern people labored under, in consequence of the tariff system, ought to be removed. If gentlemen wished to preserve the Union, the country should be appeased. This appeared to him to be an infallible remedy. The one, however, which the committee had prescribed, might be fraught with some danger. He was aware that there was a set of politicians, who thought this the favorable moment to try the strength of the Union, and that Government ought not to concede one particle of the protective system. Can it be possible, at this day, (said Mr. B.) that any individual would wish to jeopardize the peace and harmony of twelve or thirteen millions of people, not only the peace of a whole people, but to retard the progress of free Governments throughout the world, by an experiment of that kind, to try the strength of the Union, and whether it can survive the use of the military power? He hoped not. He trusted that our republic would be hazarded by no such speculative experiment.

It is argued, continued Mr. B., that the State of South Carolina having placed herself in this attitude of defence, Congress ought not to legislate on the subject, as had been said in some of the newspapers, while the sword is brandishing over our heads. This is not meeting the question; it is not the true question; it is a question of a very different character. Are the people of South Carolina alone concerned in this matter? Is not a vast portion of the American people concerned in it? Are not the whole of the Southern States interested in this subject? It is not only the Southern States, the State of New Hampshire, the State of Maine, and a portion of the people of New York, but a large and respectable number of the States in the Southwest, which consider the tariff system unjust and repugnant to the principles of the constitution, and that we have no right to keep it up. It is argued that justice should not be done to South Carolina, because she has assumed a menacing attitude. This is not a proper view; it is not just to the other States. Is it any reason, because South Carolina has acted imprudently, that she should not receive justice? If she has forfeited any claim to the consideration of the General Government, ought the other States to incur the forfeiture? Nothing can be more erroneous, nothing more absurd, nothing, I will say, more tyrannical, than to oppress all the Southern States, because South Carolina has acted rashly. I do not, said Mr. B., argue this question as a Southern question. Thank God, in the exercise of my legislative rights and duties here, I can look beyond the Potomac. Thank God, I have a feeling which is not confined to the geographical limits of any portion of the United States. I can look and judge of my countrymen north as well as south of the Potomac; and I wish it to be distinctly understood, that what I now say respecting South Carolina, I deem applicable to every member of this confederacy. To no one of these States would I arrogantly say, I will not do justice, until you come on your knees before me.

I do hope, if I have any patriotism, it is not that narrow, contracted patriotism which is confined to geographical limits. I trust it is that patriotism which looks abroad over the Union, and embraces every portion of my fellow-citizens. And so help me God, if my constituents were this day to demand that I should perpetrate an act of injustice against any member of this confederacy, that I should do an act in behalf of North Carolina which would trench upon the rights of Maine or of Massachusetts, or Pennsylvania, which I believed destructive of their constitutional rights, so help me God I would resign my seat, and retire to my home, rather than jeopard the peace of this republic, this glorious experiment of a free Government, by taking what justly belongs to Maine, and unjustly to bestow it on North Carolina; believing that a man presents a more truly dignified attitude who refuses to do an unjust act, than he who perseveres in injustice.

But what are we now called upon to do? We are called upon imminently to jeopard the public peace, by a novel and dangerous experiment; to enforce a law which not only a large portion of the American people believe unconstitutional, but which I verily believe, if the question were submitted to their individual opinion this day, they would repudiate and require to be rejected. We are called upon to enforce a tariff law, which I believe the majority of the people of the United States desire to have amended or modified; and the modification of which is fortified likewise by the recommendation of the Chief Magistrate.

And before I proceed further, let me explain myself

SENATE.]

Revenue Collection Bill.

on this point. I do not take the ground, and I will not take it, and I wish to be distinctly understood with respect to this matter, that a law which is tainted with injustice should not be put in force. I take the ground that no law oppressive in its character should be executed by interposition of military power, until every pacific measure which can be devised shall have been resorted to without the desired result. The remedy for evils of the greatest magnitude should be sought for in the peaceful tribunals of this country, according to the great principles handed down to us by the English whigs, and which we have infused into the spirit of our constitution and Government.

If, on a failure of all these means, it shall be found necessary to use force to execute the laws, let it be used. I am not prepared to say that the emergency cannot arise; but I do say, that before a law of this kind is to be executed, before the peace of the Union is to be disturbed, there ought to be a reference to the justice, to the wisdom of Congress, to weigh, to examine the provisions of that law, and solemnly to pause and reflect before proceeding to put it in force by military power.

I beg leave, said Mr. B., to advert to what the President of the United States has said in his message to Congress, and I do it because this is the first remedy which the President recommended to Congress at the opening of the present session. I cannot doubt, that if the Executive wishes were consulted, he would, and decidedly, give the preference to a peaceful settlement of the difficulties by Congress. I do not mean to say that his preference should influence our legislation, but it ought to have weight with us.

Speaking of the extinguishment of the public debt, the President goes on to remark:

"The final removal of this great burden from our resources affords the means of further provision for all the objects of general welfare and public defence which the constitution authorizes, and presents the occasion for such further reduction of the revenue as may not be required for them. From the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it will be seen that after the present year, such a reduction may be made to a considerable extent; and the subject is earnestly recommended to the consideration of Congress, in the hope that the combined wisdom of the representatives of the people will devise such means of effecting that salutary object, as may remove those burdens which shall be found to fall unequally upon any, and as may promote all the great interests of the community."

Again, in another part of the message, the President remarks:

"That manufactures adequate to the supply of our domestic consumption would, in the abstract, be beneficial to our country, there is no reason to doubt; and to effect their establishment, there is perhaps no American citizen who would not for a while be willing to pay a higher price for them. But for this purpose, it is presumed that a tariff of high duties, designed for perpetual protection, has entered into the minds of but few of our statesmen. The most they have anticipated is a temporary, and generally incidental protection, which they maintain has the effect to reduce the price, by domestic competition, below that of the foreign article. Experience, however, our best guide on this as on other subjects, makes it doubtful whether the advantages of this system are not counterbalanced by many evils, and whether it does not tend to beget in the minds of a large portion of our countrymen a spirit of discontent and jealousy dangerous to the stability of the Union."

These are the sentiments of the President regarding the law which we are now called on to adopt extraordinary means of carrying into execution.

As I consider this is a most important point, as I consider it the true means of removing the difficulty now involved in this question, I have not only adverted to the annual message of the President as showing the views of the administration and their remedy for the difficulties in the South, but I would now beg leave to read from the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

[Here Mr. B. read an extract from the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the reduction of the duties.]

Thus we have the direct suggestion of the present administration, that this is the most appropriate remedy. It is the one which was first suggested at the opening of the session, and I believe it is calculated to achieve all the great objects so much to be desired, all which it is necessary to achieve, and that without endangering the republic.

What is the extraordinary spectacle, I would remark, which the American republic now exhibits to the world? A republic which has heretofore boasted of its freedom—a republic which has heretofore pursued the "even and peaceful tenor of its way"—a republic which had been found competent to all the legitimate purposes of Government without slaughtering its citizens, and which, with very few exceptions, has gone on peaceably for fifty years. We present the extraordinary spectacle of calling on the administration and the Executive branch of the Government to enforce a law against a portion of our fellow-citizens, to compel them to contribute so much money to the revenue, which it is acknowledged is six millions annually more than is requisite for the wants of the General Government. A removal of that burden would remove all difficulty with the State of South Carolina. Even a partial removal of it, a mitigation of it, would make the tariff system more acceptable to the people, without a total abandonment of the principles. I speak in reference to the views and prevailing sentiments of that portion of the people I represent.

Sir, it does appear to me a powerful consideration that we are almost on the eve of a civil war; and for what? To enforce a law for the collection of revenue, when it is admitted by the Secretary of the Treasury that there are at present six millions of dollars more than is wanted for the common purposes of the Government. Is this calculated to elevate us in the eyes of the nations of Europe? Is this calculated to cheer the hopes of those people who have been long struggling for their rights? Permit me to say that I think it will somewhat weaken the force of our republican experiment; yet, I believe that our Government is capable of achieving all the great objects for which it was designed, and settling this matter.

If, in the revolutionary contest, when the blood and treasure of this country were profusely poured forth to establish the rights and liberties of mankind, to give self-government and to abolish unjust taxation, any one of our ancestors who were engaged in this glorious struggle had predicted that in less than half a century afterwards we should be engaged in the consideration of a bill to compel a portion of the people, at the point of the bayonet, to pay taxes when the Government had six millions of dollars more than it needed, they would not have believed him; credulity itself at that time would not have believed such a prediction. If they could have credited the story, it would have enervated the arm which struck for liberty, would have damped the bosom which glowed with patriotism. But what has been the practice of our Government heretofore? I beg leave to recur to another case distinguished in the history of our Government, and which I overlooked at the time I was remarking on the various instances of forbearance shown by our Government. In the late war, when a large majority of the people of the United States believed the pride of the country to have been wounded, when the constituted authorities of the land believed the national honor to have been trampled upon by the British Government, and considered it the sacred duty of all to assist them in resenting the insult, we found many on that occasion—yes, even pending the gloomiest period of the war—resisting every bill which went to give the Government of the United States men and means to prosecute that war. They resisted it on the ground that peace might be obtained, and, I believe, because they deemed the war to be unjust, and while our villages were smoking and our country invaded by a large body of hostile troops.

We find at that moment a large body of men in Congress, whose patriotism I do not call in question—far be it from me to do so—a powerful, talented, and respectable body of men, even at the darkest periods of that war, voting against giving men and money to carry on the war. Great Britain had trampled on our commercial rights, had insulted us on the high seas for six years before war was declared. Notwithstanding all this, we found a powerful body who said that no army nor money ought to be voted to the Government. Now, if that spirit of forbearance, great as it was, could be shown to an enemy whose cry was, Delenda est Carthago—if that spirit could be exercised bello flagrante—certainly some little patience is due to our brethren of the South. Surely some forbearance ought to be shown to our countrymen. If there were many at that time who thought the sword should not be unsheathed against those who would trample us under foot, is it to be supposed that we are now to plunge it into our fellow-citizens without some little examination into their cause?

I wish to be distinctly understood on one point. I do not intend to justify South Carolina; I am not her advocate, but she has a right to have justice done her. I do believe, however, that this question may be settled; and that by acting in a spirit of conciliation—a spirit not only due to her, but the vast portions of the North and South—the question might be put at rest. As regards the union of these States, there is not a member in the Senate, and I trust I shall not be considered egotistical when I say that there is not, in the whole Union, one in soul and heart more deeply devoted to it than my humbleself. I believe that all the advantages of liberty, and of a free government, are at issue in this matter; and it is for that reason I urge a pacific course. Even the Grenvilles and the Norths, arrogant as they were, even they brought forward their measures; even they repealed some of their odious laws to satisfy the desires of the colonies. And shall it be said, there is now a spirit more inexorable, more inaccessible to the voice of justice, than that which prevailed under the British monarchy? If so, the blood of those who achieved the revolution was shed in vain, and the hopes of the friends of free government are forever put at rest. If that inexorable principle, that there is to be no regard paid to the feelings and wishes of the minority, he would say that this would change the whole principle of our federal compact, depriving it of all its republican and benignant features, and converting the federal into a consolidated Government.

In every portion of the Union there is a set of great primary interests. He wished to be distinctly understood on this point. He did not mean to say that the Government of the United States should yield to every rash requirement of a State; far from it; but he did intend to say, that whenever any of those great primary and leading interests made just remonstrance against any obvious oppression, it was our duty, in the true federative spirit of our Government, to forbear; otherwise, the Government must effectually change its character. The West has her primary interests and sensibilities in reference to the great land question, and he (Mr. B.) would always be disposed to do ample justice to her as well as to every other section of this country. He would not feel power and forget right. New York has great interests in a commercial and manufacturing way; he, therefore, would do nothing that would trample them down. He would let them be free as they are, and give them all the privileges they require. With regard to the manufacturing interests of the country, he believed that the constitution did not tax the interests of one portion of the people to benefit another. He would bear and forbear. And, as to a specific measure for the reduction of the revenue, he declared that he was not one of those who would give a deadly blow to the manufacturing interests, by a thorough and too rapid reduction to the revenue point. He would do it gradually, in that spirit of forbearance which is due to the whole Union. Having glanced at the peculiar interests of the West and North, he would now advert to those of the Southern States. Their interests consist in producing as much as possible, selling at the highest prices, and buying as low as possible. But that natural course of things had been interrupted by the Government of the United States for many years past. But he did not subscribe to that doctrine which is maintained by some, that there are not essential interests common to a large portion of the United States. He believed every section of the Union, North, South, West, and East, were inseparably connected. There was no such thing as an adverse interest. It was true that an artificial state of things had grown up.

There was no difference between the great natural interests which God and nature had given us; if there was any difference, it arose from a dread of unjust legislation. Unjust legislation had produced it, and not the diversity of soil, habits, and pursuits. The true doctrine was, to extend equal protection to all in their various habits and pursuits, and leave the path free for a generous and beneficial competition of all.

He begged leave to read a short extract from a speech of Mr. Bayard, a man of eminent ability, a republican, a patriot; and he (Mr. B.) believed that the sentiment would and ought to have its weight. It was at a particular period of the embargo, and the remarks were made in the course of a speech on the question; and in reading this, he intended to make no special reference to that portion of the Union; they had a right to express what they felt; he merely referred to it as illustrative of the principles of our Government. In the course of that gentleman's remarks on the repeal of the embargo law, Mr. Bayard said as follows:

"We all know that the opposition to the embargo in the Eastern States is not the opposition of a political party, or of a few discontented men, but the resistance of the people to a measure which they feel as oppressive, and regard as ruinous. The people of this country are not to be governed by force, but by affection and confidence. It is for them we legislate; and if they do not like our laws, it is our duty to repeal them."

"If they do not like our laws, it is our duty to repeal them;" so said he, (Mr. B.) It was right and proper that the other members of the Union should respect their feelings, nay, even their prejudices. Suppose that our Government had pursued a different course; had steadily refused to repeal the embargo law; had determined, in the language of the present day, to make an experiment to test the strength of the Union; and that our fellow-citizens of the East should have been coerced at the point of the bayonet; what, in all probability, would have been the consequence? He believed there would have been bloodshed, and that the consequence would have been a dissolution of the Union; and that the prospect of a free Government would have been destroyed; that all the States of the Union would have become separate Governments, and civil war would have resulted. The calamitous consequences which would result from a dismemberment of the confederacy, none could doubt; each of the great divisions, seeking to strengthen themselves against the aggressions of the others, would give large powers to their Executive authorities, which would most probably terminate in the establishment of a military despotism in each.

Proud as he was of the achievements which had been performed under the star-spangled banner; proud as he was of the stars and stripes which have fluttered in every sea and every clime; anxious as he was for the glory of the country; yet God forbid that those stripes and stars, which had heretofore been the rallying point of heroism, should now float over the mangled corpses of our bleeding countrymen. God forbid that our country should undergo this sad and disastrous revolution; for he believed, whenever that should take place, not only the liberties of this country, but the best and brightest hopes of the civilized world, would be destroyed forever.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said, that he asked the indulgence of the Senate to say a word, to correct some misapprehensions of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BROWN.] Sir, said Mr. F., I must have been peculiarly unhappy in stating my views, when the Senator understands me to have compared our Government with the Roman provinces. So far from this, I did, in very explicit terms, refer to Rome by way of grateful contrast, not of parallel; and urged, that it was because we were not conquered provinces, but a Union of free and co-equal States; that it was because ours was a peace and not a war spirit, that I would retreat from a custom-house on land to a custom-house on the water; that from a real tenderness of shedding a brother's blood, I would go back to the very wall and never strike, until forbearance should itself become treason.

Again, sir, I was quite as unfortunate with the honorable Senator, when he ascribes to me the notion that our constitution was the production of the people in the aggregate. I too well knew the fact to be otherwise, to contend for such an absurdity. In adopting the constitution, it was insisted that the people acted in separate communities, and for the palpable reason that they existed in separate communities. But, sir, as matter of argument, I endeavored to show, that so far as concerned the character of the instrument, the extent of its powers, or the nature of the Government created by it, it was altogether immaterial whether the popular will was ascertained by distinct communities, or by a reference to some aggregate expression of that will. That, even granting the largest demands of the gentlemen who press the pretensions of State sovereignty, it would not in any measure impair the strength of the proposition that maintains the supreme authority of the General Government, by the nature of the powers contained in the grant. That, in either view of the subject, we must still turn to the constitution as the best expounder of itself; and if the delegation has there been made, why, sir, the character of the party to it cannot affect the grant. After all our speculations, we are constrained in the end to inquire what are the attributes with which the constitution invests the departments of the Government.

One word, sir, on another part of the honorable Senator's remarks. It regards an opinion that the aspiring ambition of State sovereignty led to collision under the confederation, and probably produced much of more recent excitements. This opinion, said Mr. F., is not mine, it belongs to history. No political view had been taken of the embarrassments which prevailed during the first years of our national existence, that failed to perceive in this ambition among the State sovereignties a very fruitful source of our difficulties. Sir, from the very nature of man, this must be so. It was to be expected that jealousies would spring up between the General Government and the States. Each moved in a sphere of power; and we know the constant tendency of power to be thirsting after greater measures, and to maintain a sleepless watchfulness towards all competitors. This vigilance is salutary, when controlled by prudence and principle; I hope never to see it relaxed either by the States or the United States. It will preserve the functions of both in their healthful action.

I submit, therefore, Mr. President, that the opinion of State aspirations is not so untenable as the honorable Senator deemed; and from the sensitiveness with which he has met the remark, I must think that it has struck not very far from the head of the nail.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, next obtained the floor, and moved an adjournment.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 5.

THE REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill further to provide for the collection of the duties on imports.

Mr. HOLMES rose to address the Senate. Without preface, he began by reading the following extracts of a speech, from a volume which he held in his hand, and which the reporter has been lucky enough to find by seeking for:

"Gentlemen have a wonderful faculty of denouncing laws as unconstitutional. It was to be expected that those gentlemen who regard their reputation as correct lawyers, would have deliberated before they decided. At least it was hoped, that, inasmuch as we have a tribunal competent to decide this question, and that very speedily, gentlemen, instead of threatening to legislate against the legislation of Congress, would have taken the means to have a decision in the courts of the United States. Are they afraid to trust the federal judges? Do these gentlemen lack wisdom and integrity? Or is it this wisdom and integrity which they are afraid of? The embargo was a measure called for by both parties; and the people had rather bear it, hard as it is, than that their enemy should be fed. But gentlemen threaten legislative interference: and are they prepared for this? They mean, surely, by a State law, to repeal the embargo and enforce the repeal against the officers of the General Government. This is coming out. If they are in earnest, I like this. You have talked long enough. We begin to doubt your nerve. Your rich men have probably made up their minds, as well as those of desperate fortunes. They probably understand the meaning of the word revolution. They have probably thought where they shall be when the wheel stops."

This, said Mr. H., is from a speech of a member of the Senate of Massachusetts, made nineteen years ago. I knew him well, sir; perhaps not so well as I ought to have done; but I know that his sentiments were then mine. Upon these principles I came into public life, and with them I will go out of it. There is no mystery or concealment about them. There can be no mistake as to what the speech meant. He who made it was a man who spoke right on, and generally called things by their right names. These principles were mine, sir, twenty-five years ago, and they have continued to be so ever since. I have gone on in the same way of reasoning and acting to this day. Sometimes, to be sure, I have waked up and found that I had a strange bed-fellow; but, if so, he has crept into my bed, and not I into his.

The Senator from Kentucky, and the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BISS and Mr. BROWN,] had both intimated that they are members of the great republican party. Mr. H. said he hoped that they did not intend to intimate, by this, that others, who disagree with them on the question now before the Senate, do not belong to the republican party. The principles which he had just quoted, at least, were thought republican when delivered, by the republican minority of the Legislature of Massachusetts, and approved as such by the republican majority here. These were the principles, he repeated, on which he came into public life, and on which he intended to go out of it.

Mr. H. said he had hoped that, in the discussion of this question here, there would have been no allusion to the old parties and party devices. He regretted there had been any. But since they had been alluded to, he would say, that if his principles, advanced in 1814, in the Legislature of Massachusetts, that there is a supreme tribunal that has a right to decide definitively and effectively all questions between the Government of the United States and the State Governments, are not republican now, they were not then, and the administration that carried on the war with Great Britain was not a republican administration. If the arguments of the honorable Senators were to prevail with him, they would but convince him of his having been under a strong delusion. He had thought, all along, that this Government was a monument of human wisdom; he had admired its strength and its beauty, and its foundations as firm as the everlasting hills. But now, it seemed, from the arguments of gentlemen, that he had labored under an hallucination, and that what he had supposed to be a stable Government was a crumbling mass, tottering to its ruin, falling apart under its own cumbrous weight. Under the influence of such representations, he said, he felt gloomy and heavy of heart. Have I, said he, been deluded or not in this matter? Is there any effective power in this Government to maintain itself, or is it to be subjected to the power of its members? This was the question now to be decided; he regretted the necessity of trying it at this time, but it could not be avoided.

Before he proceeded further, Mr. H. said he must request the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILKINS] to exonerate him from the charge, in supporting the bill which that gentleman had brought in, from the imputation of following too obsequiously in the train of the Executive recommendations. He should expect from the liberality of the honorable gentleman, that he would give him an official certificate that he had not heretofore too zealously supported the present administration. He (Mr. H.) had reason to believe, indeed, that the President of the United States had no great affection for him; not, perhaps, so much, for instance, as ought to exist between a man and the partner of his joys and sorrows; and perhaps (said Mr. H.) upon the whole, there is not much love lost between us. But, sir, I do love my country; and since she has, against my will, made him her agent to execute the laws, I am disposed, though I may regret the exigency, to give him all the power that is necessary to carry that purpose into effect. It was my wish to have conferred the trust which he holds elsewhere; upon one who, when he got power, would not stretch it to the utmost limit of it; but the people had made another the executor of the laws: and, if not he, who is to execute the laws? I repel the suggestion, (said Mr. H.) from whatever quarter it comes, that, because I maintain that the laws are to be executed, I have turned about, or changed my principles.

The Senator from North Carolina (Mr. H. said) had spoken very well of the principle of the military being always subordinate to the civil authority. Mr. H. agreed with him most cordially. But when the civil authority itself is resisted, to call the military to its aid is defending and maintaining the civil authority. The authority of the United States (said he) is that which we represent here; and, if it be resisted by any spurious authority, it is then our duty to sustain it by whatever measures may be necessary. In reply to the question asked by the same gentleman, whether the Senate were willing to extend the executive power, Mr. H. said, that the great danger from the executive branch of the Government was its irresponsibility; and it would be recollected, that, in the matter of removals and appointments to office, when he and his friends, who were opposed to the extension by construction of the executive power, were desirous, by the Senator from North Carolina and his friends, to inquire into the cause of the removal of competent officers, they were not permitted by the Senator from North Carolina and his friends to do so, because, forsooth, the President, in removing them, had acted upon his high responsibility. It was not a little singular that those, who then contended that the President was subject to no responsibility but his own unbounded discretion, should now be found trembling with apprehension at the idea of trusting him with any discretion whatever.

Without further preliminary, Mr. H. said, he would come to the question in controversy, which he considered to be this, and plainly this: In the conflict of power between the United States and any single State, who is the final and effectual umpire? What authority can decide when these disagree, and make its decision effectual? Had he stated the question fairly? Yes, he said, that question must come, and there was no going between it; no intermediate course by which it could be escaped. The constitution has established no umpire for such a case; and, when the conflict comes, the question must be decided, who is the final power to judge it? My ground is, then, said Mr. H., that this power must of necessity be vested in the Government of the United States; not in the Executive, but in the whole Government; and that it must have the power to execute its decisions, or else it is a nullity. How then did the case now stand? The power of the Government of the United States to lay imposts, it was well known, was an exclusive power. The States were prohibited the exercise of it without the assent of Congress. If the power exists at all, it is exclusive in the Government of the United States. Now, he asked, the power being granted to the United States and prohibited to the States, can the States control the exercise of it? Mr. H. went on to argue that it could not be a concurrent power. Nor could it be an alternate power, that may be exercised either by the General or the State Governments. Suppose, he said, that the United States were to arrest a man for treason, convict and hang him for resisting the laws, it would be a very useless thing for a State Government to take up the case, and determine to un-hang the man; at least, if they did, it would be of very little use to the dead man. The power, being in the Government of the United States, must be an exclusive power, the exercise of which no State had a right to obstruct. Now, said Mr. H., comes the issue. The Congress of the United States have passed certain revenue laws; they have been acted upon, adjudged to be constitutional, and have been executed by the Executive. South Carolina says they are unconstitutional, and has passed laws intended to repeal them or make them inoperative within her limits. The question, then, has arisen, shall the laws of South Carolina succeed, or those of the United States?

Passing by, for the present, the doctrine of peaceable nullification of the laws, Mr. H. said he would see if he could not understand some of the doctrines which had been advanced in regard to social and political compacts. If he understood gentlemen, their meaning was that a social compact is one which may be enforced; a political compact one which may or may not be enforced. To be a little more explicit, he must go back to his schoolboy days for an analogous distinction—that between perfect and imperfect obligations. Those who have read Vattel and Paley know that a perfect obligation must be enforced, and an imperfect obligation may or may not be performed, at pleasure. The only question to be determined is, whether the constitution of the United States be the one or the other of these. I insist, said Mr. H., upon its obligatory character, and its power of enforcing its own authority; that it is a perfect compact, a social compact, as gentlemen call it. My syllogism, then, is this: that a perfect obligation may be enforced in the manner prescribed in the compact; that the United States' constitution is a perfect obligation; and that it may, therefore, be enforced in the manner prescribed in the compact. If I do not prove all this, sir, then my doctrine must fall to the ground.

Revenue Collection Bill.

Now, sir, here is a case. The United States passed certain revenue laws, which the State of South Carolina annuls. If the United States have the power to pass the revenue laws, the nullifying laws are nullified. The minor, in this proposition, depends upon the facts and principles out of which the constitution arose. He should attempt to show, first, that the United States, at the time of adopting the constitution, had power to grant to a General Government the right of ultimate decision; second, that the States intended to do it; third, that they did it; and, fourth, that they have always since acted up to this intention. He would pledge himself to make these propositions, if he could. What is sovereignty? There is but one absolute sovereign—the Sovereign of the Universe. No State is sovereign, except in respect to other States. Every nation that governs itself, under what form soever, without dependence on a foreign power, is sovereign. Can the Government enforce obligations upon the people of this Union? When sovereignty is vested, it is vested with the right to govern the people over whom it acts. If the people disposed of a part of their sovereignty to a certain body of men, they made a grant at will, which they can resume whenever they please. The grant to a certain body of men of exclusive legislative, judicial, and executive power, is a grant at will, according to our Declaration of Independence. The power that gives the sovereignty can take it back; but where several States concur to grant a sovereignty for the common benefit, two or three of the parties cannot withdraw it without the assent of the whole. He did not care whether the States or the people made the grant.

The inquiry whether the States or the people made the grant is entirely beside the question. Suppose Great Britain made the constitution for us. The question would be, what is it? Does it vest in the United States sovereign powers, whether expressly, or by implication? That the powers given by the constitution are sovereign, there is no doubt. The powers to make peace and war, to coin money, &c. are attributes of sovereignty. Two or more States may grant to a common Government all their legislative, judicial, and executive powers. This would be a grant of their whole sovereignty. Consequently, they might grant certain defined powers, and this would be a grant of a portion of their sovereignty. Those principles by no means admit the inference that the people of a State may reserve federal sovereignty. Two or more States, then, as they have the power, may vest in a common Government the right to define its own limits. He would admit that where the majority of the people could decide, the Government would become consolidated. But that consolidation, in this case, would result in despotism, he would not admit. The federal power, so far from tending to consolidation, held the popular power in check.

This was a most happy frame of Government. The popular power held the federal power in check, and the federal power checked the popular power. He need not go beyond these walls for an illustration of this position. Can the majority of the people of the United States, without the concurrence of the States, as States, carry a measure? Certainly not. Look at the facts of the case. He would illustrate it by a few examples. Fourteen States of this Union, in population a little above one-fourth of the whole population of the United States, can defeat any measure of the House of Representatives. Thirteen States, in population somewhat below a fourth of the whole population of the United States, or even twelve States, with a population but a little above one-third of the whole, may defeat any federal law. How, then, can the popular branch carry any measure they please, and produce a consolidation of power? But this was not all. Thirteen States could always check the whole popular power in the appointment of judges, for the judges were created by the federative power. The States, too, were represented in the electoral colleges. No Government under heaven was so capable as this of protecting the rights of the minority. If each State had an equal vote, the Government would be merely federative; and if the House of Representatives had all the legislative power, the Government would be consolidated; but it was neither federative nor consolidated. The federative in the Senate, and the popular power in the House, checked each other, and there was a third compound power in the Executive which checked both. Never was power in any Government so well balanced. Yet we are told that we must go beyond this power, to ascertain whether State rights have been violated here or not.

Having shown that the States could form just such a Government as we have, the next question was, did they design to form it? If they did not, then they deceived the people, or the people deceived themselves. What was the old confederation called? "A league of perpetual union," not a Government. The constitution was called the constitution of the United States: that is, a constitution of Government. Each State, under the old confederation, retained its sovereignty, freedom, and independence; and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not by the confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled. Under the constitution, the powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. The old confederation had legislative but not executive and judicial power. He appealed to gentlemen to say whether the constitution was formed for any other purpose but to create a sovereign power. It bestowed on the General Government all the attributes of sovereignty, and it begins, "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union," &c.

Mr. H. then compared the constitution of the United States with that of the State of South Carolina, to show that, in title, and in the clauses conferring judicial, executive, and legislative power, they bore a strong resemblance, and had the same object in view—the creation of a sovereignty. In each case, the framers seemed to think they were doing the same sort of business; making a compulsory power for the purpose of enforcing obedience to the constitution. Was it to be believed that the State constitutions were to be enforced, and the federal constitution to be observed or not, at pleasure? The constitution of South Carolina is the Government of South Carolina, and that of the United States is the Government of the United States. There is nothing in the constitution of the United States which authorizes the supposition that laws made by the United States can be resisted by any other power. The presumption is, that the same power which has legislative authority has also the authority of adjudication; and that the same Government that makes the laws can alone repeal them; and, further, that even the same branch of the Government which makes can unmake a law, unless otherwise provided for. In the case of war and peace, a peace may be made by the President and two-thirds of the Senate, though, to declare war, the whole concurrent legislative authority is necessary. Ordinarily, the power that makes is the only power that can repeal a law. Would it not be an anomaly in legislation, if one power could make a law, and a portion of that power repeal it? South Carolina is but one of the family, but seeks to control the whole. Like the old lady in Dr. Franklin's story, she does not know how it happens that, in all the family quarrels, she is always right and the rest are always wrong. We have a Legislature, an Executive, and a Supreme Court; all exercising supreme authority. If we had need of more positive proof that these powers are supreme, we have it in the fact that all State officers are sworn to support them, and the State judges are bound thereby, in contravention of State laws and constitutions. Every judge in South Carolina must swear this, notwithstanding the ordinance. The design of the framers of the constitution was to make a common sovereignty, as we find by looking back to their correspondence. Under the confederation, the States were pares, and there was no power to compel a refractory State to obey the laws of the Union. Their whole object was to get this compulsory power. Every thing else was right, except the means of protecting the common interests.

Revenue Collection Bill.

The design of the great founder of our Government was apparent from a letter to a friend in Great Britain, in which he says, "they (the people) see the necessity of a general controlling power, and are addressing their respective Assemblies to grant it to Congress." Again he says, "I do not see that we can long exist as a nation, without lodging somewhere a power which will pervade the whole Union, in as energetic a manner as the authority of the State Governments extends over theseveral States." We see that he believed this controlling power to be essential to the preservation of our independence.

Having considered, continued Mr. H., whether this power could be and was intended to be granted, it remained with him to inquire next, whether, in fact, it was granted. This was a constitutional Government, and, therefore, it was sovereign as far as to all powers delegated to it. This was the general understanding of the people; and the idea of nullification and reserved rights was almost every where ridiculed by them. In a Tennessee newspaper he had seen a story which he would relate. A law of that State respecting marriage, required the publication of the banns some time previous to the marriage. The time appeared, too, very long to one individual, and he determined to oppose the law and set himself down on his reserved rights. The law did not prohibit marriage, which would be flatly unconstitutional, but it delayed it, and therefore was in a measure unconstitutional. He accordingly nullified and disobeyed the law. If we refer to the powers granted to the Federal Government, we shall be satisfied that they have all the essential attributes of sovereignty: they were the powers of taxation, war, treaties, coin, commerce, domain, allegiance, (viz. treason,) and naturalization.

What attribute of sovereignty was more essential than the right, in some manner, to determine definitively and effectually its own limits? The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BISS] said, as he understood him, (he was sorry that he was not present to say whether correctly or not,) that the Supreme Court could judge only in judicial cases, and not in political cases. But were not controversies between States political cases?

The judicial power extends to all cases in law, arising, &c., and the cases are described; one case mentioned is that of controversies between States. A sovereign State, it is said, must not be drawn to the feet of the Federal Government; but in a case involving political power, the Supreme Court must adjudicate upon it. What case controverted between States was not a political case, except those merely of meum and tuum? Questions arising relative to foreign ambassadors are also political cases.

The power might be humbling to the pride of the States, but it was essential to the General Government, and was intended to be given by the framers. The large and proud States might seek, with more confidence than the smaller and weaker States, to destroy this power. How would Rhode Island and Delaware fare if the General Government could not protect their rights in controversies with more powerful neighbors? He should think that no small State would ever consent to this doctrine.

No, sir, it is the rock of their political salvation. He would warn them to cling to it. Whenever the judiciary should be deprived of the power of deciding controversies between the United States and a State, the great States would eat up the little ones; gentlemen might depend upon it. All the quarrels between the General Government and the United States had originated with the large States. The State of Virginia, in 1798, passed her famous resolutions, going a great length; a little too far; travelling in the road of nullification. What did Massachusetts say on that occasion? [Here Mr. H. read the resolutions passed by the State of Massachusetts relating to the proceedings of Virginia.]

Pennsylvania had a dispute with the General Government on the subject of the Olmstead case. Well, Pennsylvania is a large State; she kicked up her heels, and there was an application made to the military power. Gen. Bright,

"———With his ten thousand men,
"March'd up the hill, and then march'd down again."

The marshal very peaceably executed his precepts. Then that State applied to the other States, saying that there must be some other tribunal to decide cases of this description, instead of the federal court. Virginia replied that the United States Supreme Court was the constituted tribunal, and that no better could be found. How did Massachusetts act during the time that the embargo law was in force? She was for declaring the law unconstitutional, and really did so. Pennsylvania and Virginia joined in that opinion. The large States were always troublesome to manage. They would wax faint and kick.

It was believed by the framers of the constitution that there would be some danger of the larger States imposing upon the smaller, and therefore made it a sine qua non that in the Senate each State should be represented equally. What would New Jersey do in a controversy with New York? Though she might have with her talents such as we had seen exhibited here in this debate, she would be obliged to yield. If there were no supreme tribunal, the rich and powerful States would oppress the smaller, who would stand no chance with them. The large ones would eat up the small ones. How would it be with respect to Delaware and Pennsylvania if there was no common tribunal? Little Delaware would fight hard, but in vain. How would it be with Rhode Island and Massachusetts? The small State would be obliged to yield to the large one.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BISS] had said that no process could be devised to compel a sovereign State to yield to the judgment given in favor of another sovereign State. He thought he was lawyer enough to devise a process to make Massachusetts come into court and answer to Rhode Island. [Here Mr. H. named the various processes that would be necessary to effect that object.] Yes, he could put the little State of Rhode Island in such a position, that, if Massachusetts were to attempt to disturb her, she might double her fist and say, "Touch me if you dare!" In giving this great power, he admitted there is much danger, but not so much as may appear at first sight.

The power must be vested somewhere, and where else can it be vested? If we give any power at all, we must give as much as is given in this bill. It was a high-handed power, he admitted, but not more high-handed than the power assumed by a State to nullify the laws of the Federal Government. Legislative power was not in so much danger of being abused as was power vested in the hands of the Executive. This bill gave to the President all the power which the circumstances exacted, but it gave him no more. He was never too much disposed to give power to a President, and to this President he would not give it quite so soon as he would to any other. The remedy against the abuse of power was here; and the construction of the Government itself. The House of Representatives is only elected for two years, when they must be accountable to their constituents. Senators are elected for six years, when they must answer to their States for the share they have taken in the federal administration. In both branches there is an equal responsibility to the body politic. The President himself is also responsible to the people, acting through their representatives; and in consequence of these securities, the danger of the abuse of power was very much diminished. After all, if a State conceived itself to be injured by any abuse of power, it had the right to appeal to the good sense of the community, and could apply for an amendment of the constitution. Then, after that, came the last remedy—revolution. If the whole people were so depraved, so corrupt, and so bent on oppression, that there was no hope of any redress, then the only remedy was revolution. But the gentleman from Kentucky had put an extreme case, a case which was not even to be supposed; one which the framers of the constitution never had contemplated; but still, if such case should ever occur, then the remedy must be revolution. It had been said there was danger to be apprehended from the investment of this power in the hands of the Executive. But it appeared to him that when the gentlemen who made this observation were sticking against giving the President these powers, after what they had done in former instances, they were straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel.

If the people made the constitution, or if they adopted it, the secession of a State was, in his opinion, impossible, because the laws of the United States, made under that constitution, are binding on every citizen of every State. All owe allegiance to the United States. How was it possible for an individual to go off, to secede? He might go and expatriate himself, but he could not go off, and yet remain in the Union; he could not remain within the jurisdiction of the United States, and yet be out of the operation of the federal power. He might go away from the shores of the United States, but he could not otherwise secede. And the States stood in the same condition. Both States and individuals stood on the same ground. If he was not right in his conviction that the ultimate determination of power was in the United States, he would ask—where is it? It is somewhere. Where? If there be no power any where, why then it existed nowhere; and the question could not be decided. The gentleman from Kentucky insisted that the power did not exist, although it was right before his eyes. It was a common thing for a man to assume his conclusions first, and to look for his premises afterwards. But it must have been hard work for the gentleman to deny the existence of a power which was staring him in the face. There are sectarians of all kinds, who lay down their conclusions first, and then look about for their premises to sustain them. There was a preacher of that kind in his section of the country, who would always begin with his conclusions, and work up to his premises. On one occasion he took for his text a sentence of Thomas, and endeavored to expound it on his old principle. He labored on for some time, becoming more and more perplexed as he proceeded, and concluding in the midst of mist and confusion, leaving his congregation about as ignorant of his meaning as he himself was. One of his auditors, after the conclusion of his sermon, took occasion to speak to him, and to suggest that he seemed to have boggled a little in his discourse, and was not quite so lucid as usual. Why, said he, I thought I had made a very excellent argument, a very good argument, indeed, from my text; but between you and me, I would rather Thomas had never said it. So it was, he presumed, with the gentleman from Kentucky: that gentleman was so perplexed by the reading of the constitution, that he wished the constitution had never said it.

Suppose that the Federal Government were to permit South Carolina to carry her point, and to have things just as she desired. The principle being extended thus far, where would the Government stop? South Carolina, he would suppose, had made her regulations to admit goods into her ports without the payment of duty. In reference to commercial advantage, this would at once destroy the equality between the States. South Carolina would exclusively enjoy the benefit of this regulation, to the injury of all the others. On this principle any State may nullify the laws of the Union. Suppose that Rhode Island had adopted a provision that no law of the United States which did not adopt the principle of the protective system should be considered as constitutional, on the ground that the principle of protection is recognised by the constitution. She has the same right as South Carolina to adopt nullification. And suppose that South Carolina should declare that no law should be constitutional which adopted the principle of protection. These conflicting opinions of the States would place the Federal Government in a position where its action is sure to be wrong. If a law should be passed to protect goods, South Carolina would oppose it. If any such law should be repealed, the repeal would be opposed in Rhode Island. Each State would seat herself on her reserved rights, and would set the laws of the General Government at defiance. So, if the State of Mississippi should take it into her head to seat herself on her reserved rights in reference to the freedom of the navigation of the Mississippi, she might defy the United States with the same propriety. Suppose that Indiana was to adopt the principle that had been already by some, that she had an exclusive right to the public lands within her limits; and, acting on that opinion, was to pass a law declaring that none of the titles granted by the United States Government were good. She, seating herself on her reserved rights, might also cause some trouble and confusion.

Again: suppose that the State of Maine should assert that all the fisheries on her coast belong exclusively to her, and that the vessels of no other State have a right to fish there; and, further, that the State of Pennsylvania should insist, that by the laws of nature and of God, every man is entitled to the privilege of freedom, and that no law, no provision of the constitution of the United States, could sanction slavery, and should proceed accordingly to oppose the laws on this subject. He (Mr. H.) would ask gentlemen to apply this doctrine that a State can decide for itself, and nullify a law of Congress and the constitution, and leave them to say in what a situation they would find themselves. It was not his intention to disturb that delicate question, nor to provoke any discussion from gentlemen whose situation rendered them so sensitive on the subject.

If, indeed, we were not to hold together, he would ask in what condition the slave-holding States would be? It is not a very easy thing to prove that a State has a right to judge for itself how far it is bound to obedience, and that, on the contrary, individuals have not that right: two cases running parallel to each other. Was he (Mr. H.) to reason himself into the belief that he, as a community belonging to one State, had a right to resist laws which others obeyed, and, judging for himself, place himself upon his reserved rights? And suppose that a class of individuals should be found carrying out this idea to a still more awful extent, it might be productive of effects at which he did not dare to glance. They would be most horrible, but not so horrible as the idea that this constitution should be broken up at the will of any one of the States. What, he would ask, had been our construction of the constitution? He had endeavored to show, in the first place, that the people of the States could form a constitution, and give to the States sufficient power; 2dly, that they so designed; and, 3dly, that they had done it.

He would now ask what had been the opinions of the large States as to the powers of the General Government? At the very first session of the first Congress this power was assumed in the great judiciary bill for a final determination of all questions between the United States and a State. The 25th section of that bill had been a standing law through all the different administrations of the Government. It was passed in the Senate by a vote of 14 to 6—South Carolina voting unanimously in its favor; and it passed the House of Representatives without a division. No attempt was made during the whole discussion of that bill to strike out the 25th section of it, which has been a standing law ever since. It was considered as the sheet anchor of the constitution, that which was to hold us together eventually through all the storms of politics which might occur. Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts failed in their powerful attempts to resist the constitutionality of this section. Why had not the section been repealed, if it was so unconstitutional? Congress dared not repeal it, for the repeal of that section would break up the Union.

It had been asked what was the necessity for this bill? What had South Carolina done? He could only answer that she had done this, she had done nothing more than to repeal our laws, and to make it highly criminal to execute them. She had repealed them in many points, as he showed by a reference to her acts, and she had also done a few other things. She had raised an army to carry on a contest against the United States. This was easily shown. She had raised an army to enforce the execution of her own laws, which have repealed the laws of the United States; and, in doing this, had she not raised an army to carry on a contest with the United States? It was a direct aggression. He would adapt the law precisely to meet the case. The State of South Carolina would have no good reason to complain if the penalties prescribed by the laws of the United States for violating their laws were no greater than those which she has enacted for a violation of hers. There could be no great cruelty in this course. Mr. H. then read the fines and penalties imposed by the acts of South Carolina. He stated that the General Government was, by the provisions of these laws, placed in a situation where she was obliged to legislate so as to meet the whole case.

The gentleman from Kentucky said that the Federal Government had been unjust to South Carolina. This word brought up the whole question. He was not disposed to do injustice to any one, nor did he believe there was any ground for the declaration that there had been any thing unjust done to South Carolina. We had also been told by the same gentleman that we must forgive as we hope to be ourselves forgiven. But it ought to be remembered that forgiveness must be preceded by repentance. Now South Carolina, instead of exhibiting any signs of repentance, had set herself in array against the United States. And the Federal Government would set a bad example to the other States, if, without repentance on the part of South Carolina, they must forgive this hostility. As the case now stands, the whole conciliation must come from one side.

Sir, I have done, continued Mr. H. [looking on the portrait of Washington, at the left of the door.] That portrait ought not to be here; it is a cruel admonition upon us, who have rejected his counsels and disregarded his precepts. It was, you recollect, difficult to gain it admission. You first placed it over the clock yonder; there it was looking down upon revolving time; it was pale, languishing, and I thought it wept. It seemed to be reflecting upon the changes of the last thirty years. It was removed, and placed over the President's chair; still it cast a melancholy look at the clock. At length you have shoved it away to the left. I don't complain—a fit emblem of our abandonment of his principles. Look! his lips appear to move, and he seems to say what he once before said—

"The unity of Government, which constitutes you one people, is also dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquillity at home, your honor abroad; of your safety, of your prosperity, of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters, much pain will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken, in your minds, the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed, it is of infinite moment that you should properly estimate the immense value of your National Union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to speak of it as the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can in any event be abandoned, and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of any attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts."

And further to add:—O my children! was it for this I endured the privations, sufferings, and dangers, which gave you national existence? Was it for this, that I watched over your infant days with a parent's solicitude? Was it for this, I marked your growth to manhood with a parent's partiality? Oh, what a fatal lesson have you given to the friends of liberty and humanity throughout the world! Sir, I, who have flitted like the bird from spray to spray, sometimes laughing, sometimes weeping, sometimes playing with the flowers of fancy, and now and then reasoning, must wind off at last somewhat "in the glooms." I cannot endure the reflection that this fair and perfect fabric of human wisdom, so fair and perfect that we would almost say "the hand that made it is divine," should so soon dissolve, and, "like the baseless fabric of a vision, leave not a wreck behind." The thought is horrific! Can it be? I cannot give it up; I will nourish and cherish it, as a friend on his bed of death. I will watch its departing spirit with the most anxious solicitude, and, if I can, will lure it back to life; and after it is finally gone, I will observe its remains, and cast a longing, lingering look on each form and feature; impress them upon my heart, and stamp them upon the tablet of my memory; and I would cherish them as the memory of joys that are past, "pleasant and painful to the soul." No, sir, I will not despair; I will hope even against hope. Why should I distrust a kind and benignant Providence who planted us here, and has reared us up to what we are? I will believe that He who has so often made bare his arm in defence of the infant liberties of our country will pardon and protect us still; that He who has so long held these stars in his own right hand, and walked so long in the midst of these his golden candlesticks, will be our "cloud by day and pillar of fire by night," to guide and direct us in the path of constitutional freedom.

Mr. TYLER then obtained the floor, but gave way to Mr. BROWN, who explained, that he had never denied the constitutionality of the 25th section, nor defended nullification.

Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 6. PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the joint committee appointed to ascertain and report the mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, reported a resolution, fixing on Wednesday next as the day for counting the votes, when the Senate will attend the House for the purpose of witnessing the examination of the votes. The hour appointed for the proceedings is 1 o'clock. The resolution was agreed to.

HOOR FOR THE SPECIAL ORDER.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. WILKINS, to change the hour for calling the special order from one o'clock to twelve o'clock every day being taken up,

Mr. SMITH opposed the resolution, because it would preclude the possibility of acting on many private bills of great importance to individuals.

Mr. WILKINS said, his reason for offering the motion was obvious. The bill standing as a special order was by far the most important bill of the session, and his object was to gain an hour in the morning, as almost every Senator would be anxious to deliver his sentiments.

Mr. GRUNDY seconded the views of the Senator from Pennsylvania. He saw no hope of getting through the debate on this bill, unless the motion should be adopted, before the end of the next week.

Mr. SMITH moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. WILKINS asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and stood as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bibb, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Foot, Forsyth, King, Miller, Moore, Smith, Tyler.—11.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Black, Brown, Buckner, Dallas, Ewing, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Holmes, Kane, Knight, Naudain, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sprague, Tipton, White, Wilkins, Wright.—21.

The resolution was then agreed to.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

Mr. BUCKNER then moved to take up the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road from Vandalia to Jefferson; which was agreed to—Yeas 15, nays 10:

The question being on a motion by Mr. BENTON, to amend, by inserting the words, "to provide for the further extension of the road to the mouth of the Kansas river."

The yeas and nays being ordered, the question was taken, and decided in the negative—Yeas 9, nays 20.

Mr. SMITH then moved to strike out the words "Jefferson," &c. and to insert the words "to some point in the State of Missouri."

The amendment was opposed by Mr. BUCKNER and Mr. HENDRICKS, and was finally rejected.

The bill was then reported without amendment. The yeas and nays were then ordered on the engrossment of the bill, and the question being taken, it was decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Chambers, Clay, Dallas, Ewing, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Kane, Poindexter, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wilkins.—18.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Brown, Foot, Forsyth, Hill, King, Knight, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Prentiss, Rives, Smith, Tyler, White.—16.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

The Senate then proceeded to consider the bill to authorize the purchase of the private stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal.

Mr. HENDRICKS gave an exposition, at some length, of the views which operated on the committee, and induced them to report the bill.

Some debate took place, in which Mr. SMITH, Mr. DALLAS, and Mr. POINDEXTER took part; when, on motion of Mr. SMITH, the bill was laid on the table for the present.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

The Senate then proceeded to consider the bill to provide further for the collection of the duties on imports.

Mr. TYLER began by saying that many of his friends here had advised him to remain silent on this occasion. He duly appreciated the feelings which governed them. He well knew the situation in which he stood both here and elsewhere. He knew that he had formidable opponents to encounter; that the slightest expression, although uttered "trippingly on the tongue," was but too apt to be turned to his disadvantage, and might, in the end, prove fatal to his interests. He had, however, resolved to pursue the path of duty, and, disregarding all personal considerations, to step forward the advocate of the political doctrines, to the maintenance of which his life had been devoted. He might be called rash and precipitate. Be it so, said Mr. T.; I came into political life the advocate of certain great principles, which I cannot and will not abandon; and if those principles were to be yielded, I should take my departure from the Senate with only one regret, which would be, that my State should have surrendered the position she had always maintained, and relinquished those doctrines, on the maintenance of which I believe the safety, the liberty, and enduring happiness of the country mainly depended. If I could hesitate as to my course, now that the storm is raging, the battlements rocking, and our institutions trembling to their foundations, I should be derelict to my highest duty, and recreant to the great trust confided to me. Under these circumstances, "the dust of the mêlée must be the breath of my nostrils."

I shall enter upon the task before me, by remarking, that, through all time, and in all countries, and under every form of Government, there had existed two great parties; the one advocating unlimited power in Government; the other jealous of power, and watchful of its aberrations or excesses. All history verified this remark; no matter what the form of Government. No matter how despotic or tyrannical, the despot has his flatterers; the tyranny has its supporters, and the bloody sceptre its agents and worshippers. The throne is looked upon as an object of idolatry, and the monarch regarded as the immediate vicegerent of the Almighty, to touch a hair of whose head is sacrilege against the Lord's anointed. That other party, which has the boldness to maintain popular rights, is most commonly the weakest; it has fearful odds to encounter. The power of Government; its splendor, which is but too apt to dazzle the eye and mislead the judgment; its patronage—all constitute formidable and almost unconquerable opponents. But there is another almost as great; its prevalence is felt particularly with an agricultural community, the vis inertia of mankind; that disposition for tranquillity and repose which is often not overcome until the hour for action has passed; and it but too often happens that, when the slumber is broken, the chains are so riveted, and the limbs so manacled, that all hope of effectual resistance has vanished.

It is not a matter of astonishment that these pernicious influences should have exerted their sway in our own favored land. We felt the influence of this division of parties during the revolutionary war. We had then the whig party and the tory party. The tory had fixed his gaze on the English diadem, and was dazzled and blinded by the rays which issued from it. He thought only of the power which had protected the colonies in their infancy.

Revenue Collection Bill.

[SENATE.]

He venerated the land in whose bosom reposed the remains of his ancestors, and regarded the Government of Great Britain as standing out from amidst the Governments of the world, the most free and the strongest. These feelings and these ties made the tomes of the revolution. For one, I am willing to concede, that, however misguided, many of them acted under their strongest conceptions of duty. They had been taught from their infancy to chant "God save the King," and to celebrate, by festivals, the birthday of their sovereign. For my part, I can find in my heart a grain of charity even towards these misguided men.

When it became necessary to form constitutions for the respective States, we find that there were many who sought to make Government strong; to impart to it energy, in order to keep it from being destroyed by those for whose exclusive benefit it was formed; without recollecting that man, when invested with authority, is the most dangerous animal to his species. When I reflect upon the course of human affairs, the unhappy influences which are felt under all Governments, and under all systems, I am almost led to doubt whether nations are capable of profiting by experience. The past has existed in vain. History displays its page, but the blood upon it frightens not. Governments have flourished and decayed, and yet the monitory lessons which they teach us are utterly forgotten.

I pass on to the consideration of the state of parties which existed in the convention which formed the present Government of the United States. In that convention there were three parties; at the head of one stood Alexander Hamilton; the second was composed of the deputies from the large States; and the middle-sized and small States composed the third, who did not agree with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HOLMES,] but saw the necessity of giving a federal character to the Government, or, more properly, of preserving that character, without which the small States would be crushed, or become but tributaries to the large ones. Every body knew that Alexander Hamilton was the advocate of a monarchical Government. He proposed a Governor for life, seeking to recommend his system by the use of titles, with which the people were familiar, and a Senate for life. He had no hesitation in avowing his belief that the British Government formed a model worthy of all acceptance, and, to use his own language, "the necessity of establishing a Government which would annihilate the State distinctions and State operations." I do not wish to be considered as speaking in reproach of the memory of that great man, who, during his day, was the idol of the then predominant party, and whose political opinions are still considered as the shibboleth of the true faith. For vigor of intellect, he had no superior. I believe that his purposes were all honest; and, for the boldness of his determination in the pursuit of his objects, his name is proverbial. I speak only of his acts, avouched as they are by the journals of the convention. It is not necessary to add that his scheme met with but few supporters, and that he and they promptly threw themselves into the ranks of the second party, which advocated a Government almost as strong, and equally destructive "of State distinctions and State operations"—the national party. At the head of that party, or among its most prominent members, stood the late Edmund Randolph, of Virginia. I knew him well, sir. He had for a short time the direction of my studies, before I attained the period of manhood. I cannot, then, entertain feelings of disrespect to his memory, or be capable of manifesting any unkindness towards him. I would not disturb the ashes of the dead, even if I could. Edmund Randolph at that time occupied a large space in the public eye. He was a prominent man, not only in the legal profession, but in the political world. He ranked among the first advocates of his day, and stood high in the public councils; but, so far as the evidences of his political opinions have come down to us, I am not prepared to admire him as a politician. He proposed a supreme national Government, with a supreme Executive, a supreme Legislature, and a supreme Judiciary, and a power in Congress to veto State laws.

Mr. Madison, I believe, sir, was also an advocate of this plan of Government. If I fall into error upon this point, I can easily be put right. The design of this plan, it is obvious, was to render the States nothing more than the provinces of a great Government, to rear upon the ruins of the old confederacy a consolidated Government, one and indivisible. This plan held the ascendancy for a time. The large States were its advocates. New York gave a divided vote; one of her members saw but darkly her immense resources which were sooner or later to be developed, and which were to entitle her to the appellation of the Empire State; the other either did not look through the vista into futurity, or reasoned more wisely than his colleague, that the promised advantages to the large States were altogether illusory and deceptive. He probably foresaw that the weak would combine against the strong, and often succeed in binding her in the chains of their policy. The nationals shared the fate of the monarchists, and, in the end, were entirely routed, their scheme annihilated, and their party overthrown. To Delaware, a small spot, then, as now, on the broad face of the Union, but exercising then, as now, the influence which talents of the highest order never fails to insure, we are indebted for the Federal Government under which we live. I pay her this encomium most willingly; for I consider our frame of Government the happiest that can be devised, and, if properly administered, destined to elevate us to a height of prosperity which no other people have ever attained. Mr. Dickinson seems first to have taken a stand in favor of a Federal Government. He required the deputies to look at their instructions. He asked them if they were authorized to vote for a monarchical Government, or for a supreme national Government, which would trample down and ride over the prostrate States? No, they had been sent there to revise the articles of the old confederation; to infuse more ardor and vigor into the federal system; to breathe into it new life, and to impart to it a new soul; to do all this, and not to make war upon its very existence and being. If the operations of Government are paralyzed, apply the proper stimulus to produce a healthful action; if you want a Supreme Court, create one to carry every constitutional provision of law into effect; if the requisitions made upon the several States of the confederacy for their respective quotas are disregarded, apply a remedy to the evil; if you want money for the just expenses of the Government, collect the taxes. Do all things necessary to give renewed life and vitality to the confederation of these States, but go no further. Revise, but do not change the articles of our copartnership. Let us have no monarchical or national Government. I make a similar requisition upon Senators now. The attempt is now made to do that very thing which was scouted out of the convention—to convert this Government into a consolidated national Government—from a league among States, which its term imports, into the Government of a single nation. I will not fatigue the Senate and exhaust myself by reading those instructions. I will content myself with saying that they, each and all, required the formation of a federal Union by an improvement of the old articles of confederation. These instructions constitute the source, the very head-spring from which this Government has flowed, and bring into bold relief its true theory and principles.

The old confederacy had been spoken of as possessing no power: the contrary was the fact; its powers were large and extensive: to declare war; to make peace; to form alliances; to make treaties; and the Congress, under it, possessed many of the most important powers now exercised by the Supreme Court. Many of the provisions of the present constitution were taken, almost totidem verbis, from the articles of confederation. The Senators from Maine and New Jersey [Messrs. HOLMES and FÄLINDERSEN] lay great stress upon the phrase "we, the people;" but the objects specified in the clause commencing with those words are the same which were stated in the articles of confederation—"the common defence, the security of liberty, and of the mutual and general welfare." Why, sir, they are almost the very words of the constitution. I recommend it to Senators to take up those old articles, and deliberately compare them with the provisions of the present constitution. If you will do so, we shall hear no more of the confederacy not being a Government. Sir, it carried us through the revolutionary war, that darkest period in our history, with the exception of the present. The truth is, this Government is but an improvement upon that. There every thing was concentrated in Congress; it constituted the executive, legislative, and judiciary tribunal. By this constitution those powers are now more wisely distributed among the departments. That Government had no power to lay and collect a revenue for the purpose of carrying on its operations; to this, that power is given. Under that, there was but one legislative branch; here, you have two. This Government is but a superstructure erected upon the old confederacy, possessing more beauty of proportion, more harmony of design, and demanding of foreign nations more confidence and respect. Let us learn to admire the beautiful system under which we live, and not seek to convert it into what it is not. Every thing, Mr. President, is running into nationality. You cannot walk along the streets without seeing the word on almost every sign—national hotel, national boot-black, national blacksmith, national oyster-house. (Mr. MANGUM, in an undertone, "The newspapers.")—Mr. T. "I let them alone, no man gets any thing by intermeddling with them.") The Government was created by the States, is amendable by the States, is preserved by the States, and may be destroyed by the States; and yet we are told that it is not a Government of the States. But the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FÄLINDERSEN] will have it that it was ratified by the people, and loudly proclaims it to be the people's Government. I ask, by what people? Why, by the people of the States. If it had been intended to collect the sense of a majority of all the people inhabiting the States, the most unfortunate mode of accomplishing that was devised that could have been thought of. The small States of Rhode Island and Delaware had a voice equally potential with the large States of Massachusetts and Virginia; and by the mode adopted, a minority might have palmed the constitution on a majority. I probably hazard but little in saying, that four of the largest States, viz. Massachusetts as she then was, New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, contained a majority of the population of the then thirteen States; and yet the ratification of nine States, with a minority of people, might have adopted the constitution over the heads and against the wishes of a decided majority. No, sir, no such design entered into the contemplation of those who formed the Government. Each State decided the question of adoption or rejection for itself. Little Rhode Island threw herself upon her sovereignty, and for some time refused her assent and ratification. I do not underrate the importance of this State because it is of small size. I feel an interest in seeing its rights preserved and asserted. I was the other day much gratified when the Senator farthest from me [Mr. KNOTT] presented to the Senate an official paper from the Executive of that State, (the credentials of Mr. ROBBINS.) The paper was authenticated by the "governor, captain-general, and commander-in-chief of the land and naval forces of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations."

These titles sound gratefully to my ears. They are the only titles worth preserving; all others are idle gewgaws. Yes, sir; let "the governor, captain-general and commander-in-chief of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations" still preserve both the title and power given him by a sovereign State. I would respectfully ask the gentleman to draw a picture; I will permit him to do so from the resources of his imagination, and those I acknowledge to be abundant. Will he embody forth a State without people? The humorous author of Don Quixotte might do it, and Squire Sancho might revel in the fancied delights of an exalted sway. For my own part, I can form no idea, even the most indistinct, of such a shadowy and spectral existence. A State without people! Why, gentlemen might as well talk of a State without land. The very terms employed in the constitution indicated the true character of the Government. The terms "we, the people of the United States" means nothing more or less than "we, the people of the States united."

The pernicious doctrine that this a national and not a federal Government, has received countenance from the late proclamation and message of the President. The people are regarded as one mass, and the States as constituting one nation. I desire to know when this chemical process occurred? When were the States welded together into one mass? Was it before or since the revolution? At what time was Virginia fused into an integral mass with the other States? Was it when she set herself up in opposition to Cromwell, and refused to recognise the commonwealth; asserted her independence of the Protector's Government; declared that the ligament which bound her to England was a ligament which bound her to the crown of England, and that when the head which wore that crown was severed from the body, the tie of her allegiance was also broken? Or was it at the accession of Charles the Second, when she renewed her allegiance by and through a resolution of her House of Burgesses? She then acquired that title which she has borne ever since, "the dominion of Virginia." Or did it occur at a later period? Was it in 1775, when she adopted her State constitution, and exercised complete and sovereign power? Or did it occur when the colonies then became free, sovereign, and independent States; united their common energies and resources to make good their declaration of independence? This position would prove too much: it would go to the extent of proving that France was also amalgamated with the States. She was a party to that war; a most efficient party. She spared neither her treasure nor her blood. Her chivalric sons aided ours in upbearing the flag of freedom. The idea is idle—I had almost said absurd—to attempt to deduce from such a source the doctrine that the States formed one mass, one nation. Why, sir, sovereigns may form a league for war, or any other purpose; that league may be more or less intimate according to its terms; a league to preserve perpetual amity for the advancement of the happiness and welfare of all; the conditions are all subject to the will of the parties.

The conclusion to which this false assumption leads is, that all sovereignty is vested in this Government. And yet it is but a creature of the States—an emanation of their will. It would, with as much force, be contended that an ambassador was a sovereign. The ambassador is bound by his instructions, and are not we? The moment he exceeds his instructions, his power is annulled. The constitution contains our instructions, and, when we exceed our power, we are guilty of a breach of trust, and are responsible to our masters. What sort of sovereignty is this? If we had Hobbes, with his doctrine, that Kings reign by divine right, and are the Lord's anointed, to help us to a source for the sovereignty of this Government, we should still be puzzled to find it. Who created you a Government? You hold your existence at the pleasure of these States, and yet are sovereign over them. They may strike you out of existence by a word; demolish the constitution, and scatter its fragments to the winds; and yet this Government, the breath of their nostrils, dares proclaim itself the only sovereign, and declares the sovereignty of the States a mere nonentity. For my part, I utterly renounce this doctrine. It is not only untrue and illogical, but anti-American. The great American idea was, and is, that sovereignty resides alone with the people, and that public servants are but their agents.

If the Government was not sovereign, it would be difficult to conceive how allegiance could be due to it; for allegiance was only due to sovereignty. There could be no allegiance without citizens; and I should like to know how any one could be a citizen of this Government. I have never seen such a citizen. If there be any such being, I should like to look upon him. I am a citizen of Virginia, and I find in the constitution a provision, that, when I wend my way to New York or any other State, I should become not a citizen of New York or such other State, but entitled "to all the privileges and immunities" of the citizens of that State. If a Marylander comes to Virginia pending an election, he cannot vote, or be returned to the Legislature, because he possesses not the requisites, according to the constitution of that State, in reference to her own citizens. He may hold lands and may alienate his lands, because that is a provision in favor of the citizen; but if the Legislature should enact a law forbidding the alienation of lands, such law would be a rule binding upon the citizens of every other State in the Union holding lands within her borders. The true state of the case is this: It is because I owe allegiance to the State of Virginia, that I owe obedience to the laws of this Government. My State requires me to render such obedience. She has entered into a compact, which, while it continues, is binding on all her people. So would it be if she had formed a treaty with a foreign power. I should be bound to obey the stipulations of such treaty, because she willed it. To this conclusion we must come at last. It is because I owe allegiance there, that I owe obedience here. It is universally admitted that allegiance and protection are reciprocal. I would ask, who protects my rights of person and of property? Who secures me from the prowling thief and assassin's dagger? Is it the Federal Government? No, sir, it is my own State, whose laws surround me like the air, unseen, unfelt, but protect me as with a shield of adamant. What protection does this Government afford me? When I go upon the ocean, the great and common highway of nations, your maritime jurisdiction is with me. I am not on the soil of my State, but I am still protected by her agency and through her means; for it is by reason of the compact she has made with her co-States, that the power of all is over me. She stipulates for the protection of her citizens under such circumstances, and binds herself to aid in affording protection to the citizens of other States under similar circumstances. The mode in which such protection shall be afforded, and the agents to be employed for accomplishing it, are designated by the compact into which she has entered.

The opposite inference which is attempted to be drawn from the mere fact that this Government may punish treason, is, in my opinion, wholly fallacious. Treason against the United States consists "in waging war against them, and giving aid and comfort to their enemies;" war is levied against the United States, or aid is given to their enemies. Now let me put a case. Suppose this feature had not been introduced into the constitution; was it not evident that there would have existed no power to punish the offence designated? would any one State have had a right to punish it? If a citizen of the State of Massachusetts had gone into foreign parts, raised forces, and made a descent upon Virginia, Massachusetts could not have punished the offence, and Virginia could only have regarded the aggressor in the light of an enemy, piratical, predatory, if you please, sir, but still an enemy. No law of treason could have covered the case. The concession of this power by the States was indispensably necessary to the preservation of each, and, by necessary inference, the preservation of the Union. Power to punish this offence is then given, and properly given. But it produces no transfer of allegiance, no more than a right to punish piracy on the high seas. But can this Government punish treason against a State? Suppose a minority oppose the authorities of a State Government; this may or may not be treason against the State, according to its laws; but, as to this Government, it is an insurrection, which, upon demand made by the constituted authorities of the State, it is bound to assist in suppressing. Treason is as well punishable by a State as by this Government; and if the argument proves any thing, it establishes the conclusion, that the State is invested with all the attributes of sovereignty, and that this Government is also invested with complete sovereignty; which leaves the argument in no better condition than we found it; in other words, makes it no argument at all. I think, Mr. President, that it would puzzle the powers of logic, (and I am well aware that I shall be followed by able logicians in this debate,) to prove that a State can commit treason. Against whom can she commit treason? Against the United States? She happens to be one of them; and I take it, that it would be rather difficult to show how she could commit treason against herself.

This amalgamating doctrine is followed out into most singular consequences. Sir, it is said that I do not represent on this floor the State of Virginia, but the United States. Strange hallucination! This I must consider as vital in its consequences. It brings into question the great right of instructions; for if it be true, the State of Delaware has as full and absolute control over my actions as the State of Virginia. No, sir, I repudiate this doctrine; I owe no responsibility, politically speaking, elsewhere than to my State. And if any Senator from that State should dare oppose her instructions, I might say, with perfect confidence, to quote the remarks of one of her most gifted sons, that "if he would not be instructed in his seat, he would very soon be instructed out of it." This doctrine is founded in a gross misconception of the nature and character of our institutions.

I am bound, as the representative of Virginia, to advance the interests of the whole Union, because, by doing so, I elevate her interests; to do justice to all, because she requires it at my hands; to resist every effort to inflict injury upon any, because I am instructed by her motto, "sic semper tyrannis," to avoid injustice and to detest tyranny and oppression; to oppose all laws which are of a dangerous tendency, however small the minority in which I may stand, urged on and encouraged in that course by the moral to be found in that other motto to which she clings, "perseverando." By pursuing these instructions I fulfil her wishes, and contribute all that in me lies to the advancement of the happiness and prosperity of these United States.

Gentlemen might say what they pleased, but such doctrines would convert the States into mere petty corporations, provinces of one great consolidated Government. These principles gave to this Government authority to veto all State laws, not merely by act of Congress, but by the sword and bayonet. They would place the President at the head of the regular army in array against the States, and the sword and cannon would come to be the common arbiter; he might hang and quarter whom he pleased as traitors or transgressors against the rights of the great sovereign power of this Government. No man could be so blind as not to see the results. Before he invested the President with the powers claimed for him, he would like to know whether he could do it safely? I say the President, not Andrew Jackson; I deal in generalities when I ask whether these powers can safely be intrusted to the President. No rule could be established for their exercise but the Executive will. If the case of Georgia was presented to one President, (I am glad that the missionaries are turned out, for one refractory State gives us employment enough,) we should hear of "superadded obligations," while under another she might be patted on the back, and smiled upon graciously, and told that her proceedings were not only just but meritorious. I do not mean to cast reproach on either President, but I cannot consent to live under such a system; it is irrational. Before we commit our dearest rights to the Executive department, let us find out some method of causing all our Presidents to think alike, and thereby prevent them from hanging one man and rewarding another for the very same act. The rules which are now to govern us are locked up in the recesses of the human heart, where no man can read them. Better have at once the laws of the Medes and Persians.

In 1800, all these doctrines were, as I had hoped, put down once and forever. I had not expected that they would at this time have been brought into discussion. For thirty odd years they had been in a state of torpidity, but all of a sudden they are warmed into life, and now bask in the influence of the President's proclamation. Well may the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HOLMES,] upon being so suddenly awakened, be astonished at his bedfellows, and wonder how he has become so thick with them. It was singular, indeed, that the Senator should be found all of a sudden supporting, and I resisting, the measures and principles of the President. I have given to the administration, and am still prepared to give to the administration, as liberal a support as any administration ought reasonably to expect; but I am now fairly distanced by the Senator from Maine. We were told three years ago, in a celebrated debate on a most celebrated resolution, [Mr. Foote's resolution,] that there had existed in by-gone times a firm under the style of "James Madison, Felix Grundy, John Holmes, and," if he could dare mention the other partner, "the Devil." The Senator from Tennessee withdrew his name publicly from the concern, and that of the senior partner, declaring that they would have nothing to do with the rest of the concern, and expressed the hope that his Satanic majesty would take good care of the other partner. I should like to know if the majority of the old firm have again united, and are now carrying on business.

[Mr. HOLMES begged the Senator from Virginia to yield the floor while he corrected a slight error which the gentleman had made in his statements relative to the affairs of the firm. The original firm was "James Madison, Felix Grundy, and the Devil." The Senator from Tennessee withdrew, and inserted my name, leaving me and his Satanic majesty to manage the concerns of the firm. If the Senator from Virginia wishes to know how the concern stands at present, he would inform him that his Satanic majesty had gone over to the nullifiers, and much about the same time with the Senator from Virginia.*]

Mr. TYLER resumed: He had concluded that his Satanic majesty had obtained a complete mastery over the whole concern, for he should show that nothing but the workings of his spirit could have produced such a bill as this.

The question of secession was not now regularly under consideration. It would be highly improper now to agitate it. I will throw out no remark, said Mr. T., limited as would be the influence which my opinions would have over the conduct of others, which could, by possibility, be construed, however remotely, into an inducement to any State in this Union to withdraw from it. I will rather take instructions, in this respect, from the course which the Legislature of Virginia has but recently adopted, who left out of her decision this question, when she had the subject of federal relations under consideration. It was a great, he would say a vital question, and should not be decided hastily or precipitately. I protest, however, against the right of the President to decide it for Congress. It is a question which exclusively refers itself to the co-States, or their representatives here. The President had announced his decision, somewhat authoritatively, to the public; and this constitutes, with me, no inconsiderable reason against voting him military power to carry into execution this foregone conclusion. To arm him with military power is to give him authority to crush South Carolina, should she adopt secession. When the question comes up, (I trust it never will,) should the decision be formally pronounced against the right of secession, it would come to be a subject worthy of all reflection, whether the military arm should be exerted, or other measures of a milder nature, but equally efficacious, be resorted to. It would probably be found that the course of commercial restrictions on the commerce of a seceding State would be more effectual to bring her back into the Union than the employment of a hundred thousand armed men. These were weighty subjects, and their decision should never be anticipated. I cannot believe, sir, that any State will ever consent to forego the blessings of union, without the greatest pressure and extremity of suffering.

In relation to the Supreme Court, he had but a few words to say. I entertain all due respect for the judges of that august tribunal. Towards the venerable Chief Justice I cannot express myself too warmly. In the midst of all the changes of a fitful era, he has been uniformly the same. From the rising to the setting of the sun, he has known no change. The country has known where to find him, and he has deceived no man in regard to his political opinions. Consistency in a politician is a virtue of the highest order. You know always when to trust and how to trust such a man, for he never deceives you. Unlike the changelings of the hour, the butterflies that assume new color with every passing day, circumstances transpire and time rolls on, but he knows no change. Such has been, and still is, Chief Justice Marshall. We are at a loss which most to admire, the profound knowledge and logical accuracy which he displays, or the purity and innocence of his life. Whether I agree or differ from such a man on political subjects, such difference can in naught abate from my admiration and respect for him as a man and as a citizen. Will I intrust my life to him? Yes. My property? Yes. But, I tell you, that the Chief Justice cannot still the roaring of cannon, or the noise of drums, when Governments are in the field. There can be but one ultimate arbiter when matters have attained that crisis, and that is the sword. I trust it will be very long before we come to such an issue.

The Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILKINS,] and in this example he had been followed by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] has cited a certain preamble and resolution adopted by the General Assembly of Virginia, in the year 1809, upon a proposition from the State of Pennsylvania to establish a common arbiter to decide questions arising between a State court and the United States court. The proposition itself was somewhat extraordinary, since it was confined by its terms to the sole case of a difference in opinion between the courts, and omitted any provision for collisions between other departments of the two Governments. The resolutions and preamble referred to were adopted by a unanimous vote. I stated, upon another occasion, that perfect unanimity in a legislative body on any question of interest, furnished generally the strongest evidence that the subject had not been examined. The accuracy of this opinion had been somewhat tested in the Pennsylvania Legislature this winter. Last winter that body was unanimous in its opposition to any reduction of the tariff; I am happy to find that this is no longer the case, a small minority having been found there entertaining different opinions; and my hope is, that that minority will acquire daily strength. But there is no general rule without an exception, and an exception was found in the proposition from Pennsylvania in 1809. How would it be possible to establish a common arbiter possessing sufficient impartiality in the decision of controversies between this Government and a State? By whom to be appointed, and how preserved, unaffected by those influences which operate more or less sensibly on all public agents? The Supreme Court might well be esteemed better qualified for the task than any new tribunal which could be established. As to the reasoning contained in the preamble, the probability is, that it was not examined. The resolution embodied the sentiments of the General Assembly; and I put it to the candor of honorable Senators to say, if they would not consider it rather unjust if they were held answerable for all the errors and inaccuracies contained in reports daily laid upon our table, into which no one cares to look. If gentlemen were desirous of ascertaining the true sentiments of Virginia on the interesting subject discussed by them, I refer them to the celebrated report drawn by Mr. Madison, in the year 1800, wherein this subject is fully examined. And if they require to be informed of the existing state of public opinion in Virginia, I refer them to the recent proceedings of the Legislature of that State, which has again reiterated the decision pronounced by it in 1800. I desire to add one more remark before I quit this branch of the subject. Compliments were daily paid to Virginia. She was called "the Old Dominion," "good old Virginia." While she is thus complimented, her advice is rarely ever followed; her doctrines are contemned; and it is supposed that full compensation is found for all this in the use of soothing epithets and flattering phrases. If you would only give her credit for honesty, and follow her doctrines, then, my life on it, the spectacle now exhibited would never be seen again. I would undertake to say, that if the doctrines of Virginia were followed out, collisions would never arise between the Government of the United States and the State Governments. Her doctrine is simply this: exert no other power than that which was confided to you. Instead of looking at Virginia as she is at present looked at, she ought to be regarded as she deserved. If found nodding at her post, if found slumbering for a moment, every forgotten word, every careless report is hunted up, brought forth against her, and cited as the Virginia doctrine. I would say, follow her true doctrines; listen to her as a sister. She has made great sacrifices on the altar of the Union. There is no State in this Union more desirous to preserve the institutions of the country. If you listen to her now, you will restore harmony to the country.

My honorable friend from Pennsylvania has alluded to the whiskey insurrection, and, in no unfriendly spirit, has said that that insurrection had arisen in that very strip of land which was formerly a matter of controversy between his State and mine; from which he would have it inferred, that Virginia was justly chargeable with that proceeding. Now I submit it to the Senator to say, if he does not think it rather unfair, after having obtained, by hook or by crook, that which was fairly ours, to debit us with all the offences of which the inhabitants might afterwards be guilty? The fact was, that the land was ours rightfully, honestly; but Pennsylvania put in her claim to it, and her citizens nullified the decisions of our courts, and, in some instances, gave our people black eyes and bloody noses. For whatsoever may be the opinion of the world to the contrary, the old fashioned play of rough roll and tumble is as well understood in Pennsylvania as in Kentucky. Sir, we had either to fight or back out; and it was thought better, by the men of that day, to give up the land than to fight for it. The people dwelling on this side of that line are in favor of good order; they hated all schemes which were likely to interrupt the tranquillity of society; they were against the whiskey insurrection, and assisted to put it down, and would be found at all times opposed to whatever would put into jeopardy the stability of our institutions. I leave, therefore, the whiskey insurrection, where it properly belongs, to the State of Pennsylvania; and the honorable Senator may adjust the whole matter with his neighbors of Pittsburgh and its vicinity. Mr. T. begged pardon of the Senate for this deviation from the course of his remarks, and would return to that course, and relieve the Senate with as much speed as possible.

Sir, said he, if any man would run a comparison between a federal system, such as we have, and a consolidated system, he could not fail to express his warmest admiration at the beauty of the first. When I contemplate the difference between them, it has struck me with astonishment, that any portion of this Union should desire to see a consolidated Government established on the ruins of a federal republic; that beautiful system which, if truly carried out, was calculated to render us the happiest and most powerful people on the face of the earth. He could compare it to nothing so properly as the solar system. It was the sun (the Federal Government) giving light, heat, and attraction to the planets revolving round it in their proper orbits. No two could come in contact with each other; they rolled on in ceaseless splendor, so long as they preserved the course pointed out by the constitution. It was impossible for them to come into collision either with the Government, or with each other, so long as they were confined within their proper orbits. The people of the States were attached to the State Governments, to whom they looked for protection, and to the Federal Government, which guaranteed the safety of the whole. The State Governments exercise a paternal sway; they regulate the domestic concerns, prescribe the rules of property, the punishment of crimes, the internal police, and throw the ægis of protection over the family circle. To this are confided the great powers of peace and war; the sword and the purse are here. Power, however, often forgets right. The States act as sentinels upon the watch-tower to give the alarm on the approach of tyranny; and, being organized into Governments, stand ready, after all other measures shall fail, and the only alternative is slavery or resistance, to resist.

Take, on the other hand, a consolidated Government—the States but mere petty corporations—and what would be the consequences? Would such a Government secure and retain the confidence and affection of the people, or promote their interest? It would be a mere Government of parchment, dependent on the will of an arbitrary majority, and he would not care how it was disposed of. You might burn it, if you pleased, at the point of the bayonet. Could any man coming from Maine or Massachusetts understand the rights and interests of the people of Maryland or Virginia, or legislate properly for their interior concerns? It was in vain to think of it.

Mr. T. said he thought he had long seen a tendency towards consolidation in the legislation of Congress. He would show how it worked. First, the power was assumed to direct the internal improvement throughout the Union; next the power to regulate domestic industry; and last comes the right to carry on a system of general education.

one, and why preserve them at all? Would the people long endure two sets of tax-gatherers clutching at the fruits of their industry? No, sir, the State Governments would become useless, only serving to encumber and retard the machinery, and would speedily pass out of existence. What follows? The concentration of augmented power here would swell the importance of the Presidential office. Popular convulsions would inevitably follow. The public mind would be fretted by the constant collision of parties, and all would adopt the expedient which was most readily at hand. The Presidential term would first be enlarged for a greater number of years; then extended for life; and the sceptre would speedily be handed over to the lineal issue; a "hic jacet" would be all that would remain to inform after ages that this had once been the land of the free. These things must not be. Rely upon it, the people are rousing; "the Campbells are coming." The banner of State rights hovers over the lakes and spreads its broad folds over the distant waters of the West. The patriots who have heretofore been separated by the ephemeral contests of the day, will come back again and settle down with us on the great common principles which the preservation of the Federal Union calls upon us to defend. I have no fear of the ultimate result; "truth is mighty, and will prevail." Many will be overwhelmed in the first onset, myself, probably, among the number; because the power we have to oppose is gigantic; but victory in the end is certain. These principles had triumphed in 1800, when they had to encounter disadvantages equally great, and, if they fail now, the days of this republic may be considered as numbered.

I have not argued these questions with any reference to South Carolina; my own State, every State in the Union, is interested in their decision. I leave South Carolina to take care of herself; she rests in the hands of her able Senators on this floor. I disclaim the policy adopted by her; all here know that I did not approve of her course. I will not join in the denunciations which have been so loudly thundered against her, nor will I deny that she has much cause of complaint. She has put much at hazard, but I trust we shall have a safe deliverance from our present condition, and that all cause of complaint may speedily be put an end to; I leave her, therefore, where I found her, without at this time making further reference to her.

In the course of the examination I have made into this subject, I have been led to analyze certain doctrines which have gone out to the world over the signature of the President. I know that my language may be seized on by those who are disposed to carp at my course and to misrepresent me. Since I have held a place on this floor, I have not courted the smiles of the Executive; but whenever he had done any act in violation of the constitutional rights of the citizen, or trenching on the rights of the Senate, I have been found in opposition to him. When he appointed corps of editors to office, I thought it was my duty to oppose his course. When he appointed a minister to a foreign court without the sanction of law, I also went against him, because, on my conscience, I believed that the act was wrong. Such was my course, acting, as I did, under a sense of the duty I owed to my constituents; and I will now say, I care not how loudly the trumpet may be sounded, nor how low the priests may bend their knees before the object of their idolatry, I will be at the side of the President, crying in his ear, "Remember, Philip, thou art mortal!"

I now come to the most important part of the work which I have to perform. I shall now proceed to touch the bill itself; and I propose to dissect its provisions and expose its enormities. He should take it up by sections, because he believed that the work had not yet been done, and he desired that the Senate should be fully advised of the character of the bill before they enacted it into a law. He regarded it as the first fruit of the doctrines he had combated.

I object to the first section, because it confers on the President the power of closing old ports of entry and establishing new ones. It has been rightly said by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRAN] that this was a prominent cause which led to the revolution. The Boston port bill, which removed the custom-house from Boston to Salem, first roused the people to resistance. To guard against this very abuse, the constitution had confided to Congress the power to regulate commerce; the establishment of ports of entry formed a material part of this power, and one which required legislative enactment. Now I deny that Congress can deputize its legislative powers. If it may one, it may all; and thus, a majority here can, at their pleasure, change the very character of the Government. The President might come to be invested with authority to make all laws which his discretion might dictate. It is vain to tell me (said Mr. T.) that I imagine a case which will never exist. I tell you, sir, that power is cumulative, and that patronage begets power. The reasoning is unanswerable. If you can part with your power in one instance, you may in another and another. You may confer upon the President the right to declare war; and this very provision may fairly be considered as investing him with authority to make war at his mere will and pleasure on cities, towns, and villages. The prosperity of a city depends on the position of its custom-house and port of entry. Take the case of Norfolk, Richmond, and Fredericksburg, in my own State: who doubts but that to remove the custom-house from Norfolk to Old Point Comfort, or of Richmond to the mouth of Chickahominy, or of Fredericksburg to Tappahannock or Urbanna, would utterly annihilate those towns? I have no tongue to express my sense of the probable injustice of the measure. Sir, it involves the innocent with the guilty. Take the case of Charleston: what if ninety-nine merchants were ready and willing to comply with your revenue laws, and that but one man could be found to resist them; would you run the hazard of destroying the ninety-nine in order to punish one? Trade is a delicate subject to touch; once divert it out of its regular channels, and nothing is more difficult than to restore it. This measure may involve the actual property of every man, woman, and child in that city; and this, too, when you have a redundancy of millions in your treasury, and when no interest can sustain injury by awaiting the actual occurrence of a case of resistance to your laws, before you would have an opportunity to legislate.

Again: "All duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;" and yet this section invests the President with authority to exact cash duties at one place, while the credit system prevails at another. These extraordinary powers were to be exercised, not only to put down unlawful combinations, but whenever there were any "unlawful threats." Now I wish to know, for I am much attached to a distinct and definite phraseology, what would be considered as constituting unlawful threats? If one of the Government inspectors should chance to be abused by a drunken blackguard in the streets, was that to be deemed an "unlawful threat," which would invest the President with authority to call the military into requisition? Every power is surrendered; and the discretion of the President is the only rule for his government.

But this is not all. He is further empowered to employ the land and naval forces to put down all "aiders and abettors." How far will this authority extend? Suppose the Legislature of South Carolina should happen to be in session: I will not blink the question, suppose the Legislature to be in session at the time of any disturbance, passing laws in furtherance of the ordinance which has been adopted by the convention of that State; might they not be considered by the President as aiders and abettors? The President might not, perhaps, march at the head of his troops, with a flourish of drums and trumpets, and with bayonets fixed, into the state-house yard at Columbia; but, if he did so, he would find a precedent for it in English history.* So, also, Governor Hayne would be in some danger; and any judge or juror, who should dare to justify the popular movement by any judgment or verdict against the tariff laws, would run the hazard of being suppressed. But, sir, the thing might not even stop here. My own State has never failed to denounce these tariff laws as unjust and unconstitutional; and, inasmuch as all such denunciations have a tendency to excite the public mind, it might fall under the appellation of "aiders and abettors." I, too, sir, have followed the example of Virginia in opposition to the protective policy, and it may be my fate to be punished under the first section of this bill—I say the first section.

I have all proper confidence in the President, but I have an instinctive abhorrence to confiding extravagant powers in the hands of any one man. If they should be used by the present President with a proper discretion, and for the common good, if our institutions should come safely out of his hands, yet the precedent would be left on the statute book, and other Presidents might not use the power so beneficially. Rome was perfectly safe when she called Cincinnatus from the plough and clothed him with dictatorial authority; but she had cause long to bewail the dictatorship of Sylla and Caius Marius. I therefore say nay to this grant of powers. I care not what may be the character of the Chief Magistrate; how high his public worth may be rated; or how great and splendid may have been his services to his country: I will not intrust such powers in his hands. I would not even have confided them to him who was properly called Patris Pater.

The second section extends the powers of the United States courts over a portion of the criminal jurisdiction now belonging to the State courts exclusively. Let me state a case. If an officer of the customs shall differ, in regard to any matter appertaining to his duties, with any citizen of Richmond, or any other place, and a quarrel should thereupon arise, and the custom-house officer shall beat and maltreat such citizen, no redress for the injury can be obtained in the State courts, and the action for damages can alone be brought in the federal courts. Nay, sir, if the revenue officer commit murder, cold-blooded murder, he is triable for the same only before the United States court, mangle the laws of Virginia, which prescribe the punishment for the offence, and the mode of trial. Thus rescuing the citizen from responsibility to the tribunals of the State of which he is a citizen, and overturning usages which have existed through all time.

The well known and established legal means of proceeding in the State courts are, by this section, also abrogated, by preventing writs of replevin, detinue, or trover, or attachments in equity, where the subject of the suit may be in the hands of any officer of the United States, no matter how acquired. Can it be the design of the Senate, by a law applicable to every State in the Union, to deprive the State courts of the jurisdiction they have enjoyed, ab urbe condita, to the decided profit and convenience of the citizens of the country?

The third section carries out the second, and furnishes an instance of practical nullification every way equal to the South Carolina ordinance. It presents the singular spectacle of the translation of a cause ad aliud examen; while the record, the only evidence of the existence of such a case, is left behind. It requires an act to be done by "a court," and yet declares that this very act is to be deemed and taken as done, when the petition for its performance is left in the office of the clerk of the court. Further, after the suit is removed by the defendant, by the mere deposit of his petition for removal, without notice to the plaintiff, the plaintiff is required to proceed de novo; and if he does not comply with this unknown order, a judgment of non pros. is to be entered against him, with costs. Now, sir, I beg to know what the plaintiff has done to merit all this? He has brought a proper suit in a proper court, against a proper defendant, which suit the defendant may or may not remove at his own pleasure; and yet the plaintiff is to be burdened with all the costs, in any event, which may have been incurred in the State court; nor is the defendant required to give bond to answer costs and damages, not even the additional costs to which the plaintiff may be liable.

I pass over the fourth section, and proceed to the fifth. This provision inspires all the officers of the Government, and all the "State authorities," from the Governor down to the constable, with the spirit of prophecy. Formerly, that was a spirit which visited the world at intervals "wide and far between." It was that spirit which "touched Isaiah's holy lips with fire," and had its origin, not in parliaments or legislative assemblies, but in a much higher source. But this section converts every petty officer into a prophet, and endows him with the faculty of foretelling coming events. Mr. T. then referred to the language of the bill, which empowers the President to call out the military and naval force, when he shall be informed that the laws will, in any event, be obstructed. If the President was informed that the laws will be obstructed, these coming events are to be arrested by the interposition of Executive power. How would this work? No, I will not say how would, but how might it work? A judge—no, a constable, picks up an anonymous letter, or a general order, such as had been exhibited here in this debate, in which there was a great talk about a military force—a steamboat had lowered the flag of the United States half-mast, and raised above it a tri-colored ensign; he communicates these ominous facts, doctored with such comments and rumors as his fears may have created, or idle gossip conjured up, and the President adopts the conclusion that the revenue laws will be violated, and issues his proclamation accordingly. Yet, after all, it may turn out that this informant has been frightened with shadows, and shadows would have more effect upon one of these officers than ten thousand men armed in proof would have upon the President himself. Take the controversy now pending between the States of New York and New Jersey, which materially affects the interests of the city of New York; and suppose that the Supreme Court decides against New York, and issues its process against Governor Marcy; the people of the city are roused against the decision, denounce the Supreme Court, have numerous attended meetings in their City Hall, and parade their streets in a threatening attitude. What is to be done? The marshal makes no effort to execute the process, but reports to the President that the laws will be resisted. A proclamation is thereupon issued; the military is ordered out; and a collision may or may not be brought on, as the feeling or policy of the hour shall prevail.

The sixth section of the bill he viewed as a Botany Bay law. It was in fact a Botany Bay law, with one exception, that the law in England requires conviction before transportation; by this, transportation precedes conviction. There, a place is designated to which the convict may be transported; here, to such convenient place as the judge and marshal shall appoint. The marshal is also authorized to make "such other provision," for the safe keeping of the prisoner, I presume is meant, as he may deem "necessary and expedient." Suppose a man to be arrested for a debt due the United States; the jails are closed against his reception, and the marshal is to carry him to some convenient place; is he not completely in the power of the officer? and may he not drag him away, far from his friends, to any place he may please, and, under the authority to do whatever he may deem "necessary and expedient," put chains upon his limbs, cast him into a loathsome dungeon, and carry him to the end of the earth? Is there any thing in the section which limits his discretion to the State wherein the party may be arrested? If such was the intention, why not so have said? When the liberty and rights of the people are concerned, why leave that uncertain which may so readily be rendered certain? The absence of all such limitation on the discretion of the officer, as the section now stands, raises the implication that no such restriction is designed. It may be said that the judge and marshal may be well trusted. It may or may not be so. But there can be no necessity for extending a power which may be abused when the abuse may so easily be limited and restrained.

There was no ambiguity about this measure. The prophecy had already gone forth; the President has said that the laws will be obstructed. The President had not only foretold the coming difficulties, but he has also assembled an army. The city of Charleston, if report spoke true, was now a beleaguered city; the cannon of Fort Pinckney are pointing at it; and although they are now quietly sleeping, they are ready to open their thunders whenever the voice of authority shall give the command. And shall these terrors be let loose because some one man may refuse to pay some small modicum of revenue, which Congress, the day after it came into the treasury, might vote in satisfaction of some unfounded claim? Shall we set so small a value upon the lives of the people? Let us at least wait to see the course of measures. We can never be too tardy in commencing the work of blood. May we not indulge the expectation that South Carolina will have some regard to her own peace, and not bring matters to an issue with unnecessary precipitation? I hope that a voice, which has gone forth from Virginia, will arrest her attention. Sir, I have heard my State slightly called the Mediator State. She is so, and I rejoice that she has assumed that office. In the great cause of union, I trust she will always joyfully press forward, and, addressing herself to a sister State, whose interests are nearly identical with her own, I will not doubt but that her mediation will prove successful. Then scoff at her who may, she will have presented you the olive branch, and furnished new cause for your gratitude and affection.

I regret that the course adopted here has not been better calculated to avoid a rupture. I fear me that what has been done has been but too well calculated to chafe the spirit of that honored and lofty State. An army had been sent thither, instead of a messenger of peace; revenue cutters to watch her commerce; an armed ship riding in her roadstead; and a proclamation issued breathing denunciation. These were not calculated to allay excitement. I think a better course might have been adopted. If the President had rested upon his message at the opening of the session, my belief is that the tariff would have been reduced. But it was in the nature of man to fight for money. Some of the advocates of the tariff on this side of the Potomac were ready to yield a portion; but I fear that to others the temptation of high profits is too strong to be resisted, more especially when the army and navy, and the whole military force, is to be employed to rivet high duties on the country. An honorable exception was found in Virginia. All classes of society and all interests united in recommending a suitable modification, manufacturer and all, so far as the resolutions of the Legislature furnished any evidence of public sentiment. But it is a bad mode of settling disputes to make soldiers your ambassadors, and to point to the halter and the gallows as your ultimatum.

Sir, if a foreign country violates her treaty stipulations, spoliates upon your commerce, and holds your friendship as nothing, you still negotiate; you resort to every possible expedient to preserve peace; you will invest the President with no discretionary power to declare war; but if a State braves your authority, and threatens to set your laws at defiance, you pant for the contest, and commit to the hands of the President unlimited discretion; and yet what are the horrors of a foreign, compared with those of an intestine war?

If the majority shall pass this bill, they must do it on their own responsibility; I will have no part in it. When gentlemen recount the blessings of union; when they dwell upon the past, and sketch out in bright perspective the future, they awaken in my breast all the pride of an American; my pulse beats responsive to theirs, and I regard union, next to freedom, as the greatest of blessings. Yes, sir, "the Federal Union must be preserved." But how? Will you seek to preserve it by force? Will you appease the angry spirit of discord by an oblation of blood? Suppose that the proud and haughty spirit of South Carolina shall not bend to your high edicts in token of fealty; that you make war upon her, hang her Governor, her legislators, and judges, as traitors, and reduce her to the condition of a conquered province—have you preserved the Union? This Union consists of twenty-four States; would you have preserved the Union by striking out one of the States—one of the old thirteen? Gentlemen had boasted of the flag of our country, with its thirteen stars. When the light of one of these stars shall have been extinguished, will the flag wave over us, under which our fathers fought? If we are to go on striking out star after star, what will finally remain but a central and a burning sun, blighting and destroying every germ of liberty? The flag which I wish to wave over me, is that which floated in triumph at Saratoga and Yorktown. It bore upon it thirteen States, of which South Carolina was one. Sir, there is a great difference between preserving union and preserving Government; the Union may be annihilated, yet Government preserved; but under such a Government no man ought to desire to live.

His mode of preserving the Union was by restoring mutual confidence and affection amongst the members; by doing justice and obeying the dictates of policy. The President has pointed out the mode in his opening message. We had been informed that there was an excess of $6,000,000 in the treasury. I would destroy that excess; yet, I would not rashly and rudely lay hands on the manufacturer, if I had the power to do so. While giving peace to one section, I would not produce discord in another. It would be to accomplish nothing, to appease discord in one section and produce it in another. The manufacturers desire time; give them time, ample time. If they would come down to the revenue standard, and abandon the protective policy, I would allow them full time. I present these suggestions, for I am anxious to see this vexed question adjusted.

It had been said that it would not do to offer terms while South Carolina maintained a menacing attitude. I consider this view altogether erroneous. Shall not justice be done to the other Southern States? They, too, complain loudly, deeply, of the oppressive burdens under which they labor in common with South Carolina. But, regard it as exclusively a South Carolina question; what prevents you from yielding to her wishes? Pride, alone, stands in the way—false pride. It is the worst, the most pernicious of counsellors. Against its influence Lord Chatham and Edmund Burke raised their voices in the British Parliament; but the reply was, that it would not do to make terms with revolted colonies; and a besotted ministry lost to the English crown its brightest jewel. It is idle to talk of degrading Government by yielding terms. This Government is strong—South Carolina weak. The strong man may grant terms to the weak; and, by so doing, give the highest evidence of magnanimity. All history teems with instances of the evils springing from false pride in Governments. Bruised thrones, dismembered empires, crushed republics; these are its bitter fruits. Let us throw it from us, and try the efficacy of that engine which tyrants never use; that great engine which would save Poland to Russia, Ireland to England, and South Carolina, not as a province with her palmetto trailing in the dust, but as a free, sovereign, and independent State, to this confederacy—the engine of redress. This is my advice.

But my advice is disregarded; you rush on to the contest; you subdue South Carolina; you drive her citizens into the morasses, where Marion and Sumter found refuge; you level her towns and cities in the dust; you clothe her daughters in mourning, and make helpless orphans of her rising sons; where, then, is your glory? Glory comes not from the blood of slaughtered brethren. Gracious God! is it necessary to urge such considerations on an American Senate? Whither has the genius of America fled? We have had darker days than the present, and that genius has saved us. Are we to satisfy the discontents of the people by force—by shooting some, and bayoneting others? Force may convert freemen into slaves; but, after you have made them slaves, will they look with complacency on their chains? When you have subdued South Carolina, lowered her proud flag, and trampled her freedom in the dust, will she love you for the kindness you have shown her? No; she will despise and hate you. Poland will hate Russia until she is again free; and so would it be with South Carolina. I would that I had but moral influence enough to save my country in this hour of peril. If I know myself, I would peril all, every thing that I hold most dear, if I could be the means of stilling the agitated billows. I have no such power; I stand here manacled in a minority, whose efforts can avail but little. You, who are the majority, have the destinies of the country in your hands. If war shall grow out of this measure, you are alone responsible. I will wash my hands of the business. Rather than give my aid I would surrender my station here, for I aspire not to imitate the rash boy who sat fire to the Ephesian dome. No, sir, I will lend no aid to the passage of this bill. I had almost said that "I had rather be a dog and bay the moon than such a Roman." I will not yet despair; Rome had her Curtius, Sparta her Leonidas, and Athens her band of devoted patriots; and shall it be said that the American Senate contains not one man who will step forward to rescue his country in this her moment of peril? Although that man may never wear an earthly crown or sway an earthly sceptre, eternal fame shall wreath an evergreen around his brow, and his name shall rank with those of the proudest patriots of the proudest climes.

Mr. CLAYTON, of Delaware, then took the floor, and moved an adjournment.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 7.

MILITARY ORDERS.

Mr. POINDEXTER offered the following resolution:
Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate copies of the orders which have been given to the commanding officer of the military forces assembled in and near to the city of Charleston, South Carolina; and also copies of the orders which have been given to the commander of the naval forces assembled in the harbor of Charleston; particularly such orders, if any such have been given, to resist the constituted authorities of the State of South Carolina, within the chartered limits of said State.

Mr. P. said, that, as a response to this resolution might have an important bearing on the bill which was now pending, and as he supposed that no Senator would object to the course, he would ask that the resolution be considered at this time.

No objection being made, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. WEBSTER (who had just come in) said this appeared to be a very important resolution, and one which required some consideration. He therefore hoped that the passage of it would not be pressed at this time.

Mr. POINDEXTER had no objection to the postponement, but he desired to be informed by the Senator from Massachusetts what kind of orders could be issued from the War Department, which ought to be kept secret, at a time of profound peace? If there was likely to be war, he would wish to know it. If not, there could be no objection to the communication of any orders issued in a time of profound peace. The President could answer this resolution in his own way, and the Senate would be able to see, from the possession of the orders, whether they were transcended by the officer to whom they were sent, and to attach responsibility where it ought to lie. If honorable Senators were unwilling that the truth should meet the light, be it so. But he hoped that the Senate would concur in his resolution.

Mr. GRUNDY said he had never any objection to any information being obtained, which was proper in its character, either at this or any other time. The proposition now submitted contained much matter, and some which it might not be discreet at this moment to give, although it might be proper to give it hereafter. He could wish that the resolution should lie over until to-morrow, when he would interpose no objection to its passage, so far as his vote was concerned. At present he was ignorant of the purport of the resolution, having only just heard it read; nor could he tell the design with which it had been introduced. Much had been said about the military force concentrated in and about Charleston, and he was himself as anxious as any gentleman to know when and where this force was concentrated. But he wished to see whether this inquiry did not go too far, or whether it went far enough. He hoped, therefore, that the resolution would be laid on the table until to-morrow; and that the bare circumstance of Senators being inattentive or absent would not induce the Senator from Mississippi to press the consideration of the resolution out of the usual order of the Senate.

Mr. G. concluded with moving to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

The Senate then again proceeded to the bill making further provision for the collection of the revenue.

Mr. CLAYTON, of Delaware, addressed the Senate as follows: When the able and eloquent Senator from Virginia [Mr. TYLER] rose yesterday to discuss the bill under consideration, he expressed his apprehension that some loose remark, falling from him in the ardor of debate, might prove fatal to him. A pleased and attentive listener to the perspicuous speech of the gentleman, in vindication of the reputed doctrines of the State which he has so honorably represented on this floor, I confess I could scarcely suppose that he stood in danger of any distortion of his views, or misrepresentation of his sentiments. I know well, sir, that my honorable friend will acquit me, in the outset, of any design to misrepresent him; and he knows equally well that if, in the course of this debate, I should at any time, fail to state his opinions exactly, it will give me pleasure to stand corrected by his explanations. While about to dissent from his doctrines in reference to this interesting subject, suffer me also to express the hope that if any luckless phrase of mine, uttered in the heat of this discussion, should go beyond its mark, and offend his honorable pride, he will "free me so far in his most generous thoughts, that I have shot my arrow o'er the house and hurt my brother."

If a doubt had ever existed in my mind as to the course which it is my duty to pursue in regard to this measure, that doubt would have been removed by the just influence of the sentiments of those who, as the immediate representatives of the people of that State which has commissioned me to act as a Senator on this floor, have fully expressed themselves in certain resolutions, a copy of which is now before me. These resolutions, in substance, declare that the constitution of the United States is not a treaty or a mere compact between sovereign States, but a form of Government emanating from and established by the people of the United States; that this Government, although one of limited powers, is supreme within its sphere of action, and that the people owe to it an allegiance which cannot, in consonance with the constitution, be withdrawn by State nullification or State secession; that the Supreme Court of the United States is the only and proper tribunal for the settlement, in the last resort, of controversies arising under that constitution and the laws of Congress; that, in cases of gross and intolerable oppression, for which the ordinary remedies to be found in the elective franchise and the responsibility of public officers are inadequate, the remedy is extra-constitutional—resistance and revolution. The language of our people, as expressed by their representatives, touching the fatal delusion pervading the ordinance and legislation of South Carolina, is, that while they entertain the kindest feelings towards the people of that State, "with whom they stood side by side in the war of the revolution, and in whose defence their blood was freely spilt," they will not falter in their allegiance, but will be found now, as then, true to their country and its Government: and they pledge themselves to support that Government in the exercise of all its constitutional rights, and in the discharge of all its constitutional duties. These resolutions, proclaiming as they do the sentiments of gentlemen of all political parties, do not instruct me to adopt them as my political text-book, but leave me, untrammelled by any mandate, to follow the course which my own judgment may dictate in relation to the whole subject.

But, sir, my sentiments were no secret to the people who spoke thus by their constitutional organ, the legislative body. When principles directly repugnant to these were first advocated within the walls of this chamber, though fresh in my seat here, my voice was raised against them. The first effort that was ever made here to support the present Carolina doctrine of nullification by a State convention, made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. GAUNTER,] now a happy convert to much of my political catechism, and sustained with a degree of ability which has hardly been surpassed in this debate, was opposed by me while feebly pressing the adversary principles now inculcated in the declarations of Delaware, to which I have adverted. It is my business, sir, to reassure that honorable member of the truth of these his new articles of faith, and to tell him, too, that, however unfashionable these tenets were at the time of our ancient controversy, there is now no other mode known among men whereby he can be politically saved.

It has so happened, sir, that the principles with which I entered public life, and with which, by the blessing of God, I will live and die—the same principles for which I and my political friends have been contending during the whole period of my service in the Senate, have been discovered by the President, in this perilous crisis of our public affairs, to be the only true conservative principles of the constitution. As one of those who have steadily, though unsuccessfully, opposed what in my conscience I believe to have been usurpations of Executive and State power—doctrines leading to the present disastrous results, as I have often predicted, in reference to the veto message of the last session, and the whole course of our recent national policy towards the State of Georgia—true now, sir, to the same principles, I find myself, by a sudden revolution in the sentiments of the administration on this subject, anxiously supporting its very strongest measures. At the same time, I find the President, without the aid of those friends with whom it has ever been my pride to be associated in the political divisions which have agitated this body, sustained only by a very small and hopeless minority of the American Senate. It is under these circumstances, sir, that the chairman of the committee reporting this bill, [Mr. WILKINS,] assigns a reason for its passage so very different from any which I could suffer to govern me—so repugnant to all my principles of action, and all my humble notions of right and wrong, that I deem it my duty in limine to enter my protest against it. He supports this bill because the execution of its provisions will devolve on the President. He votes for this great measure because it confers power on one who (tell it not in Gath!) "never abused power!" He goes for the man, and sustains the principle for the sake of the man. There may be others, sir, who, with a deep devotion which no circumstance can diminish or abate, with an ardent zeal which no tyranny could cool, with a blind confidence which neither time nor tide could ever wear away, would bow to the god of their idolatry, and desire no better reason for their assent than that which they render in their daily aspiration of "fiat voluntas tua!" But my support of this measure is predicated on no servile submission to any Executive mandate, on no implicit and unlimited faith in any man. I will clothe the Executive with all constitutional power necessary to secure the faithful execution of the laws, and the preservation of the Union. I will confer stronger authority on the Chief Magistrate, because I can find no other chance of salvation for my country; and I will not be deterred from the adoption of this measure by any consideration of the source from which it has emanated, or because an unworthy reason has been advanced by others to sustain it. Whatever beauties the chairman may discover in this part of his own argument, whatever foreign missions or splendid offices may now glitter in the vista to dazzle and delight the vision of others, I see, and wish to see, no prospects of political advancement arising out of this sudden revolution in Executive opinion, for any member of that proud opposition which has so long and so stubbornly maintained its lofty independence of character, and so triumphantly vindicated the cause of constitutional liberty in the halls of the Capitol of this country. If it be true that, in the honorable discharge of our sacred duty here, we have committed the sin hitherto deemed unpardonable against that being who is so prominent an object of the humble adoration of others, let that sin remain unexpiated by any atonement which we have now to offer; and should political death be the punishment to be inflicted upon us for our transgressions, let us at least perish, hoping nothing from the smiles, and fearing nothing from the frowns, of Executive power!

Nor, sir, as I trust, will any man here, who has ever justly laid claim to the honorable title of "National Republican," be prevented from giving a liberal support to this bill, by the general denunciation of it as a federal measure. We know well that this same ingenious stratagem has been resorted to for more than thirty years, alternately to elevate or depress the leading demagogues in this country. The best possible plan to escape the force of reason, is to appeal to the ignorant prejudices of mankind. One who has engaged in this debate, traces, by the aid of the most marvellous powers of combination and deduction, the origin of the nullifying resolutions of Kentucky, in 1798, and their kindred resolutions of Virginia, adopted in the same era, to the old federal party! An ingenious modern writer, sir, has derived the word "cucumber" from "Jeremiah King;" but even his praises might well remain unsung, while the superior ingenuity of the author of this charge, against the men of other days, should, by bard and minstrel, be celebrated in Hudibrastic lays for the admiration of the world. The Kentucky resolutions, which gave birth to the whole heresy of nullification, are entitled to no respect, whether we consider the time of their adoption, or the mere object for which they were drawn. They were written by a candidate for office, in a period of high party excitement, for the very purpose of securing his own election. They were well calculated to intimidate political opponents by the threat of ultimate disunion in the event of his defeat, and as such they were denounced by many of the other States, at the time, in the strongest language. They slept on the shelf after they had done their office, without an effort on the part of any man to vindicate the principles contained in them, until after the lapse of thirty years, when they were awakened by the trumpet of discord resounding again throughout this happy country. I say, sir, that no considerable effort was made to defend them, or their revolutionary principles, from 1800 till after the passage of the tariff act of 1824. Yet they were assailed and denounced in the hearing of the very men who, if they had been deemed defensible, ought to have been first to stand forth in their behalf. In the debate on the Judiciary in 1802, Mr. Giles, of Virginia, having barely so far alluded to the subject as to mention the determination of the federal courts, that they are judges in the last resort of the constitutionality of your laws, to prove what he called their unlimited claims to power, was promptly met in reply, on this whole question, by Mr. Bayard, who vindicated the true principles of the constitution against the then recent and arrogant pretensions of State usurpation, by whatever name it may be called—State veto, State interposition, or State tyranny. Entrenched behind the very principles we now advocate, he threw the gauntlet to any champion on the other side who might choose to venture in defence of the doctrines avowed in those resolutions. Sir, no one then appeared in the lists to accept that challenge. The resolutions, which might have been fairly claimed as covering the whole ground of this part of the debate, were not even named, much less defended or held up, as authority by any one. They had served their purposes, sir. The party that framed them was seated in power, and it was their interest to neglect and to despise them.

Suffer me, sir, to add one other preliminary remark, before I proceed to the argument of the main question involved in the consideration of this bill. The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. Brown,] to strengthen his own argument against the use of force to sustain the revenue laws, cited a passage from the speech of the same distinguished representative of Delaware, to whom I have alluded, delivered in Congress, on the subject of the embargo law. The object was to show that our Government, being essentially pacific in its genius and character, ought not to be sustained by force, when concession can be properly made to prevent its employment; and I grant the gentleman the full benefit of all the passage he has cited. I am willing to adopt the recommendation of that eminent statesman in the present condition of this country. I am willing to concede all that can be yielded to an honest difference of opinion, consistently with the honor and interest of the nation. I would now cheerfully give my vote for a new tariff, which should extend the list of articles to be admitted duty free as far as that list could possibly be extended, without injury to the essential manufactures of the country. But it ought never to be hoped for, that the system which now protects the industry of the farmers, the mechanics, and manufacturers; in short, the whole of the laboring freemen in the middle, northern, and western States, from competition with British paupers, should be utterly and unconditionally abandoned. Sir, I am well satisfied that it cannot be so abandoned without the imminent danger of a speedy revolution in this Government; and that, in this view of the subject, it would be infinitely better to —"Bear the ills we have,

"Than fly to others that we know not of."

If the measure proposed by the bill should, as is alleged, drive South Carolina to open secession, still, sir, I hold that State secession is a less evil than State nullification. I think the soundness of this opinion is easily demonstrable. If the latter doctrine be triumphantly established; if it be, indeed, true that any one of these States can constitutionally and rightfully decide, in the last resort, on the mode and measure of redress for all her alleged grievances; then, sir, is South Carolina, while all her ports are open for the admission of every article of importation, duty free, still within the pale of the Union, and entitled to participate in all its blessings, though she refuse to share in any of its burdens. The whole amount of southern exports, estimated at forty millions annually, may be exchanged for foreign manufactures and foreign produce, and by virtue of this ordinance of nullification, the exchanges may, through the free ports of Charleston, Beaufort, and Georgetown, be transhipped coastwise, and forced upon the consumption of the whole country, in defiance of all our laws for the collection of duties. The immediate effect of this must be desolation and ruin to us—desolation and ruin so certain and so speedy, that our southern fellow-citizens would find us a prey hardly worth the trouble of further pursuit, after the lapse of five or ten years from the period when such a system should go into effective operation. Throwing out of view the destruction of our manufacturers and mechanics, (the immediate consequence of this state of things,) I ask, what have we—to what possible resources can we apply—to meet this never-ending drain of our means and money to pay for all the most important necessities of life thus purchased abroad? In a few years we should be beggared by the operation of such a state of things, and soon after, where the husbandman now goes happily to his plough, and the mechanic sings cheerily to the sound of his axe or his hammer, the country would be rapidly deserted, and, in a few more fleeting years, would present but a wild and melancholy waste, a lasting monument to posterity of our own folly and pusillanimity. And let it not be overlooked by those who would temporarily riot in the profits thus drawn from the hard hand of honest industry, that they would eventually be the losers by their own avidity; for where would be their market for articles received in exchange for their immense surplus produce, when we should be no longer able to buy them? On the other hand, the consequences of the secession of South Carolina from the Union, though that would be an event deeply to be deplored, while the memory of our national glory is retained, would be infinitely to be preferred by us to such a condition of affairs. In the event of her successfully maintaining her separate independence, we should subject all her products, and all her exchanges obtained for them, when introduced among us, to our own tariff; and, if peace did not smile upon us as it heretofore has, we should, at least, by the sacrifice of some of its blessings, maintain our independence of all foreign nations. I tell the honorable members from Carolina, therefore, that, while secession has its terrors for me, nullification presents even still greater evils in perspective; that I have been driven in sorrow to that task of calculating the value of this Union, which I once supposed I could never learn, and which I still think no man can learn, while the constitution stands unimpaired by misconception, and that I cannot be deterred from the support of this bill, whose only object is to countervail the effects of their State ordinance and State legislation, by the threat of disunion as a necessary consequence of its passage.

I come then, sir, to the discussion of the main question before us.

Are the ordinance and laws of South Carolina, set forth in the President's message, consonant with the constitution of the United States? If repugnant to the provisions of that sacred instrument, has the State a right to secede from the Union? Have we the power to coerce obedience to our revenue laws? And, if we have such power, are the provisions of this bill such as are proper to secure that obedience?

There never was a question more involved in metaphysical subtleties, than the essential inquiry into the right of nullification and secession has been, by the respective advocates of these different doctrines. They invariably seek out the most refined, and often, I may add, the most indefinite distinctions. It would with them be evidence of gross obtuseness of intellect, to fail always to discriminate between the foundation of the powers of the Government, and the sources from which those powers are drawn; between sovereignty and sovereign power, determining at the same time with precision where each of these originated and where they now remain, and between the effect of a ratification by the people of the United States collectively, and that of a ratification by the same people voting by State divisions. The distinction between a State and the people of a State is made and carried so far, that the State itself is considered as a kind of ethereal, supernatural being, whose essence is illimitable, uncontrollable sovereignty over the very people composing it, and to whose will alone it is indebted for "a local habitation and a name." The recent address to the people of South Carolina, by their delegates in convention, is replete with such distinctions. The passage from that curious State paper, which I am about to read, exhibits the opinions of the convention as to the nature of "sovereignty."

"A foreign or inattentive reader, unacquainted with the origin, progress, and history of the constitution, would be very apt, from the phraseology of the instrument, to regard the States as having divested themselves of their sovereignty, and to have become great corporations, subordinate to one supreme Government. But this is an error. The States are as sovereign now as they were prior to their entering into the compact. In common parlance, and to avoid circumlocution, it may be admissible enough to speak of delegated and reserved sovereignty. But, correctly speaking, sovereignty is a unit. It is 'one, indivisible, and unalienable.' It is, therefore, an absurdity to imagine that the sovereignty of the States is surrendered in part, and retained in part. The federal constitution is a treaty, a confederation, an alliance, by which so many sovereign States agree to exercise their sovereign powers conjointly, upon certain objects of external concern, in which they are equally interested, such as war, peace, commerce, foreign negotiation, and Indian trade; and upon all other subjects of civil government, they were to exercise their sovereignty separately. This is the true nature of the compact."

Sovereignty is, by this authority, "a unit;" it is also "indivisible and unalienable!" and the inference drawn from these premises is, that it is an absurdity to imagine that the sovereignty of the States is surrendered in part, and retained only in part. In vain did the framers of our glorious constitution, in their circular of the 17th September, 1787, declare, while explaining its provisions, and submitting them for popular approbation, that it was "obviously impracticable, in the Federal Government of these States, to secure all the rights of independent sovereignty to each, and yet provide for the interest and safety of all." In vain did they declare that "individuals entering into society must give up a share of liberty to preserve the rest." In vain did they (the States themselves, for as States they addressed this circular, and submitted this constitution to the people) ordain that no State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal; coin money; emit bills of credit; make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts; pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts. In vain did they provide that no State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any impost or duty on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws, subjecting, at the same time, all such laws to the revision and control of Congress. In vain did they determine that no State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty on tonnage, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay. And (which renders the position assumed still more preposterous) in vain did the people of South Carolina, on the 23d of May, 1788, solemnly declare to the whole world, that they freely and fully assented to and ratified this constitution. It was reserved for the wisdom of after ages to discover that they had not the power to make a valid contract, because their sovereignty was "a unit, indivisible and unalienable." This position is predicated on no pretended distinction between the alienation and delegation of sovereignty. The object for which it is assumed, is to prove that no part whatever of the sovereignty of the people of South Carolina has been "surrendered." The address distinctly denounces the very expression "delegated sovereignty" as common parlance, or vulgar error, and as utterly inadmissible, except to "avoid circumlocution." Viewing the people of all the States as having delegated the essential rights and attributes of sovereignty which I have just enumerated, I say that the people of no one State can withdraw or revoke them, without the consent of the people of the other States, obtained according to the forms and rules prescribed in the constitution, which all have freely ratified. The Government is but an agent, you tell me. True; but whose agent? Of the people of South Carolina alone? No, but of the people of all the States. Surely a fraction cannot revoke a power which all have conferred. But, even viewing this agent as the creature of South Carolina alone, her own constitution would prohibit her own people from revoking it by a bare majority. Two-thirds of her Legislature must first call the convention, and the delegates of that convention must afterwards be elected by the people. The Carolina doctrine itself denies the power of revocation by a mere Legislature; and, in pursuance of it, the ordinance was made in convention. The sovereignty, "one, indivisible, and unalienable," therefore, has not been found in a bare majority of the people there; for it was agreed to be an essential, an indispensable prerequisite, that two-thirds of the people should order the convention to be elected. But how comes it about that this sovereignty, "one, indivisible, and unalienable," could not move without the consent of two-thirds? Sir, by their own constitution a portion of their sovereignty has been restrained, delegated, and irrevocably alienated even to their own State agents, unless recalled by the edict of two-thirds of their own people. They may, through a majority, overthrow their own State Government no otherwise than by revolution. Yet they maintain that they can, without revolution, overthrow our Government, which is the work of their and our hands, when they, less than one twenty-fourth part of the power which created this Government, please to resume their sovereignty. They admit that they cannot resume this sovereignty as against themselves, in the case of their own Government, without the consent of two-thirds of their own people; while they insist that this same ethereal essence, when brought to bear on themselves and us con-jointly, is indivisible, unalienable, and not capable of being delegated or surrendered for any purpose known among men. They have divided this indivisible unit. Carry out the idea, sir, a step further. In some of the States the people must, by a majority of their votes, first direct a convention, and then elect it. In others, the Legislature, by a bare majority, can call it. In others, the people must twice order it by a bare majority of their votes, before it can be called. If each of these States can nullify in convention, whenever they choose to do so, the sovereignty of some operates very differently from that of others. Delaware could nullify at any time, by a majority of all the voters entitled to the right of suffrage. But Kentucky cannot until her majority has, at two successive elections, called the convention; and South Carolina cannot, as we have seen, without the previous consent of two-thirds. The indivisible, unalienable, nullifying unit in Delaware, therefore, is a bare majority; while in Kentucky it is two successive majorities; and in South Carolina, and other States, it is to be found only in two-thirds of all the voters. A citizen in Carolina, therefore, has less nullifying power than a citizen in Delaware. Their political and sovereign rights are so essentially different, that, while the latter has less than one-fifth of the population of the former, one hundred Delawarians can out-nullify more than one hundred and forty Carolinians.

I admit, sir, that, by the very terms of our constitution or form of Government, there is an ultimate sovereignty, a paramount power of amendment and revocation, resting in the people of three-fourths of the States. Undoubtedly, it is true, that this ultimate sovereignty has never been alienated or delegated. It is true, too, that the people of the United States (not of South Carolina alone) have reserved to themselves, or their respective States, all the attributes of sovereignty not delegated by the constitution. Nay, more sir, I recognise, and glory in the recognition of the principles of our revolutionary forefathers, that the right to resist tyranny and oppression, no matter by what power exercised, still exists in every man, not as a constitutional or delegated power, but as an inherent, indivisible, and unalienable right. But this ultra-constitutional and revolutionary right, which, when exercised, must always confessedly subject those who attempt to enforce it to the penalties of treason in the event of their failure, is as widely different from the pretended right of nullification, as the heavens from the earth. It is open, unblushing treason against the Government; and, even when asserted under the gallows, has the merit of being more respectable, because it is more intelligible and daring than nullification. It is not a mere State right, but looks above all the restraints of power. It may be exercised against South Carolina by her own citizens, or against this Government by the people of the United States. It is nothing more than the right of rebellion; the right of self-preservation; the right to fight in self-defence. No man ever did, or ever could part with it. If successfully vindicated in a righteous cause, he who asserts it becomes a hero; if unsuccessfully, a traitor. Ask the nullifier if this is the sovereignty which he refers to as a unit, indivisible and unalienable, and he will tell you, no! He seeks shelter not in his individual resources, but under theegis of his State; nay, claims protection under the constitution which he seeks to destroy; is horror-struck by the charge of treason, and asserts the right of State interposition as a right reserved in the very bond of our Union: and when, to disprove the right of the State to interpose, you point him to the plain words of the constitution, which negative the right of any State to make war on the rest, which positively prohibit any State to engage in any war, or to keep troops when this Government is at peace, he coolly tells you that these are State rights and attributes of sovereignty, which are, in their nature, unalienable. Sir, this political dogma, understood in the sense of those who use it, never had any foundation in truth. As an axiom of political science, it is unknown among statesmen. Sovereign power must, of necessity, be delegated in all representative Governments; and before the true theory of civil Government was understood, even in the darkness of the feudal and barbaric ages, when arbitrary power most prevailed, sovereignty and sovereign power have been a thousand times transferred by conquest, or alienated by grants, the validity of which was never questioned. As a curious instance among the examples of the alienation of sovereignty itself in a monarchy, by downright bargain and sale, it may not be amiss to recur to a part of the history of the Isle of Man, for a long time the residence of the Earls of Derby, who ruled it as sovereigns, in the strongest sense of that word. The "Kings of Man," a sounding title, sir, clothed with all the essential attributes of sovereignty over an island in the Irish sea, about thirty miles long and ten wide, exercised that power so injuriously to the English Government, in this very matter of impost and revenue, that it became a general depot for smuggling; and, in 1726, the English Government passed an act "authorizing the purchase of the royalties of Man." In 1765, the purchase was actually made of the Duke of Athol, the then sovereign of the island, who, for seventy thousand pounds sterling, and a pension on himself and his dutchess, alienated all the royalties and sovereignty of this little independent kingdom, by a substantial deed of bargain and sale, and annexed it forever to the British empire. The "free trade" ceased, and the English impost laws became efficient by this alienation of sovereignty. Our own purchases of Louisiana and Florida furnish additional examples of the surrender of sovereignty. Under our old confederation, while one State endeavored to protect its own industry by imposts, the protected articles were admitted duty free in another; and for the very purpose, among others, of preventing this, was our constitution formed. The sovereignty of the United States was in the people, and they delegated to the Government of their own creation all the rights of sovereignty with which it is clothed; not by a bargain and sale for money paid, but by a written constitution for blessings secured, which are above all price, and infinitely beyond the power of any man, whether in or out of South Carolina, to calculate.

In short, sir, if sovereignty be a "unit, indivisible and unalienable," in the sense for which that maxim is employed in this address, the inevitable consequence of it is, that there can be but two forms of Government known among men—an absolute democracy, or an absolute and unchangeable despotism. If the people cannot delegate any portion of their sovereign power for their own good, we are, ourselves, usurpers of authority, and may be guilty of treason by the very act of attempting to legislate for their benefit.

The honorable gentleman from Virginia deems it indispensable, while supporting what he terms the democratic doctrines of 1798, to assure us that our Government cannot be sovereign, in any sense of that word; that it is but an emanation from the States, and holds its existence but at the pleasure of the States; and he puts the significant interrogatory, to sustain himself in these positions, can there be such a thing as a citizen of the United States? To this he demands an answer.

I will give him that answer, sir. But, as one of those who claim the proud title of a citizen of the United States, I hold it to be a sacred duty first to describe, for his benefit, the origin and character of that Government which he has so grossly mistaken, and which I will gladly acknowledge as the great protector of me and mine in the enjoyment of that inestimable civil liberty, for which we will never cease to be grateful.

The radical and fatal error into which he has fallen, consists in the omission to discriminate between a Federal Government, a National Government, and our Government, which is neither exclusively federal nor national, but a compound of both. I shall enter into no inquiry with him, whether a mere confederation, or league, be preferable to a consolidated republic. I tell the gentleman, at once, that I hold the evils of both to be intolerable, and that it is no part of my task to ascertain which of these miserable expedients of man, in his folly, is most replete with the seeds of anarchy or despotism. I am no advocate of a consolidated Government, dearly as I cherish the "consolidation of our Union;" and although I have heard nothing more common, since I became a member here, than noisy denunciations of a consolidated empire, yet, I have never yet learned that any man of common sense contended that our Government was of this description. But, with grief I say it, it has become the fashionable cant of a certain school of politicians, to deny to our constitution every characteristic of a national republic, and to hold it up to the world as a wretched confederacy of independent, sovereign States, the will of each of which is the only rule of its actions.

The history of the origin of this constitution is soon told. It was framed by the States in convention; and, on the 17th of September, 1787, it was, by the same convention of States, directed, first to be submitted to "the United States in Congress assembled," and then "to a convention of delegates chosen in each State by the people thereof, under the recommendation of its Legislature, for their assent and ratification." It was ratified by the people after it had been proposed by the States.

It originated, therefore, in a compact between the people. Could the States grant more than the people? Was the nature of State sovereignty such, that the people could not abridge or abrogate it? To those who will contend for so absurd a doctrine, let the answer be given, that the States themselves were also parties to the compact, and are estopped by their own act to deny its validity. They contracted with the people, by their own proposition, that it should bind them, and each of them. If gentlemen will consider this constitution as a mere compact, let them fairly acknowledge the extent of that compact, and the seals of all the parties to it. Let them say, then, that it was not merely a compact between the States, but between the people and the States; between the people of all the States; between the people of each State, and the State itself; and between the people of each State, and each of and all the other States, and the United States. Let them say that Carolina bound herself by it with her own people, with the people of every other State, and with all her sister States; and that her people bound themselves by it, to and with the people of all the other States, and their State Governments. But let them not then attempt to palliate her ordinance of nullification as a mere breach of contract, or want of good faith. When her people signed the bond, they broke down the State authority by that very act, to the extent of all the power conferred by the bond. They thus far, and to this extent only, obliterated the very divisions and landmarks of the State. They established a Government, in its just powers, above the State Government, which, conscious of its own weakness and inefficiency, asked them first to do so. They voted within the State limits, it is true; they did not assemble with all the people of the other States, at one place, and vote in an aggregate mass; and, because the people of the United States did not do this, which it was utterly impracticable for them to do, we are constantly told, by some of the veriest drivellers that ever misconstrued the effect of a popular act, that their ratification must be held to be a mere State ratification, and to create nothing more than a mere league between the States. Why, sir, if this voting for delegates by State divisions makes their constitution nothing more than a league of States, it must make it something less. They did not vote by States, en masse, but by counties, by hundreds, by townships, and parishes. We ought not then to consider our Government as a confederacy of States, but a compact and league between the most petty subdivisions of the States; and we have formed a confederation of counties and towns, the people of each of which may, at any time, nullify our laws, and stand chargeable only with a breach of compact! The delegates of the people of each State acted in separate conventions, and not in one general convention; and were chosen, not by general ticket voted throughout the United States, but by tickets voted in such divisions as the State Legislatures prescribed. The convention of the States that framed the constitution prescribed this mode, among other reasons, for the convenience of the people, and as best adapted to ascertain their sentiments. Had they voted by general ticket, the qualifications, as well as the true sentiments of many delegates, might have been unknown to nearly one-half the voters. Besides, the object in view could be obtained in no other mode, for the sovereignty of each State could be properly delegated only by its own people. Had they voted en masse, the aggregate majority could not have alienated any portion of the sovereignty of any member of the confederacy whose people had dissented from the act.

Originating, as the Government did, then, both from the States and the people, the "foundation of its powers" would have authorized the creation of a mere confederation, or of a Government exclusively national, or of a Government combining in itself the essential properties of both. I proceed, briefly, now to consider the nature and character of this Government, and the operation of its powers.

The House of Representatives is a body in which the people alone are represented. In the Senate the States alone are represented, without reference to the number of people within their limits. The Executive, exercising a qualified veto on the laws, is the representative of the people and the States combined. These co-ordinate branches of the legislative power are checks on each other, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. HOLMES] has described them. It is, indeed, sir, literally true, that less than one-fifth of the people, by the agency of the representatives of States in this Senate, could now defeat any law proposed by the immediate delegates of the people of the United States in the other branch of Congress. That House is national or popular; this, federative; and the Executive is both national and federative. Well may it be said, that there never was a Government before it, in which the rights of a minority were so completely protected. But this protection does not stop here. Should all these departments of the legislative power concur in trampling on a minority, by the enactment of an unconstitutional law, it may appeal for protection against the operation of that law to the Judiciary, another branch of the Government, the members of which are appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the representatives of the States in this body. And, lastly, should the Judiciary decide in favor of an oppressive law, there lies an appeal to the people to remove the agents who have been guilty of the oppression. The fate of the alien and sedition laws would furnish the honorable member from Virginia with what he would deem an apt illustration of the effective operation of this last and most important check on the exercise of power.

Sovereign power was not only considered as divisible by those who formed this Government, but we see that the chief beauty of their whole structure consists in the many divisions which have been made of it. One portion of it is to be found in the House of Representatives, which, for example, can alone originate impeachments and bills for raising revenue. Another portion of it is in the Senate, which, while it generally exercises concurrent legislative power with the House, has the peculiar right to check the Executive in the administration of the appointing power, and constitutes the National Judiciary in all cases of impeachment. Another portion of sovereign power is in the Executive; another in the Congress and the President combined; another in the Judiciary; another in each State, which can never lose her equal representation in the Senate, without her consent; another in a majority of the people of each State; and another in three-fourths of all the States.

The people have conferred upon the judicial department of their Government the power to settle, in the emphatic language of a resolution of the Legislature of Delaware, which I received yesterday, and which it gives me pleasure to sustain to-day, "all controversies between the United States and the respective States, and all controversies arising under the constitution itself." I view this judicial power as a necessary incident to the right of self-preservation existing in the Government, and as being expressly delegated by the constitution. The gentleman from Virginia contends that, when Governments come into collision, the Supreme Court of the United States cannot decide; and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRAN] takes a distinction between political and judicial power, and avers that the question now in agitation, touching the constitutional power of South Carolina to nullify the laws, cannot be decided by the court, because the decision would involve the exercise of political power.

When Mr. Marshall, the present illustrious president of the court, in his place as a member of the House of Representatives, took the distinction relied upon between judicial and political power, he clearly explained and defined it. I want no better authority than his to sustain my positions, though the adversary argument has been rested upon it. His conceptions, as expressed by himself in that debate, on the case of Jonathan Robbins, was, that the court could decide only in cases brought before it; that it could do nothing of its own mere motion. It has no legislative or executive power; but in every case, in law or equity, which can arise under the constitution or laws, it is, as the courts of the United States are now organized, the sole arbiter, either in the first or in the last resort. And nothing has ever fallen from Mr. Marshall to contradict this principle; on the contrary, the whole current of authorities in the court sustains it.

The true point in issue between us is therefore limited to this: can the question as to the validity of the South Carolina ordinance and legislation, referred to in the Executive message, and whose sole object is to annul and evade our revenue laws, arise before the court? Why not? If it be not presented for determination there, no other intelligible reason can be stated to account for the fact, than the refusal of those who are interested in the matter to bring up that point. In an action for a breach of our tariff laws, the citizen of South Carolina who may claim the benefit of this State interposition, may plead the special matter in bar to the action setting forth the ordinance and laws under which he demands protection. The attorney for the Government must demur to the plea, because the facts contained in it are not traversable. The judgment of the court below and of the court in appeal must be on the very question, whether this ordinance and these laws are constitutional. Will any professional gentleman here deny this? Will any one of them oblige us by stating what difficulty exists in this mode of presenting the whole question in controversy between us to this tribunal? Sir, I defy their scrutiny. They know, as I do, that the case is one which can easily arise before the court, if they dare to submit its decision to that tribunal which the constitution has designated for the purpose.

The President, in his late message in reference to this most interesting subject, has brought back the Government to the true principles of the constitution, and maintained the authority of the court as I have stated it. The sentiments of the Vice President elect coincide with his. Mr. Van Buren, in his speech on the Judiciary in 1826, says:

"It has been justly observed, that there exists not upon this earth, and there never did exist, a judicial tribunal clothed with powers so various, and so important, as the Supreme Court.

"By it treaties and laws made pursuant to the constitution are declared to be the supreme law of the land. So far at least as the acts of Congress depend upon the courts for their execution, the Supreme Court is the judge whether or no such acts are pursuant to the constitution; and from its judgment there is no appeal. Its veto, therefore, may absolutely suspend nine-tenths of the acts of the National Legislature.

"Not only are the acts of the National Legislature subject to its review, but it stands as the umpire between the conflicting powers of the General and State Governments. But this is not all. It not only sits in final judgment upon our acts as the highest legislative body known to the country; it not only claims to be the absolute arbiter between the Federal and State Governments; but it exercises the same great power between the respective States forming this great confederacy and their own citizens.

"There are few States in the Union, upon whose acts the seal of condemnation has not, from time to time, been placed by the Supreme Court. The sovereign authorities of Vermont, New Hampshire, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Missouri, Kentucky, and Ohio, have in turn been rebuked and silenced by the overruling authority of this court. I must not be understood, sir, as complaining of the exercise of this jurisdiction by the Supreme Court, or to pass upon the correctness of their decisions. The authority has been given to them, and this is not the place to question its exercise."

In opposition to all authorities, however, honorable gentlemen quote the Virginia resolutions of 1798, and the report on them in 1799. Mr. Madison, who has recently explained a report, of which he was himself the author, is considered by them as not now correctly understanding what he himself wrote; and we are told that Virginia alone can expound what she meant by her resolutions. While I utterly deny her right to expound for the rest of the world the constitution of the United States; while I hold lightly even her own resolutions, drawn and sent out, as I shall ever believe, chiefly for their political effect in a pending contest for political power between herself and another section of the country; I say to her representatives here, that if she meant in 1798, or in 1799, to deny the powers of the Supreme Court, and arrogate to herself the authority to decide in the last constitutional resort on the laws of Congress or the constitution of the United States, she has repealed her resolutions by still later resolutions, in reply to those of Pennsylvania, in regard to the Olmstead case. My honorable friend from New Jersey [Mr. FRANKLIN] has shown us that when Pennsylvania proposed, in 1810, to amend the constitution, by appointing an arbiter between the decisions of the States and the General Government, Virginia, by an almost unanimous vote of her Legislature, in answer to the proposition, referred Pennsylvania to the court as the only proper arbiter, and recognised the very principles against which one of the Virginia representatives is now contending. Be it the part of others to attempt to exonerate her from the charge of inconsistency at these different periods—that is no task of mine. I think with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HOLMES] that when she has been in power, as she was in 1810, she has generally been a safe expounder of the constitution; but that her political expositions made when out of power, and struggling to obtain it, as she was in 1798, should form no law for others, as we know they have been disregarded by herself. The Senator from Virginia really endeavors to nullify the resolutions of his own State in reply to the proposition of Pennsylvania. He says the last resolutions could not have been well considered, because they were unanimously adopted; and although I have on a former occasion heard the honorable member express the same sentiment, my astonishment has not been diminished by the repetition of it. If a unanimous vote given by Virginia in 1810, in support of my principles, be evidence that she at that day misunderstood the constitution, or spoke without consideration, I am at a loss to imagine how her resolutions, passed by a majority in 1798, now cited to sustain other doctrines, are entitled to any weight whatever. The honorable member is himself not satisfied with the denunciations of the last resolutions of his own State, merely on account of the unanimity with which they were adopted. He seeks to reconcile them with his opinions, and for this purpose invents a distinction between a proposition for the appointment of an arbiter between the States and the Federal Government, which, he says, Virginia never refused to consider, and a proposition for the appointment of an arbiter between the courts of the States and the courts of the Federal Government, which last, he says, was the proposition made by Pennsylvania, and negatived by Virginia. With all due respect for the honorable member, I must reject his distinction as a metaphysical refinement, and as a mere evasion of the true force of the language in which Virginia spoke in her best days. The courts of the States and the courts of the General Government are the official judicial expositors of their respective Governments; and when the judges of the former are compelled to bend before the superior power of the judges of the latter, as they were in the Olmstead case, the State power yields to the supremacy of the federal power, within its appropriate sphere of action. Through the courts of these respective Governments are they always properly brought into collision; and whenever State judges, who are compelled to take an oath to support the federal constitution, either through State pride or prejudice, or in obedience to State power, or from any other cause of error, fail to recognise the just superiority of this Government, their decisions must be submitted to the supervision and control of the federal courts—peaceably, if possible; forcibly, if necessary.

Nothing appears to me more absurd than that eternal declaration daily ringing in our ears, that a Government which has the right to decide on the extent of its own powers, is a Government without limitation of powers—a consolidated empire, and an absolute despotism. Yet we not only hear this declaration made with a view to break down the courts, which form the best bulwark of our republic, but we also hear arguments adduced to attain the object in view, from the history of the constitution itself. Witness the following statement in support of the right of nullification, extracted from the same address of the South Carolina convention to which I have already referred:

"It is fortunate for the view which we have just taken, that the history of the constitution, as traced through the journals of the convention which framed that instrument, places the right contended for upon the same sure foundation. These journals furnish abundant proof that 'no line of jurisdiction between the States and Federal Government, in doubtful cases,' could be agreed on. It was conceded by Mr. Madison and Mr. Randolph, the most prominent advocates for a supreme Government, that it was impossible to draw this line, because no tribunal sufficiently impartial, as they conceived, could be found; and that there was no alternative but to make the Federal Government supreme, by giving it, in all such cases, a negative on the acts of the State Legislatures. The pertinacity with which this negative power was insisted on by the advocates of a National Government, even after all the important provisions of the judiciary or third article of the constitution were arranged and agreed to, proves, beyond doubt, that the Supreme Court was never contemplated by either party in that convention, as an arbiter to decide conflicting claims of sovereignty between the States and Congress; and the repeated rejection of all proposals to take from the States the power of placing their own construction upon the articles of union, evinces that the States were resolved never to part with the right to judge whether the acts of the Federal Legislature were, or were not, an infringement of those articles."

Mr. C. also referred to a passage of the same purport, in Mr. CALHOUN's letter, addressed to Governor Hamilton during the last summer. He then continued:

I tell the Senator from South Carolina that he cannot defend the historical statements contained in this letter. It shall be my business to show how erroneously the facts have been stated upon which these conclusions have been based. The constitution declares that treason against the United States shall consist in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. If the people of South Carolina, when levying war against this Government, can be exempted from the operation of this clause by State interposition, it must be in consequence of some exception contained in the instrument recognising that State right. Such a right cannot exist without some correlative obligation on the part of the Government to respect it. But the constitution acknowledges no such obligation. It denounces the penalties of treason against all who levy war against the United States, without any salvo for State nullifiers; and history tells us that a proposition to save from its operation such as should levy war under the authority of a State was actually voted down in the convention that framed the instrument.

That proposition was made by Luther Martin, one of the delegates from Maryland, a man of distinguished ability and great legal attainments, representing one of those small States, the safety of which was believed to depend on the establishment of a purely federative Government. He opposed the adoption of the constitution, and refused his signature to it. The House of Delegates of Maryland having demanded of him his reasons for refusing to sign the constitution, he appeared before it, and assigned those reasons, embracing in the view he then took of the constitution nearly all the objections to it which have since been urged by others. He objected especially to the powers given to the Supreme Court, and to the clause providing for the punishment of treason. These powers, he contended, consolidated the Government; and he wished to reserve to the States the right of resisting them when arbitrarily exercised. He thought the time might come when the safety of a State might render it necessary to resort to the sword; in which case, as he complained, the constitution provided that every one of her citizens resisting the laws of the Federal Government should be dealt with as traitors. I refer you to his own language:

"It is declared that treason against the United States shall consist in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid or comfort.

"By the principles of the American revolution, arbitrary power may and ought to be resisted, even by arms, if necessary. The time may come when it shall be the duty of a State, in order to preserve itself from the oppression of the General Government, to have recourse to the sword; in which case, the proposed form of Government declares that the State, and every one of its citizens who act under its authority, are guilty of a direct act of treason," &c.

"To save the citizens of the respective States from this disagreeable dilemma, and to secure them from being punishable as traitors to the United States, when acting expressly in obedience to the authority of their own State, I wished to have obtained as an amendment to the third section of this article the following clause: 'Provided, that no act or acts done by one or more of the States against the United States, or by any citizen of one of the United States, under the authority of one or more of the said States, shall be deemed treason, or punished as such; but, in case of war being levied by one or more of the States against the United States, the conduct of each party towards the other, and their adherents, respectively, shall be regulated by the laws of war and of nations.'

"But this provision was not adopted, being too much opposed to the great object of many of the leading members of the convention, which was by all means to leave the States at the mercy of the General Government, since they could not succeed in their immediate and entire abolition."

Such was the language of one of the delegates that framed the constitution, while standing before the Legislature of the State for which he had acted, and endeavoring to dissuade her people from ratifying this constitution. He tells them that he had offered an amendment to authorize resistance to the laws of the Federal Government by the States; that this amendment was rejected; and that the consequence of that rejection is such, that, should the people of the State of Maryland adopt the instrument, she can never after resist the laws of the General Government, without incurring for all her citizens employed in such resistance the pains and penalties of treason.

Mr. CALHOUN: If the authority of Mr. Martin be good, it ought to be taken on both sides; and if the Senator from Delaware will read further on, he will find that a proposition to protect manufactures was voted down.

Mr. CLAYTON proceeded to follow his argument on the single question before him. When the other question suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina, touching the protection of domestic manufactures, shall arise, it will be time to show him that no motion, either of Mr. Martin, or of any other delegate, reserving to the General Government the power of protecting domestic manufactures, was ever rejected by the convention, though the same power was expressly taken from the States; and the motion to which the gentleman has referred, was a motion to confer the power of protection, not on the General Government, but on the States.

The same distinguished delegate from Maryland is equally explicit as to the true meaning of that part of the constitution creating the judicial power. His statement to the people of Maryland on that subject thus proceeds:

"By the third article, the judicial power of the United States is vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. These courts, and these only, will have a right to decide upon the laws of the United States, and all questions arising upon their construction, and in a judicial manner to carry those laws into execution, to which the courts, both superior and inferior, of the respective States, and their judges, and other magistrates, are rendered incompetent. To the courts of the General Government are also confided all cases in law or equity, arising under the proposed constitution, and treaties made under the authority of the United States; all cases affecting ambassadors or other public ministers, and consuls; all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; all controversies to which the United States are a party; all controversies between two or more States; between citizens of the same State, claiming lands under grants of different States; and between a State or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects. Whether, therefore, any laws or regulations of the Congress, or any acts of its President, or other officers, are contrary to, or not warranted by, the constitution, rests only with the judges who are appointed by Congress to determine; by whose determinations every State must be bound. Should any question arise between a foreign consul and any of the citizens of the United States, however remote from the seat of empire, it is to be heard before the Judiciary of the General Government, and in the first instance to be heard in the Supreme Court, however inconvenient to the parties, and however trifling the subject of dispute."

I view this as historical authority, coming from the highest source. It was not, like some things we have heard on this subject, coined for this occasion. It was given to the world at a time when the constitution was under consideration before the people. It ought, sir, to be respected by our opponents, for the author was himself, as appears by his views, a distinguished nullifier. I put it now to the gentleman from South Carolina to answer me, with what propriety could the State of Maryland, whose people adopted this constitution, with a full knowledge of all these facts, under the solemn assurance from her own delegate that no power was reserved in her to decide upon or abrogate the laws of the Union, maintain or defend the right of State nullification or State secession? If she could not, neither can South Carolina.

Let us next examine the history of the constitution, as traced through the journals of the convention, relied upon, as we have seen, by South Carolina statesmen, in support of this pretended right of nullification. On the 31st of May, 1787, "it was resolved, that the National Legislature ought to be empowered to enjoy the legislative rights vested in Congress by the confederation, and moreover to legislate in all cases to which the separate States are incompetent, or in which the harmony of the United States may be interrupted by the exercise of individual legislation; and to negative all laws passed by the several States, contravening, in the opinion of the National Legislature, the articles of the Union, or any treaties subsisting under the authority of the Union."

It does not appear that there was any division of sentiment on the adoption of this resolution. At that early period of the convention, it was thought proper to check State legislation by national legislation: the propriety of checking it by the National Judiciary was not yet determined upon: On the 8th of June Mr. Pinckney moved, seconded by Mr. Madison, to extend this power in the National Legislature, so far as to authorize them "to negative all laws which shall appear to them improper;" but this motion, which would have effectually consolidated the Government, failed by a vote of seven States against three. The resolution of the 31st of May, vesting in the National Legislature the judicial power of determining what State laws contravened the articles of union, or treaties under the authority of the Union, appears to have remained the sentiment of the convention until the 17th July, when, by a vote of seven States against three, it was stricken out, and it was unanimously resolved, "that the legislative acts of the United States made by virtue and in pursuance of the articles of union, and all treaties made and ratified under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the respective States, as far as those acts or treaties shall relate to the said States, or their citizens and inhabitants; and that the judiciaries of the several States shall be bound thereby in their decisions: any thing in the respective laws of the individual States to the contrary notwithstanding."

The gentleman from South Carolina, in his letter to Governor Hamilton, relies on the vote of the 17th July, which negatives the resolution of the 31st of May, to prove that the sentiment of the convention at that time was, that no power should be vested in the General Government to contravene the acts of the States. Yet, on that same day, and immediately before the passage of that vote, it was "Resolved, on the motion of Mr. Bedford, of Delaware, That Congress should legislate, in all cases, for the general interest of the Union; and also in those to which the States are separately incompetent, or in which the harmony of the United States may be interrupted by the exercise of individual legislation." Why, then, was the resolution of the 31st of May repealed on the 17th of July? Evidently, not as the gentleman from

South Carolina has supposed, for the purpose of determining that the General Government should not check State legislation when contrary to its own, but because they had, at that time, seen the impropriety of conferring judicial power on a legislative body; and, accordingly, on the very next day, being the 18th of July, they "unanimously resolved, that the jurisdiction of the National Judiciary shall extend to cases arising under laws passed by the General Legislature, and to such other questions as involve the national peace and harmony."

Mr. CALHOUN: If the gentleman will refer to the journals, he will find, that in August after this, the convention refused to give this Government any power to negative State laws interfering with the general interests and harmony of the Union.

Mr. CLAYTON: True, sir. On the 23d of August, after the important provisions of the judiciary or third article of the constitution were arranged and agreed to, it was moved and seconded to agree to the following proposition, as an additional power to be vested in the Legislature of the United States: "To negative all laws passed by the several States, interfering, in the opinion of the Legislature, with the general interests and harmony of the Union, provided two-thirds of the members of each House assent to the same." And, after an unsuccessful effort to commit this proposition, it was withdrawn. It was not adopted, clearly because it was a new proposition to confer judicial power on the National Legislature after the convention had resolved to confer all the power necessary for checking State legislation on the National Judiciary. No body of men ever was more sensible of the necessity of keeping separate the judicial, the legislative, and the executive power, than that which framed the American constitution was at this period; and yet, their determination to separate these different departments of the Government, is the very circumstance relied upon on the part of South Carolina to demonstrate the want of any judicial control over her State legislation. Proposals to blend judicial with legislative power, rejected, as they were, by the convention, are construed into propositions to take from the States the power of placing their own construction upon the articles of union; and we are gravely told by the South Carolina convention, and by her Senator here, that these votes evince the determination of the States never to part with the right to judge whether the acts of the Federal Legislature were, or were not, an infringement of these articles.

There is one class of cases in which the National Legislature exercises the power of revision and control over State legislation. The States are prohibited, without the consent of Congress, to lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing their inspection laws; and it is provided that all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of Congress. On the 15th September, 1787, it was moved in convention, to strike out this proviso, the effect of which motion, if successful, would have been to subject these State inspection laws to the supervision of the National Judiciary, but not of the National Legislature. The motion failed, and the retention of this power of revision and control in Congress clearly exhibits the exceeding jealousy, on the part of the convention, of any State interference on the great subject of imports and duties, over which South Carolina has recklessly extended her State ordinance and State legislation.

The action of the Federal Judiciary, and, indeed, of the Federal Government, generally, is not upon States, but upon individuals. A law-suit can hardly arise between a State and the United States. It would seem needless to discuss the question, whether the Supreme Court of the United States could entertain jurisdiction of a case between this Government and one of the States. Yet, as this jurisdiction has been denied, it may not be amiss to advert to the fact, that the second section of the third article expressly extends the judicial power to all "controversies to which the United States shall be a party;" and ordains that, in those cases in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. A prevailing error of the gentleman from South Carolina, in all his expositions of the constitution, in relation to this subject, appears to me to consist in this: that he supposes this Government, in order to enforce its laws, in defiance of the ordinance of South Carolina, must be first driven into a law-suit with that State as a State; but no such suit is necessary or would now be proper. The object of the bill before us is to enforce obedience from the citizens of South Carolina, as American citizens, not to punish the State, or to declare "war against her for her unjustifiable ordinance." We do not recognise her right to assume the attitude of a belligerent nation towards this Government, or any of her sister States; and we claim no right to make war upon her as a sovereign and independent State. On the contrary, we expressly repudiate the whole doctrine which holds her up as a foreign nation: we concur with Luther Martin, that allegiance is due from her citizens to the United States, and that, if they levy war against this Government, they incur, by that act, all the pains and penalties of treason. Nevertheless, I will take the pains to refute the argument drawn by the gentleman from South Carolina, in his letter to Governor Hamilton, from the journals of the convention, touching the power of the Supreme Court to decide a controversy between the United States and one of the States. It is truly stated in that letter, that, on the 20th of August, 1787, the following, among other propositions, was referred to the committee of five: "The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court shall be extended to all controversies between the United States and an individual State, or the United States and the citizens of an individual State;" but the historical information given by the gentleman in that letter is essentially erroneous; for the writer supposes that the subject was never moved in convention again. So far from this being true, it appears from the journals, that, on the 22d of August, the honorable Mr. Rutledge, from South Carolina, chairman of the committee to whom this and other propositions were referred, reported in favor of it. The last sentence of the report is in the following words: "Between the fourth and fifth lines of the third section of the eleventh article, after the word 'controversies,' insert 'between the United States and an individual person.'"

Mr. CALHOUN. What I have denied is, that that report was ever adopted by the convention.

Mr. CLAYTON: Then the gentleman is entirely mistaken; for as appears by the journal of the convention of the 27th of August, just five days after the report was made, while the convention was engaged in considering the draught of the constitution, reported on the 6th of August by the committee of five, the 3d section of the 11th article in that draught came before the House, which was in the following words: "Article eleventh, section third. The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court shall extend to all cases arising under laws passed by the Legislature of the United States; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls; to the trial of impeachments of officers of the United States; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies between two or more States, except such as shall regard territory or jurisdiction; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; and between a State or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects. In cases of impeachment, cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the jurisdiction shall be original."

It was then moved and seconded to add the following words after the word "controversies," third section, eleventh article—"to which the United States shall be a party," which passed in the affirmative.

It was also moved and seconded to insert the word "controversies" before the words "between two or,"—passed in the affirmative.

It was moved and seconded to insert the words "the United States or" before the words "a State shall be a party," which passed in the affirmative.

Thus we see, sir, that, on the 27th of August, 1787, the convention did in fact adopt the whole of this part of Mr. Rutledge's report, by extending the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to all controversies whatsoever to which the United States shall be a party. The amendments made that day now stand incorporated in the constitution, and posterity will recur to them only for the purpose of showing that a special vote was taken in convention on the very question, whether the court should have jurisdiction over all possible cases in which the United States may be interested, whether against a State or private individuals.

Mr. CALHOUN: But will the gentleman contend that a State may be sued since the adoption of the eleventh amendment?

Mr. CLAYTON: The eleventh amendment prevents any suit against a State by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State; but does not in any way impair the right of the United States to sue a State. It was never designed to impair that right.

The historical evidence of the intentions of the framers and friends of the constitution does not stop with the journal. Their contemporaneous expositions in "the Federalist," and the debates in the conventions of the people for adopting the constitution, all show the fatal error into which the South Carolina convention has fallen. Mr. Madison, in the Virginia convention, said, "It may be a misfortune that in organizing any Government, the explication of its authority should be left to any of its co-ordinate branches. There is no example in any country where it is otherwise. There is a new policy in submitting it to the Judiciary of the United States." Mr. Stillman, in the convention of Massachusetts, said, "The very term 'Government' implies a supreme controlling power somewhere: a power to coerce, whenever coercion shall be necessary; of which necessity Government must be the judge." A complete answer to all that part of the address which denies the power of the court, and asserts the right of a State to decide for itself as one of the parties to a compact, was given by Mr. Wilson, in the convention of Pennsylvania, about forty-five years ago. "I cannot," says he, "discover the least trace of a compact in the system. The State Governments made a bargain with one another: that is the doctrine that is endeavored to be established by gentlemen in opposition; their State sovereignties wish to be represented. But far other were the ideas of the convention, and far other are those conveyed in the system itself. I know very well all the commonplace rant of State sovereignties, and that Government is founded in original compact. This does not suit the language or genius of the system before us. It is not a contract or compact; the system itself tells you what it is. It is an ordinance, an establishment of the people."

Governor Johnston, in the convention of North Carolina, said, "The constitution must be the supreme law of the land; otherwise it will be in the power of any one State to counteract the other States, and withdraw itself from the Union. The laws made in pursuance thereof by Congress ought to be the supreme law of the land; otherwise, any one State might repeal the laws of the Union at large. Every treaty should be the supreme law of the land; without this, any one State might involve the whole Union in war." Sir, I will trouble you with no further quotations. The history of 1787 is full of them, and he who consults it will be astonished that South Carolina should have appealed to it to support her. Vain, vain, indeed, sir, was that boast of the gentleman from Virginia, that "the nationals were routed in that day." No, thank God! however they may have been of late years thrown into the shade by the false glare of that burning heresy which holds out this Government as a mere confederation of States, we know that theirs were the principles of the fathers of the constitution, and that they gloriously triumphed when that sacred ordinance rose upon the ruins of a helpless league and a state of unbridled anarchy.

The honorable member from Kentucky [Mr. BISS] has stated, with great ingenuity, some cases in which the Supreme Court may abuse its powers while exercising its appellate jurisdiction. In his view, the features of this great tribunal are essentially monarchical, because the judges are appointed virtually for life; and, being liable to no other responsibility than the nominal power of impeachment, may, he thinks, at any time establish the most despotic principle, without any possible control, save that of revolutionary resistance to their decision. Were all this true, the argument which demonstrates the possibility of abusing power does not disprove the existence of the power in the court to decide, in the last resort, on all cases arising under the constitution and the laws. But it is not true. By the constitution the appellate jurisdiction of the court is expressly made liable to such exceptions, and placed under such regulations, as Congress shall establish. Should an extreme case, such as the Senator from Kentucky has supposed, ever occur, the remedy is not revolution, or war on the Government, but a discreet and cautious exercise of the power of Congress to curtail the appellate jurisdiction of the court. For any other purpose, save that of preventing the destruction of the Government itself, the appellate powers of the court should never be essentially changed.

Having thus far, Mr. President, developed my views of the character of this Government, I return to the point from which I departed, to answer the interrogatory of the gentleman from Virginia—can there be such a thing as a citizen of the United States? There are some thirteen millions of human beings within their limits, who are, as we have seen, liable to the punishment of treason when levying war against them; all bound to consider their laws and their constitution as supreme; all indebted to their Government for protection; all contributing to the support of that Government, and compelled to obey it, both in peace and in war; forming, together, for all the great purposes enumerated in their constitution, one people and a single nation. The allegiance of the people is rightfully due, because it has been freely given to the United States; and its duties can, and ought to be, strictly enforced by the severest of all penalties when traitorously withheld. The laws of this Government, and the various treaties it has made, recognise the character of citizen, in its broadest signification, as properly belonging to every free man born and residing within its limits, or naturalized by means of its legislation. Can the gentleman from Virginia still deny that he is a citizen of the United States?

Mr. TYLER: I deny that I am a citizen of the Government of the United States. I do not deny that I am a citizen of the United States.

Mr. CLAYTON: It is no part of my purpose to bandy useless metaphysical distinctions with any member here. He is as much a citizen of this Government, as a Frenchman is a citizen of the Government of France, or an Englishman of the Government of his country. But all the acknowledgment that I desire of the honorable gentleman, in order to compel him to admit the justice of the principles upon which this bill is founded, is, that he, and all those upon whom the bill is intended to operate, are citizens of the United States. When the gentleman has made that admission, in vain will he contend that his obligations to Virginia are higher than those which he owes to the Federal Government; in vain will he contend that his most valuable rights are best secured to him by the State. Were Virginia the separate nation which his argument would make her appear to be, her citizens would soon find the difference between that protection which they now enjoy, as citizens of our common country, and such protection as she could give them. High as she now justly stands among her sister States, forming, with them, an impregnable bulwark for all our countrymen against foreign aggression, she would, single-handed, make but a very sorry figure in a contest with any considerable foreign Power.

Revenue Collection Bill.

Sir, were it not for sheer compassion towards some of those gentlemen who indulge us so often with extravagant declamation about State power and State supremacy, it would be well to ring the truth daily in their ears, until they are cured of these diseased imaginations, that neither the "old dominion," nor even the "empire State" herself, could singly, and successfully, measure strength with one of the second rate powers of Europe. The gentleman from Virginia, who has filled his present station with so much honor to himself and usefulness to his country, denies that he is a Senator of the United States, and asserts that he is only a Senator of Virginia. He denies the very existence of such a character as that of a Senator of the United States. Each member here, in his view, is bound to legislate for his own State, and can represent no other. But where is the clause in the constitution which recognizes a Senator of Virginia, of Delaware, or any other single State, in this hall? This is not the Senate of Virginia, but of the United States. The honorable member says that he acts here only in obedience to the wishes of Virginia; that he yields obedience to this Government only because Virginia wills it. The constitution and laws of the United States have no binding force with him from any other cause than this, that Virginia commands him to obey them. The result of all this doctrine is, that, whenever Virginia wills it, he will violate this constitution, and set these laws at defiance. In opposition to all this, hear the creed of a national republican: I obey this constitution, and act as a Senator of the United States under it, because I have sworn to support that constitution. I hold myself bound, while acting in my station here, to legislate for the benefit of the whole country, not merely for that of any section of it; and, in the discharge of my duty, I will look abroad throughout this wide republic, never sacrificing the interests of any one part of it merely to gratify another, but always dealing out and distributing equal justice to all my countrymen, wherever they may be located, or by whatever title they may be distinguished from each other.

I cannot dismiss this subject without entering a general protest against the mode of argument adopted by gentlemen on the other side. Throughout the whole debate, they have constantly supposed that all the parts of our system of Government will be simultaneously corrupt. Their argument is bottomed on the belief that Congress, the Executive, the Judiciary, and even the people themselves, will be lost to all regard for the true interests of the nation. The remarks of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky dwell much on supposed cases of the abuse of federal power; but it seemed that his imagination could never reach a possible case of the abuse of those powers which he claimed for the States. While the advocates of South Carolina are indulging in suppositions so degrading to this Government and the people of these States, why is it that she, with her ordinance of nullification, her replevin laws, her test oaths, her virtual disfranchisement of her own citizens for an honest difference of political opinion, not only escapes all their censure, but is actually applauded by them for her tyranny and oppression? As gentlemen have indulged so much in arguments founded on extreme cases, I will give them one by no means so extravagant as some which they have put to us, to illustrate the consequences of their own doctrine. A State has about ten thousand votes. Suppose some ten or twelve thousand aliens should be sent into that State by some foreign nation, for the very purpose of working out the doctrine of nullification there. If the doctrine be sound, these aliens may all be naturalized, without incurring any obligation of obedience to this Government by the oaths they may take at the time of their naturalization. Suppose that, in conformity with the great object for which they were sent, they elect a convention of nullifiers, and proceed in due form to abrogate all the acts of Congress, and pass all laws necessary for giving their ordinance effect; what an easy and most effectual mode for any foreign nation to subdue this Government, and break up this Union; and how strange is it that no foreign nation has ever yet been wise enough to adopt so cheap a plan of destroying that Government which has been the object of so much jealousy to tyrants! During the continuance of the old confederation, the State of Delaware alone nullified an embargo act, to which all the other States had yielded their assent, at a time when that act was considered by many to be the only means of salvation for the army. Under that form of Government, as one of the parties to a mere compact of States, she had the unquestionable power to nullify the law; but when the convention which framed our present constitution was engaged in deliberating on the propriety of adding a national character to the Federative Government, Mr. Madison mentioned this very fact to illustrate the necessity of rendering the laws of the Union supreme.

Before the constitution was adopted, the old confederation itself, weak and inefficient as it was, had the power, in the opinion of Mr. Jefferson, to enforce the execution of its own revenue laws. In his letter to Mr. Cartwright, in 1787, he is full and explicit on this subject. The force which he desired to employ to compel obedience on the part of the States to the requisitions of the old Congress, was the naval power. [Mr. C. then referred to two other letters of Mr. Jefferson, sustaining the same opinion.]

I come next, sir, to a brief consideration of the question, are the provisions of the bill before us such as are proper to secure that obedience to the laws of this Government which the proceedings of South Carolina are calculated to withhold? The leading clause in this bill, authorizing the President to employ the land and naval forces of the Union to arrest the unconstitutional proceedings of the officers of South Carolina, should they attempt to rescue imported goods from our revenue officers, has been the subject of bitter denunciation by Southern gentlemen, and particularly by the gentleman from Virginia. Sir, this is almost a literal transcript from the act of 1809, for enforcing the embargo law. [Mr. C. read the eleventh section of that act, to show that it employed the very words of the bill before the Senate.] Let us now inquire who voted for an act so similar in its provisions to that now before us. Fortunately, the journals of Congress of that day have preserved the yeas and nays on a motion to strike out the eleventh section of the embargo law. In both Houses, nearly all the representatives from Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, voted for a bill, which, when now sought to be applied to a different section of the country, is the object of their animadversion and horror. As strong remonstrances were then made against the passage of this law by Congress from other parts of the United States as are now presented in behalf of South Carolina, and were then, as they will be now, made in vain.

That part of the bill which authorizes the President to remove the custom-house from land to water, and directs the collection of duties in cash whenever that shall be conceived necessary in order to secure the collection of the duties, is considered as unconstitutional by the gentleman from Virginia, because it delegates power to the President, which, in his opinion, can be exercised by Congress alone.

Mr. TYLER explained: He said his argument was, that the constitution devolved on Congress no right to depute another to execute their power.

Mr. CLAYTON: But the constitution expressly gives to Congress the power "to regulate commerce;" and in the execution of that power, it has been found indispensable to employ agents to act in certain contingencies at their own discretion. If Congress cannot empower a collector to demand payment of the duties in cash for the safety of the revenue, it cannot empower him to demand a valid bond for the duties. No legislative power is devolved on any executive officer by this clause of the bill; and as to that general objection which honorable gentlemen have indulged in, touching the alleged preference given by this regulation of commerce to the ports of one State over those of another, the answer is conclusive, that no part of this bill is confined in its operations to the ports of any one State, or any particular section of the Union, as distinguished from the rest. The terms of the law are general. It is co-extensive with the Union, and will apply equally wherever the evil which it is intended to redress shall be found to exist.

The second and third sections of this bill, which authorize the removal of any cause now pending in any State court, in which either party claims right or title under any law of the United States, and which render irrevocable, by process from any State court, any property held or claimed by any person under any law of this Government, are, in my judgment, unnecessary and improper restrictions on the just powers of the State courts, and will prove oppressive in practice on the suitors in those courts.

Mr. WEBSTER: None but officers of the United States can take advantage of those sections.

Mr. CLAYTON: Such, I suppose, was the intention of the committee; but the gentleman from Massachusetts will perceive that "any officer or other person" is authorized to remove the suit in the one case, and to resist the process of the State court in the other. These sections should be modified to suit that view which the Senator from Massachusetts has, it seems, heretofore taken of them;* or if it can be shown that they are necessary in their present shape to countervail the legislation of South Carolina, their operation should be restricted, by a proviso, to such States as shall attempt to set at defiance the revenue laws of the country.

The sixth section of the bill provides that, in any State where the jails are not allowed to be used for the imprisonment of persons arrested or committed under the laws of the United States, or where houses are not allowed to be used, it shall be lawful for the marshal, under the direction of the district judge, to use other convenient places, and to make such further provision as he may deem expedient and necessary for that purpose. To this the honorable Senator from Virginia takes much exception; he declares it to be a "Botany Bay law;" and tells us that it is even worse than the English act which has received that designation. The Botany Bay law has been found in England to be a very good law, most salutary in its operations there; and, to this day, it stands unrepealed on the statute book, and countenanced by the approbation of the best statesmen of that country. Botany Bay is still thought to be a proper place for people guilty of less crimes than treason. But the gentleman will perceive that this section does not propose transportation as a punishment for crime; it is introduced here because we have been officially informed that South Carolina has refused the use of her jails to the courts of the United States, and its object is to secure, without the aid of South Carolina, jails, and, independently of South Carolina legislation, the persons of such as shall dare to violate our laws. It is similar to a resolution still remaining on our statute book, and adopted soon after this Government went into operation. On the 3d of September, 1789, Congress recommended to the several States to pass laws, making it expressly the duty of the keepers of their jails to receive and safe keep therein all prisoners committed under the authority of the United States. Several States having neglected to comply with this recommendation, the resolution to which I have referred, and which will be found in the second volume of the laws, page 236, was adopted, providing "that, in case any State shall not have complied with the said recommendation, the marshal in such State, under the direction of the judge of the district, be authorized to hire a convenient place to serve as a temporary jail, and to make the necessary provision for the safe keeping of prisoners, committed under the authority of the United States, until permanent provision should be made by law for that purpose." Does the gentleman from Virginia object to this resolution, or does he consider that the exigency that has now occurred, demanding the enactment of a law similar to it, is less urgent than that which originally called for its adoption?

Mr. TYLER: By that resolution, the prisoner was not to be taken out of the State. By this bill, he may be carried to any convenient place, at the discretion of the judge. By the resolution, the place was pointed out. So the English bill designated Botany Bay. The place is specifically named. But I would ask the gentleman from Delaware, whether by this bill there is any limitation whatever imposed upon the judge or marshal? They may carry the prisoner wherever they think proper.

Mr. CLAYTON: I deny that the resolution, to which I have referred the honorable member, specifies any particular place of confinement, or that the marshal is required by it to confine his prisoners within the limits of the State. If, however, the gentleman seriously requires it, I apprehend no friend of the bill will object to such a restriction on the powers of the marshal, as would prevent him from taking a prisoner beyond the limits of the district. The gentleman from Kentucky has indulged in the most bitter invectives against this section of the bill, which he considers as a provision to revive all the terrors and oppressions of the Jersey prison ship. Undoubtedly, this bill would authorize the Executive, when driven by the laws of South Carolina from any other place of imprisonment for prisoners, to confine them in a vessel on the water. And if this Government should find it necessary to the faithful execution of its laws, and the preservation of its own character, to carry any man, either in or out of South Carolina, to prison in a ship, I trust it will never be deterred from the discharge of its constitutional duty by sickly commentaries on Botany Bay, or mere fancy sketches of the Jersey prison ship. The great object of this, and the other sections of the bill, all who read it will understand, is to prevent the collision of actual force between the General and State Governments; and some of its most important features have been drawn from the legislation of Congress in the days of the whiskey insurrection and of the Hartford convention.

The honorable Senator from South Carolina has told us that all human institutions, like those who formed them, contain within themselves the elements of their own destruction; and that our own Government is now exhibiting their operation. To this general philosophic remark I should not have objected but for its application. All the works of man are destined to decay; but while the American people shall remain true to themselves, their Government cannot be destroyed; for it contains, within itself, endless and ever-renewed energies, which must bring it out in triumph, and with Antean vigor, in despite of every effort to overthrow it. From foreign force it has nothing to fear; it dreads nothing now from any section of this Union which shall seek to prevent the just operation of our laws by foreign intervention. Yes, sir, a foreign alliance, sought by any member of this confederacy, for the purpose of making war upon us, would be the means, under Heaven, of immediately rallying every patriot, of every political party, under the broad banner of the republic. Popular virtue, however, is the only safe basis of popular Government. This is the "fountain from which our current runs, or bears no life;" and I concede that the mortal blow to the liberties of this country may, at last, be struck by the hand of one who has been indebted to it for existence. The shaft which shall stretch the American eagle bleeding and lifeless in the dust must be feathered from his own bright pinions; and bitter will be the curses of men, in all ages to come, against the traitorous heart and the parricidal hand of him who shall loose that fatal arrow from the string!

"Remember him, the villain, righteous Heaven,
In thy great day of vengeance! Blast the traitor,
And his pernicious counsels, who, for wealth,
For power, the pride of greatness, or revenge,
Would plunge his native land in civil war!"

Mr. MANGUM rose, and moved to postpone the further consideration of this bill till to-morrow. He stated that he was desirous to give his sentiments on this bill, but he was at this moment laboring too severely under indisposition to be able to go into so arduous a task.

Mr. FORSYTH said, he was unwilling to resist such an appeal from any Senator, but he would make a single suggestion. There were some amendments which the committee intended to make, and there were a few others which would be necessary to obviate some objections which its friends had to its details. He would suggest that these amendments should be now proposed, so that the bill might be put into a shape which would make it agreeable to all its friends, and afterwards the Senate might proceed in the discussion of its general principles.

Mr. GRUNDY said, the difficulty could not be obviated in that way. The committee had appointed to meet to-morrow morning, for the purpose of making all the necessary amendments. He could not, of course, be prepared to offer them all at this time.

Mr. WILKINS said, it would be impossible to determine what amendments would be likely to be agreeable to the Senate, until the subject should have been fully discussed. He hoped, therefore, that the debate would go on.

Mr. KING said he presumed the gentleman from Pennsylvania had not distinctly heard his friend from North Carolina, who had stated that he was unable to proceed, from indisposition.

Mr. CALHOUN suggested that there was another consideration which was entitled to weight. The Senator from North Carolina was the only member of the Committee on the Judiciary who had objected to this bill. That gentleman, therefore, stood in a peculiar attitude, and he put it to the Senate, whether, on the score of justice, he was not entitled to such indulgence as he might require, to enable him to give a satisfactory exposition of the reasons by which he was actuated, the more especially as he appeared to be so unwell.

Mr. WILKINS said he should be the last man to force the gentleman from North Carolina, for whom he had a great respect, to enter into this discussion without sufficient preparation. But he believed that he was fully prepared to debate the question at this time.

Mr. FORSYTH said, under such circumstances, he could not vote against the motion for postponement.

On the call of Mr. WILKINS, the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CALHOUN said, the Senator from Pennsylvania could not have heard the gentleman from North Carolina, who had put his request on the ground of indisposition.

Mr. WEBSTER said there was no occasion for postponement. The bill could make progress, and the gentleman from North Carolina could be heard on any other day as well as now. He begged the Senator to consider that but a few days remained of the session, that a number of Senators desired to be heard on this question, and that important business might be expected from the other House. If this bill was to be definitively acted on, it could only be done by showing a determination to sit out the discussion. They ought to sit there until late in the evening, for at the rate of a speech a day the bill would never be got through.

Mr. CALHOUN said, that, if any other Senator, on either side of the House, was ready to go on with the debate, he would make no objection to sit out the day. But he thought that the gentleman from North Carolina was in justice entitled to the indulgence of the Senate.

Mr. KING said that, if the gentleman from Massachusetts wished to deliver his sentiments on the bill, he hoped the motion would be withdrawn for that purpose, and he would be happy to listen to the gentleman to as great a length as he might desire.

Mr. WEBSTER: The gentleman from Alabama is extremely kind; and his kindness is justly appreciated. The gentleman from Massachusetts fully understands the gentleman from Alabama, but he has no disposition to address the Senate at present, nor, under existing circumstances, at any other time, on the subject of this bill.

The question was then taken on the motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill to to-morrow and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Black, Brown, Calhoun, Forsyth, Holmes, King, Miller, Moore, Poindexter, Rives, Robinson, Smith, Tyler, Waggaman—14.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Clay, Dallas, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, Knight, Naudain, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, White, Wilkins, Wright—25.

Mr. MANGUM commenced his observations in opposition to the bill. He adverted to the peculiar and novel situation in which he found himself, standing there for the first time making battle in his feeble way against the mass of friends with whom he had heretofore contended shoulder to shoulder. But he found himself sustained by assistance from his native land—from that region where all his affections were centered—by men who were not under any Executive influence, and who stood forward to perform their duty regardless of all consequences to themselves.

Opposed to him he perceived gentlemen who had hitherto not exhibited any great anxiety to aid this administration; but who, discovering in this bill a policy which conformed to their own principles, were solicitous to press it through. He regarded this as one of the most important questions which would be discussed before the present Congress.

He then proceeded to discuss the question of the power of the Government. After proceeding about fifteen minutes,

Mr. POINDEXTER moved that the Senate now adjourn, as the gentleman was evidently too much indisposed to proceed. He asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered accordingly.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative—Yeas 10, nays 25.

Military Orders.

[SENATE.]

Mr. M. then resumed, and drew a parallel between the course pursued by the British Government previous to the war of the revolution, and that which was now pursued by the General Government against South Carolina. To sustain this view, he read copious extracts from the history of that period. After continuing in this strain for some time, Mr. M. yielded the floor to

Mr. SPRAGUE, who moved that the Senate now adjourn; which was negatived—Yeas 15, nays 16.

Mr. M. then resumed, and continued his argument until near 4 o'clock, when he again yielded the floor to

Mr. TYLER, who said that the Senate had now sufficiently indicated their determination to sit till a late hour every afternoon, for the purpose of bringing this debate to a close. He would therefore move that the Senate now adjourn.

Mr. WEBSTER did not intend to oppose the motion; but rose for the purpose of giving notice that, for one, he should vote hereafter against any motion to adjourn before five or six o'clock, until the bill should be disposed of.

The motion to adjourn was then carried without a division.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 8.

MILITARY ORDERS.

The Senate, on motion of Mr. GRUNDY, took up the following resolution offered yesterday by Mr. POINDEXTER:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate copies of the orders which have been given to the commanding officer of the military forces assembled in and near to the city of Charleston, South Carolina; and also copies of the orders which have been given to the commander of the naval forces assembled in the harbor of Charleston; particularly such orders, if any such have been given, to resist the constituted authorities of the State of South Carolina, within the chartered limits of said State."

The resolution being read—

Mr. GRUNDY said he was in favor of the main object of the resolution, but he wished to propose a modification of it before it was adopted. The first part of the resolution, he said, did not leave to the Executive that discretion, as to the extent and bearing of the information to be communicated, which was always allowed in resolutions of this kind, that nothing might be required from the Executive detrimental to the public interest. On this occasion, he would barely say, without pretending to any particular knowledge on the subject, that he believed the answer to the resolution, as he should propose to modify it, would be satisfactory to the gentleman and the Senate. His design in moving an amendment was not to prevent the copies of all military orders issued by the Government from being sent to the Senate, but to put it in the power of the Executive, without being subject to the imputation of refusing to comply with a request of the Senate, to withhold any thing connected with the papers called for which might involve private individuals. For himself, he was for withholding nothing that it was proper to ask for, operate how it might. If there were any orders affecting the constituted authorities of South Carolina, especially, he thought the Senate and the people ought to have them, without any reservation. Mr. G. then moved to amend the resolution, by inserting after the words "before the Senate," the words "so far as may in his judgment be compatible with the public interest."

Mr. POINDEXTER said he thought yesterday, from indications then given, that this call placed the gentleman from Tennessee in an awkward predicament, and he was now sure of it. After they had consulted their pillows, they had come to the Senate with a determination to destroy it if in their power to do so. He denied the proposition, that, in regard to any orders to an officer of the army or the navy, in time of peace, it had been usual, or was proper, to make any exception whatever in calls upon the Executive. There were two classes of cases, in which, when calls were made upon the Executive for information, exceptions were made: the one, in the case of a pending treaty, when a disclosure of diplomatic papers or correspondence by the Executive might be detrimental to the public interest, in which case a discretion as to that point was usually left to the Executive; the other class of cases was when, in time of war, a call was made upon the Executive for copies of orders issued to the commanding officer at any particular station, in which case it was indispensably necessary to leave to the Executive a discretion to withhold them, or any part of them, because the disclosure of them might give warning to the enemy, injuriously to the interest of our own cause. But in time of profound peace with all the world, and at home, and at a time when no act of violence had been committed by any portion of the American people; when the strong arm of the Legislature was stretched out to the Legislature of one of the States of the Union, commanding them to retrace their steps, or abide the pains and penalties of treason; and when we see the assembly of land and naval forces on that station, and want to ask why the Executive assembles them, and what they are to do, Oh, says the gentleman, pray keep these orders secret. Sir, what mischief can proceed, in this time of peace, from giving publicity to the orders to the commanding officers of those forces? Suppose a case: suppose that an order should have been issued to the military, if the Legislature of the State of South Carolina should attempt to assemble, to go into their halls and disperse them, or that an order should have been issued to capture certain individuals, and dispose of them under the second section. Gentlemen may smile at that, but I say, suppose the case of orders having been issued such as those which were issued under the administration of Lord North, for the seizure of particular refractory individuals, ought not such things to be known? I will not say why gentlemen wince at this call; it may appear, on a full disclosure, that there is something rotten in the State of Denmark—yes, rotten, which will not bear examination. It may appear that the Executive is disposed to excite discord and civil war in the South, in order to have a pretext to march an army to overrun the country. If no such alarming disclosures are apprehended, why not let the resolution pass as originally moved? Coupled with the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. P. said he would withdraw his resolution, if he could. He would thank that gentleman, he said, or any other, to tell him what exception could be taken to the call which it proposed, in a time of profound peace, when the answer to it could not operate to the prejudice of our foreign relations. We have lately heard some strange doctrines, Mr. P. said, about State sovereignty, and the supremacy of the General Government; and, if not checked, they will ultimately creep up to the supreme head of the Government, which will be found granting privileges, and issuing orders to the people, instead of deriving authority and instruction from them. He was sorry to see this opposition to his reasonable motion; it seemed to be indicative of a disposition to shroud in secrecy the movements of the Executive authority; and if this amendment should be fastened upon his motion, he should take the liberty, in future discussion, of drawing his own inferences as to the nature of the orders which gentlemen dare not call for. Sir, said Mr. P., there was a drawing-room last night, and great anxiety was manifested, it is said, on the part of some gentlemen, to get the ear of the President.

Mr. GRUNDY said, that whenever the gentleman from Mississippi should think proper to draw the inferences which he had alluded to, they should be met with a positive denial. Mr. G. would undertake to say, with the little information that he had, that no military movement had been made by the Executive, either against individuals or against the authority of the State of South Carolina. And, while the gentleman from Mississippi professed so great an anxiety to prevent or avert civil strife, Mr. G. asked whether the answer to his resolution, unlimited as it was, might not lead to the very result which he deprecated? Now suppose the case, that some citizen of South Carolina, among the most respectable of her citizens, should have given information to the Executive, and that upon that information orders should have been issued; does the gentleman want the name of this citizen and all these circumstances disclosed? [Mr. POINDEXTER, (in an under tone:) Yes, the whole of them.] Would not such disclosure lead to the immediate shedding of blood? [Mr. P. expressed, in an under tone, his disregard of the consequences.] I wish to see all that the Executive has done, said Mr. G., in continuation, but I do not wish to see all confidential communications which it has received thrown before the public, the disclosure of which would be followed by blood. That was what he wished to avoid. He had no objection to seeing copies called for of every order which the Executive had issued; but, if all communications with the officers, confidential or otherwise, were to be disclosed, consequences might be expected to follow which gentlemen who urge this resolution would themselves deplore. What did the gentleman want? To know what the Executive had done of a public nature? The amendment now proposed would not prevent his getting that information in full. Gentlemen had better wait until they got the answer to the resolution before they undertook to tell what it would disclose: they would then find that nothing like war was intended; nothing but defensive measures, and those of the most pacific kind.

SENATE.]

Military Orders.

Further, Mr. G. said, without knowing any thing of the kind, he would suppose another case: that an officer was stationed at any particular post, whose feelings were too strongly enlisted, in any way, as to interfere with a proper discharge of his duty, and that information to that effect should have been given to the Executive; does the gentleman want that information? [Mr. POINDEXTER, (in an under tone:) Yes, I want that.] Did gentleman want to degrade the officer, Mr. G. asked, or to ask from the Executive information which it would be improper for him to disclose? If the gentleman wanted to know what had been done by the Executive, to that Mr. G. had no objection; but, when he wanted copies of all communications that had passed, such a disclosure might produce great mischief, and could do no good.

One branch of that resolution Mr. G. himself wished to see answered. If any thing had been meditated against the authorities of the State of South Carolina, he wished to know it all; for, if any thing of that sort was to appear, Mr. G. would think with the gentleman from Mississippi, that the President of the United States had transgressed his duty, and, much as the Executive possessed his confidence, he would not stand in the way of his being made amenable therefor to the American people. I think, however, said Mr. G., that we had better forbear all remarks such as those about punishing under the second section, &c. until we have some facts to ground them upon. I have seen no attempt or disposition on the part of the President of the United States to proceed lawlessly in reference to this matter. Does the tone of his communications to us savor any thing of action under the second section? Has any lawless or unconstitutional temper been manifested here? I am very glad the gentleman has introduced his resolution, sir; if he had the power to withdraw it, I would myself renew it.

Mr. POINDEXTER rose to explain. He had not said that the President had exercised any unconstitutional power. He had said, suppose that such and such orders were given, that it would create a very different sensation in this body, and throughout the United States, if these facts were made known; and the attempt to conceal facts, whatever they were, left him at liberty to infer whatever he pleased from it.

Mr. GRUNDY said that there was no wish existing anywhere to conceal any movement of this Government, beyond the wish to prevent conflicts which might arise among citizens of South Carolina from improper disclosures. We know the unfortunate state of excitement which exists in that quarter, and we do not wish such disclosures to be required as might make them rush into instant battle one with another. Such might be the consequence of calling for all papers on the subject from the Executive. These papers, therefore, he thought ought not to be made public. As to the allusion which the gentleman had made to the drawing-room, Mr. G. said he did not pretend to understand what he meant by it.

Mr. CALHOUN said there was not one word in this resolution which ought to provoke opposition; and he was very much surprised that, when a Senator rises in his place to ask for the information required by the resolution, with a view to understand what orders have been issued, and whether these orders have been predicated upon any information exclusively obtained by the Executive in reference to the state of things in South Carolina, it should be resisted. He was at a loss to imagine the motive for desiring any concealment. Was he (Mr. C.) to understand that the President of the United States had been corresponding with any party in South Carolina, that he had been receiving anonymous communications, and that he has been acting on such anonymous information? What men would take information of this character in the present excited state of the country, from a party in the State, in order to ground thereon proceedings against South Carolina? What Chief Magistrate would correspond with a party under such circumstances? He could not imagine a state of things so unprecedented. If the fact be as the Senator supposed; if it was necessary to screen any body for acting improperly, let the responsibility (said Mr. C.) rest on the President of the United States. He may communicate what he thinks proper. He wished to let the whole rest on the responsibility of the President. The whole course of the opposition to the resolution was most extraordinary, and calculated to produce excitement in South Carolina. Was he to understand that the President of the United States has been secretly corresponding with that party which stood in opposition to the majority in that State, and that he was proceeding to act under the representations thus obtained, instead of adopting that plain and open course of action which would become the highest Executive officer? The sensation which would be produced by the imperfect information which would be obtained by the resolution in its amended form, would be far greater than any which would arise out of the publication of the entire facts.

The hour of 12 striking at this moment—

The CHAIR arrested the discussion, and stated that, according to the resolution, directing that the special order shall be called at 12 o'clock till the end of the session, he considered it to be his imperative duty to announce it at that hour; and he desired to have the sense of the Senate to the contrary, if, in its opinion, his construction that the arrival of the hour cut off all business which was pending was not the correct one.

Mr. KING expressed his belief that the practice of the Senate under this resolution should be the same as it was when one o'clock stood as the hour for taking up the special order. It had been the practice to take up the special order after any morning business under consideration should have been discussed, if even it somewhat overstepped the hour.

FEB. 8, 1833.]

Revenue Collection Bill.

[SENATE.]

Mr. CALHOUN intimated that the practice was to take up the special order after the disposition had been made of any pending business, and that it had not been the practice for the CHAIR to call it in the midst of a discussion.

Mr. SMITH considered that the resolution made it imperative on the CHAIR to call the special order at the hour specified.

Mr. FOOT expressed a similar opinion; and reminded the Senate that he had objected to the resolution previous to its adoption, on the ground that it would prevent the third reading of any bill which might be before the Senate during the rest of the session. As the resolution had been adopted, it was the duty of the CHAIR to call the order at the hour.

Mr. GRUNDY wished to know whether he was to suspend his reply to the Senator from South Carolina until to-morrow? He wished the point of order to be settled, that they might go to work about something.

Mr. KING sustained the view taken by the Senator from Connecticut, as to the obstruction which the resolution would, as construed by the CHAIR, throw in the way of public business.

Mr. WILKINS said, that if he might be allowed to put his own construction on his own language, when he draughted this resolution, he intended it to be imperative.

Mr. POINDEXTER said, the response to the resolution, now under debate, was of great importance to the progress and end of the bill under discussion. If it was to be sent at all to the President, it ought to be sent immediately. He wished to allow the Senate an opportunity to take the vote upon it, and he would therefore move, for the present—for he did not wish to trespass too long on this favorite special order—to lay the special order on the table.

Mr. BROWN said he should vote in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The CHAIR said it was not in order to debate a motion to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER withdrew his motion.

Mr. BROWN then said, that he was against the postponement of this discussion. So long as it should be before the Senate, the existing excitement would be kept up throughout the country. He did not believe that there was any necessity, in discussing the bill, for the information which the resolution proposed to call for. He did not perceive that it would at all aid the Senate in the discussion of the bill before the Senate. Whenever a vote should, therefore, be taken on the resolution, he should give his vote against it. He deemed it to be the duty of the Senate to pour oil on the agitated billows, and not to excite them to more dangerous and tumultuous action.

Mr. POINDEXTER then renewed his motion to lay the special order on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and

The question being taken, was decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bibb, Brown, Calhoun, Chambers, Clayton, Forsyth, King, Miller, Moore, Poindexter, Tyler—11.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Black, Buckner, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Holmes, Kane, Knight, Naudain, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Webster, White, Wilkins, Wright—29.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

The Senate then proceeded again to the special order of the day, being the bill making further provision for the collection of the revenue.

Mr. WEBSTER said he wished to interrupt the course of the debate for a single moment, in order to set one matter right, if he could. Since a warm controversy was rising on this measure, he thought it but proper that we should understand between what parties the controversy existed.

Soon after the declaration of war by the United States against England, an American vessel fell in at sea with one of England, and gave information of the declaration. The English master inquired, with no little warmth of manner and expression, why the United States had gone to war with England? The American answered him, that difficulties had existed, for a good while, between the two Governments, and that it was at length thought, in America, to be high time for the parties to come to a better understanding.

I incline to think, Mr. President, that a war has broken out here which is very likely, before it closes, to bring the parties to a better understanding. But who are the parties? Will you please to remember, sir, that this is a measure founded in Executive recommendation? The President, charged by the constitution with the duty of executing the laws, has sent us a message, alleging that powerful combinations are forming to resist their execution; that the existing laws are not sufficient to meet the crisis; and recommending sundry enactments as necessary for the occasion. The message being referred to the Judiciary Committee, that committee has reported a bill in compliance with the President's recommendation. It has not gone beyond the message. Every thing in the bill, every single provision, which is now complained of, is in the message. Yet the whole war is raised against the bill, and against the committee, as if the committee had originated the whole matter. Gentlemen get up and address us, as if they were arguing against some measure of a factious opposition. They look the same way, sir, and speak with the same vehemence, as they used to do when they raised their patriotic voices against what they called a "coalition."

Now, sir, let it be known, once for all, that this is an administration measure; that it is the President's own measure; and I pray gentlemen to have the goodness, if they call it hard names, and talk loudly against its friends, not to overlook its source. Let them attack it, if they choose to attack it, in its origin.

Let it be known, also, that a majority of the committee reporting the bill are friends and supporters of the administration; and that it is maintained in this House by those who are among his steadfast friends, of long standing.

It is, sir, as I have already said, the President's own measure. Let those who oppose it, oppose it as such. Let them fairly acknowledge its origin, and meet it accordingly.

The honorable member from Kentucky, who spoke first against the bill, said he found in it another Jersey prison ship; let him state, then, that the President has sent a message to Congress, recommending a renewal of the sufferings and horrors of the Jersey prison ship. He says, too, that the bill snuffs of the alien and sedition law. But the bill is fragrant of no flower except the same which perfumes the message. Let him, then, say, if he thinks so, that General Jackson advises a revival of the principles of the alien and sedition laws.

The honorable member from Virginia [Mr. TYLER] finds out a resemblance between this bill and the Boston port bill. Sir, if one of these be imitated from the other, the imitation is the President's. The bill makes the President, he says, sole judge of the constitution. Does he mean to say that the President has recommended a measure which is to make him sole judge of the constitution? The bill, he declares, sacrifices every thing to arbitrary power—he will lend no aid to its passage—he would rather "be a dog, and bay the moon, than such a Roman." He did not say "the old Roman." Yet the gentleman well knows, that if any thing is sacrificed to arbitrary power er, the sacrifice had been demanded by the "old Roman," as he and others have called him; by the President whom he has supported, so often and so ably, for the Chief Magistracy of the country. He says, too, that one of the sections is an English Botany Bay law, except that it is much worse. This section, sir, whatever it may be, is just what the President's message recommended. Similar observations are applicable to the remarks of both the honorable gentlemen from North Carolina. It is not necessary to particularize those remarks. They were in the same strain.

Therefore, sir, let it be understood, let it be known, that the war which these gentlemen choose to wage, is waged against the measures of the administration, against the President of their own choice. The controversy has arisen between him and them, and, in its progress, they will probably come to a distinct understanding.

Mr. President, I am not to be understood as admitting that these charges against the bill are just, or that they would be just if made against the message. On the contrary, I think them wholly unjust. No one of them, in my opinion, can be made good. I think the bill, or some similar measure, had become indispensable, and that the President could not do otherwise than to recommend it to the consideration of Congress. He was not at liberty to look on and be silent, while dangers threatened the Union, which existing laws were not competent, in his judgment, to avert.

Mr. President, I take this occasion to say, that I support this measure, as an independent member of the Senate, in the discharge of the dictates of my own conscience. I am no man's leader; and, on the other hand, I follow no lead, but that of public duty, and the star of the constitution. I believe the country is in considerable danger; I believe an unlawful combination threatens the integrity of the Union. I believe the crisis calls for a mild, temperate, forbearing, but inflexibly firm execution of the laws. And, under this conviction, I give a hearty support to the administration, in all measures which I deem to be fair, just, and necessary. And in supporting these measures, I mean to take my fair share of responsibility, to support them frankly and fairly, with out reflections on the past, and without mixing other topics in their discussion.

Mr. President, I think I understand the sentiment of the country on this subject. I think public opinion sets with an irresistible force in favor of the Union, in favor of the measures recommended by the President, and against the new doctrines which threaten the dissolution of the Union. I think the people of the United States demand of us, who are intrusted with the Government, to maintain that Government; to be just, and fear not; to make all and suitable provisions for the execution of the laws, and to sustain the Union and the constitution against whatsoever may endanger them. For one, I obey this public voice; I comply with this demand of the people. I support the administration in measures which I believe to be necessary; and, while pursuing this course, I look unhesitatingly, and with the utmost confidence, for the approbation of the country.

Mr. TYLER then rose. He had never inquired, he said, from what quarter the bill came. It had never entered into his conception that it was a matter of the smallest consequence. It had never been his habit to look to the source rather than to the principles of a measure upon which he was called on to decide. He did not oppose this measure because it was supported by the gentleman from Massachusetts; and would the gentleman believe in his sincerity, when he declared that he would give his support to any measure proceeding from the Senator from Massachusetts, which he himself approved, as promptly and as heartily as if it proceeded from the very highest officer of the Government. This was not the first time that he had been placed in opposition to measures of which the President was the source, or of which the President approved. It had been his fortune here to be more than once opposed to some Executive measures. He did not find fault with this bill, because the Senator from Massachusetts and his friends approved of it; for if the bill had his own approbation, he would support it, even if the President was opposed to it. But he was obliged to the gentleman from Massachusetts for the suggestion of the real source of the measure. He was now led to understand that it came from the President. [Mr. WEBSTER: Not so. The bill was from the committee; but no one can read the bill and the message without saying that the bill is founded on the message.] Mr. TYLER: Then the President did not prescribe the forms of the bill. But, if the President has sent us a Botany Bay bill, he (Mr. T.) would call it so, and as such oppose it.

Mr. WEBSTER would merely remark, that the committee to which he belonged were in the habit of drawing their own bills. The facts were, that the President, in the discharge of his official duties, had recommended certain measures to meet certain events; in his annual message he had suggested that he might have occasion to take this course; in his late message, he had recommended specific provisions for specific cases; and the Committee on the Judiciary had framed a bill in accordance with those provisions.

Mr. BIBB could not, he said, help being surprised at the remarks which had fallen from his honorable friend, the Senator from Massachusetts. He would like to know what part of his official conduct had given that gentleman reason to suppose that, in respect to all measures before this body, he did not act upon his own responsibility and judgment? What reason had the gentleman to suppose that he was the humble and subservient tool of any man, and constrained to vote this or that way? He threw back the imputation. He threw it not on any Senator, but he threw it back indignantly from himself. Have we come to this, that an independent sentiment cannot be expressed on this floor, on the individual and official responsibility of a Senator, without his being taunted with the suggestion that his opinions are in opposition to an Executive message? If the gentleman had no means of knowing the source of the measure, but from a comparison of the message with the bill, then his opinion is a matter of inference only. When he says that the bill is a response to the message, he means to say that in the judgment of the committee it was thus responsive, or that the committee intended to render it responsive. If that was the sense in which the Senator from Massachusetts says it is responsive, he would take it as a matter of inference, founded on the similarity between the bill and the message. He wanted to know whether there was any hidden light in regard to this matter; whether there was any secret connexion between the bill and the message?

He put it to the honorable gentleman to say—and he should pause for a reply—whether there was any link or communication between the bill and the message, other than that which was apparent? He denied that, according to his notion, the bill was in accordance with the message. If the President desired that any such power should be given to him as this bill gives, he would find no expression of that desire in the message. He could not imagine that any President would have the daring effrontery to ask of Congress to give him such powers. Therefore, he would take it for granted that it was a matter of inference merely. The bill responds to the message, in so far as it affords aid to civil process; but in so far as, by its first and fifth sections, it confides to the Chief Magistrate an inordinate discretionary power, it was not, in his mind, a fair inference that the bill was a response to the message, and that the President sought to be clothed with the powers with which the bill invested him. Torrents of invective and reproach had sometimes been turned against those who dared to raise their voices or give their votes in opposition to measures of the administration. For his own part, he had nothing to hope nor to expect from the administration. He sought nothing from it. Therefore, whether he withheld or gave the powers asked by it, was a question between him and his constituents; and, in a great struggle for civil liberty, he considered himself an atom.

Mr. WEBSTER said, it was unnecessary for the gentleman from Kentucky to throw back any imputation, for none had been cast. He had said nothing about subversivency to the Executive. In regard to the interrogatory of the gentleman—which he was not certain that he understood—he would briefly reply, that the message having, in usual course, been referred to a standing committee of this body, the committee sat down and drew a bill, in conformity with the provisions recommended in the message, as far as they could. He would tell the gentleman, that there was nothing in the 1st and 5th sections of the bill, which in the message is not recommended; and if the gentleman would recur to the message, he would find the suggestion of those provisions. Further, he would tell the gentleman, that the President has had the “daring effrontery” to ask for these powers, no matter how high may be the offence.

Mr. BROWN remarked, that, as some gentlemen had risen to make a confession of their sins, in reply to the accusation from the Senator from Massachusetts, he hoped he also might be allowed to say a word as to his own course. He had never looked to any quarter for instructions in regard to his vote on this bill, neither to the President nor the Judiciary Committee. The gentleman assures us that “the bill is fragrant with no flowers which do not also perfume the President’s message.” But he had considered that the gentleman himself had the chief hand in giving to the bill those fragrant flowers with the sweets of which it was redolent. Like a prudent commander, the gentleman, he thought, had entrenched himself behind strong defences—behind an Executive recommendation. If, sir, said Mr. B., we have used hard names, we have had an able preceptor, in their use, for the last three years. Our intellects must be very obtuse, if in that time we could not have learned something from the gentleman’s example. But, for my own part, I want capacity for the art. I cannot use opprobrious language in respect to the President, for I do not believe that he deserves it. I have stood by him when he vindicated and maintained the constitution of the country, in opposition to the efforts and the reproaches of the gentleman from Massachusetts. If, on one occasion, I have differed from him in opinion, it is not to be a matter of accusation against me; and certainly I am not to be told of it from this quarter.

Mr. WEBSTER had remarked, he said, that the gentleman had given hard names to the bill, not to the President; and he still thought they would have shown a more gallant bearing in directing their attack against the source from which the bill came.

Mr. BIBB made a remark in explanation. If the gentleman from Massachusetts supposed that he threw back on him the imputation of subversivency, he was mistaken. He had expressly disclaimed that purpose in his remarks.

Mr. HOLMES rose and said a word or two, which, from the noise in the gallery, the reporter could not distinctly hear. He understood him, however, to refer to the professions and confessions which had been made by some honorable gentlemen, in the debate, and to say, jestingly, that, after all, there was but one member of the Senate whose course had been entirely consistent throughout, and that member was his own dear self.

Mr. WILKINS said he would avail himself of this opportunity to present the amendments to the bill which the committee proposed. But, at the suggestion that the discussion would be continued, he gave way.

[Mr. MANUM was entitled to the floor, but being detained from the Senate by indisposition, Mr. DALLAS rose.]

Mr. DALLAS said, that he found himself unexpectedly in possession of the floor, in consequence of the indisposition of the Senator whom we would all have heard with pleasure, and the cause of whose inability to proceed was a matter of general regret. He felt himself taken by surprise, and should labor under some disadvantage in addressing the Senate at this time. His own condition of bodily health was somewhat similar to that of the gentleman from North Carolina; but he trusted that, as he proceeded, he should gather strength from the cause which he advocated. Representing a large, respectable, but unassuming State, whose overwhelming democracy had for years sustained the administration of the Government now existing, he had a plain and easy road to travel. He was impelled by the unanimous voice of his constituents, which, notwithstanding the opinion of the Senator from Virginia, was, he assured him, well considered, and in perfect conformity with the past practice and present principles of that State. The Senator was mistaken in the supposition, that the votes in the Legislature of Pennsylvania indicated any change of opinion, on their part, in relation to the protective policy of the country. Their opinions, on that subject, were just as unanimous as ever. But they valued the harmony of the Union; and to preserve that, republican Pennsylvania would change, alter, and, if necessary, abolish the protective system. The votes alluded to by the Senator from Virginia were accompanied with a declaration that they were given for the purpose of leaving the representatives of Pennsylvania free to take such measures as would preserve the harmony of the Union. But the bill before us was peculiarly adapted to the principles of Pennsylvania.

The measure was recommended by the President in a message to Congress, which was referred to a standing committee of the House. That committee had reported this bill. It was an administration measure. Honorable gentlemen might be assured that, whatever language was applied to the bill, there were those who would not flinch from its responsibility. As a political man, he would say, that the President, in recommending this measure, would attach to himself, more strongly than ever, he would not say all the people of the country, or all the members of any political party, but the entire democracy of Pennsylvania. That democracy, with its fifty thousand majority, was ready to assume the responsibility of this act. However heavy might be the responsibility thrown on this measure, he would undertake to say, that his State was ready to assume its full share. He felt very anxious to treat this question as one of a grave and very important nature; and he proposed, with a view to the accomplishment of his task, with as little labor to himself, and tediousness to the Senate as was possible, to inquire, in the first place, what causes had led to this measure; second, whether we had the constitutional power to exact it; and, third, what were its probable tendency and effect. Many remarks had been made in the discussion, to which he should pay no attention; not from want of respect to those from whom they had fallen, but from want of comprehension to see their application to the subject.

What were the causes which led to the bill? It was undoubtedly drawn from analogous practice, but it was out of the ordinary course of legislation. The cause would be found in the proceedings of a popular convention held in South Carolina, and the legislative and executive acts following them. He was at all times prepared to treat the movements of a sovereign member of the Union with respect. They were not to be viewed as the factious proceedings of a political party. There was not the attitude of a changeling. The proceedings to which he referred resulted from the deliberate, and, he might say, the inflexible purpose of a highly respectable, although, in his apprehension, misguided State. He might be mistaken in representing the attitude of the State. He referred to the appearances every where existing in the State. This attitude might possibly be very soon changed, and, in that case, our proposed legislation in regard to it must be changed.

Sir, said Mr. D., I say this is a possibility, but I do not say that it is a probability. There might be gentlemen at the head of this South Carolina excitement, whose influence and standing in political power might be such as to enable them to assume the attitude of Louis XIV., and to say, "We are the State." Or there might be some individuals, who, imitating the tone of Napoleon Bonaparte, might say, "I am for South Carolina;" whose very breath might retard the operation of this ordinance, proclamation, and laws, and these military arrangements; or whose very breath might impel those movements, as matters might be. It was not, however, a very likely supposition. We must, said Mr. D., look at the deportment of South Carolina as it is exhibited in these documents, and view it according to the spirit and letter of the ordinance, legislative enactments, and the military and executive arrangements of the State. Well, sir, following out the inquiry still further, I would ask, what is the cause for this legislative measure now before the Senate of the United States? I would ask, what we are to deduce from the legislative movements in South Carolina? In the first place, sir, there is an effort, on the part of that single State, to incorporate into the constitution of the United States two heretofore unknown, unacknowledged, and unexpressed principles—I mean nullification and secession. In the second place, viewing these documents in the manner I have stated, I consider that they involve an abrogation, positive and universal, of the revenue laws of the United States; not within the State of South Carolina merely, but, as I think I can show, throughout the whole of the United States. And lastly, sir, we deduce from these documents an application of the judicial and physical force—the judicial and physical force—of the powers, sentences, judgments, decrees, condemnations, confiscations, compulsory oaths, summary convictions, dungeons, and halters, to prevent the execution of the laws of the United States by the officers of the United States.

In relation, Mr. President, to nullification and secession, the question is, have we the constitutional power to pass this bill? In reference to the abrogation of the revenue laws by the State of South Carolina, I say that, as a matter of equal constitutional justice, the abrogation of those laws, according to the ordinance of South Carolina, abrogates them throughout the whole country. I say it is the necessary consequence of annulling them in that State. We are bound by our oaths, as Senators of the United States, not to acquiesce in or sanction such proceedings. We have no right to give a preference to the ports of one State over the ports of another. Sir, I put it to the honorable Senators present, whether a tacit acquiescence on the part of this body ought to be given to a regulation in South Carolina, which establishes free trade in the port of Charleston, thereby giving it a preference over any port in the United States. Would not a tacit acquiescence be a violation of our oaths as Senators? Let us look to the principle of morality as connected with this subject. There are sins of omission as well as sins of commission. He who is not prepared to do his duty, or refrains from it from a fear of consequences, acts in violation of it. No single State, no several States of this Union, can be expected to furnish all the revenue which the Government requires—the entire consumption of the country upon which the taxes are laid; these imposts should be borne equally by the entire mass of the American people.

Sir, I protest that, wealthy as the people of the State of Pennsylvania may be, pouring at all times their countless thousands into the public treasury—I protest against the Congress of the United States requiring one cent from the population of that State which is not fully required from others. If you do make it a matter of equal legislation, though we would cheerfully contribute millions to the general treasury in common with the other States, yet, show preference, in the slightest degree, to any portion of the Union, and, as a member of that great commonwealth, I would protest against it. Charleston cannot be a free port, compatibly with the constitution of the United States. The instant that the legislation of this Congress shall proclaim it to be so, I shall likewise declare Philadelphia a free port. New York also, as well as every other port in the United States, will have a just right to be declared free. Sir, this effect is as unavoidable in practice, as it is sound in constitutional theory.

If the position now taken by South Carolina, in reference to Charleston, be sustained by the connivance of this body, your revenue is lost; not a part of the revenue, but the whole of your revenue, is gone; all that is collected by the Government of the United States by virtue of the acts which are nullified in South Carolina. How is it? I speak practically. If it be for one moment entertained that the duties collected under these laws are to be enforced in every port but the port of Charleston, and the other ports of South Carolina, will not the mercantile community throughout the whole of this country make these ports the great marts of distribution, through the coasting trade, to all the other States of the Union? As a matter of prudence, as a matter of necessity, they must do it, or they could not sustain themselves. They must direct their foreign correspondents to consign their cargoes to the port of Charleston, and other ports in South Carolina; and their ships would be employed in the whole coasting trade of the United States, to distribute their cargoes free of all duties, and exonerated from all tax throughout all the ports of the country. No merchant in Pennsylvania could bear up against such a system, and therefore must become bankrupt. He could not consent to pay the duty which is now properly levied on these goods, while, in a neighboring State, the goods came in free of charge. As a matter of necessity, as well as of sound constitutional duty, if a free port were connived at in the State of South Carolina, you must make every port free. Your Government will then be without revenue; that will be the necessary consequence. I believe, sir, that that is a Utopian creature the world has never seen or heard of. We cannot exist without a revenue; we must have it for all the great purposes of the body politic. The extinguishment of the revenue is the necessary consequence of adopting this doctrine, and is, in itself, a superabundant, a strong, if not an imperative call on those who are managing the concerns of the American people, to prevent such a contingency.

If the legislation which provides our revenue be counteracted, we must, said Mr. D., (I speak it with all the strength of language of which I am master,) we must—morally must, enforce the laws. But the abrogation of the revenue laws, and the necessary consequence of that abrogation in drying up all the sources of revenue, is not alone the cause on which the present measure is recommended to the consideration of Congress. Look at the elaborated details by which this fit end is to be accomplished; I mean those contained in the ordinance and laws, and the military arrangements which have been communicated by the Executive. Look at these, which I say, and will prove, strike conclusively, directly, and, totidem verbis, at some of the most important provisions of the constitution.

They expel the judicial power of the United States out of the limits of the State of South Carolina; or, what is tan-amount, pursue a course by which those laws are made imperative, and inapplicable as far as regards the citizens of South Carolina. I will go still farther. They break in with a strong hand on the sanctity of personal rights, on the privilege of personal freedom, and on the liberty of conscience. Having duly weighed the phrases, I will show that they inflict disfranchisement, degradation, exile, or vassalage, indiscriminately, on all who dare to perform their duty as citizens of the United States, by enforcing and sustaining the laws.

He had heard often on this floor, and elsewhere, of that which had been characterized a despotic majority, and of systems of oppression resulting from the tyranny of members. But, in this country, he had never known an exhibition, except that which he now witnessed, and which he hoped the virtue of the people of South Carolina would remove, where the fundamental principles of life, liberty, and law, were absolutely abrogated. He had said that there were positive, direct violations of the constitution, involved in the measures of South Carolina. Yet it was alleged, on the face of those measures, that they were perfectly conformable to the constitution. If nullification be perfectly conformable to the constitution, we shall see that hereafter. If secession be conformable to the constitution, we shall see that hereafter. But even supposing these doctrines were in conformity with the constitution, still would they find no favor, if, in their progress, they trample on those rights which are recognised in the letter of the constitution. We know that there is an express provision in the constitution, that no State shall pass any law, fundamental or otherwise (and this ordinance of South Carolina is called by the head of the military power of that State, a fundamental law) impairing the obligation of contracts. What says the ordinance of South Carolina? That all contracts which are now existing, or which may hereafter exist, for the purpose of carrying into effect the law providing for the collection of the duties on imports, shall be null and void, now and forever. Is that a violation of the constitution, or not? If this ordinance had confined itself to such contracts as might hereafter be formed, and had simply pronounced the law on which they might be based null and void, that would have been one thing. There might have been an argument founded on that subject. But it was not so; the ordinance declares that all contracts which have been or may be entered into, shall be considered null and void. Did that comport with the provisions of the constitution to which he had referred? He had a dislike to all refinements on the constitution. He belonged to that admirable class of politicians who adhered to the plain meaning of its phraseology; and when the constitution declared that no State should pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, what could be said of a law of the State of South Carolina declaring existing contracts to be null and void? If the framers of the law relied upon the end to justify the means, they would find their reliance a bad one; for no end which was contemplated by them would justify such means.

But that which to him constituted another plain violation of the constitution, was accompanied by a direct encroachment on the sanctity of private rights, the sanctity of private property, and the sanctity of the courts of justice. We have a provision in the constitution which declares that every individual accused of crime "shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed." What was the meaning of this provision? That every individual juror shall be charged on his oath conscientiously to determine between the people and the party. It was a sound, settled, and unalienable right, which every individual so accused possessed, to have an impartial jury to try him. I ask (said Mr. D.) that there shall be an impartial jury in all criminal cases, let the matter of accusation be what it may; and they who would deprive an individual so accused of this right, would go far towards the establishment of arbitrary rule. Give me the trial by jury in all its fairness, purity, and sanctity. We know, that in the formation of the constitution, the trial by jury was regarded as a subject deserving the most serious consideration of our greatest statesmen. It had always been considered as one of the most sacred order of privileges. Now what says the ordinance of South Carolina? That the accused shall not have it. It provides that the jury shall be sworn in advance. To do what? To hear and decide according to the evidence? No. To do impartial justice between the people and the accused? No. They were to be sworn in advance to convict the prisoner at the bar.

Am I right in this? Am I correct in that view of the question? An officer of the United States, executing the laws, renders himself amenable to the criminal law of South Carolina under this ordinance. He is taken before one of the State courts, where he is indicted for the offence. He gives the court and the prosecuting counsel to understand that he stands there as a citizen of the United States, and, as such, he claims, as a privilege given to him by the constitution and the principles of eternal and immutable justice, to challenge the constitutionality of the law. Can he do so? No. The ordinance is despotic. The jurymen are sworn, under that ordinance, and in the presence of the prisoner, to convict him.

In the course of my entire experience as a criminal counsel, (said Mr. D.) and I have practised at the bar from early youth, I have never known any right so constantly appealed to in criminal cases as the constitutionality of the law. Yet this ordinance says, you shall not have this right in South Carolina.

Here is involved a direct violation of the constitution. There were other parts of the constitution which were either in their spirit or their terms directly violated. This ordinance violated almost every contract or compact involved in that constitution. That instrument is full of mutual contracts between the States. Almost every provision implies, if it does not express, the compliance on the parts of the States with some contract. This ordinance withdraws them from the performance of these obligations. He would refer to one. The whole of these free, sovereign, and independent States had incorporated into their constitution a provision, from which no one can fly, to guaranty to every State a republican form of Government. That provision is openly violated by this ordinance. What does the provision import? Look at it with the eye of common sense, and not through the medium of refinement; with the eye of those who framed the constitution, and of the people who ratified its provisions. "We, the people, agree to guaranty to the whole of this confederacy, and to all the States, a republican form of Government." The Senate would see that if the ordinance of South Carolina were to prevail, this provision would be defeated, and rendered a mere nullity. Can we (said Mr. D.) guaranty a republican form of Government to a State which disclaims our right to do so, which puts herself upon her sovereignty, and sets up for herself? If she does this, the constitution is worse than a farce. If South Carolina should desire to establish a monarchy, if a majority of the people of the States should so decide, and secede, we might the very next day see a dictator there instead of a republican form of Government. Thus, it would be shown that we had guarantied a form of Government, which any State in the Union would have the power to abolish and abandon. In carrying out the ordinance of South Carolina, intended to nullify the revenue laws alone, the Legislature of the State had practically nullified an immense body of laws; and this mode of obtaining their object had been agreed to be constitutional and right.

They had nullified that important provision which secures the right of trial by an impartial jury.

Revenue Collection Bill.

[FEB. 8, 1833.]

Mr. MILLER desired to be informed if the gentleman meant to say that provision in the constitution was applicable to the State courts, as well as to the United States courts?

Mr. DALLAS said that he pressed the argument in the first place, not merely on the constitution of the United States, but on the principles of eternal and immutable justice.

[Mr. MILLER: That is another thing.]

But he (Mr. D.) would show, also, that the constitutional clause was directly applicable to this point. The criminal jurisdiction of the State courts was extended to officers of the United States engaged in the execution of the laws. An act performed in the exercise of his duty by an officer of the army or navy, renders him amenable to the State tribunals, and he is punishable by them. The ordinance says, in effect, although you may be a military, or naval, or civil officer of the United States, and engaged in the performance of your official duties, we will drag you into the State courts, and, when there, we will preclude your appealing to the constitution and laws under which you acted, and we will try you by a jury sworn to convict you, out and out. That provision of the constitution, therefore, was entirely applicable to this case. If there was any heart and head on which the injustice of this course was indelibly engraved, he was sure it was on the heart and head of the gentleman from South Carolina.

He was going on to say, that the State of South Carolina, in nullifying the revenue laws, had nullified also an immense body of other laws. She had annulled the provisions of the judiciary act, prescribing the mode of appealing from the State tribunals to the federal courts, in all cases of law and equity arising under the constitution and laws of the United States.

But he would go farther. Not by the ordinance of South Carolina, but by the military arrangements of the Executive of the State, was that provision of the constitution which takes away from a State the power "to keep troops" signally violated. I take (said Mr. D.) these documents to mean fairly and candidly what they express. I take their meaning in their fair and candid spirit. They who framed the ordinance and laws are entitled to this construction. They mean what they speak, and perhaps something more than they speak. And when we see the Executive of the State keeping troops in Charleston, it is obvious that this provision of the constitution is violated.

Again: These laws of the State of South Carolina contain principles which are subversive of those of the United States. Not only is the supremacy of our laws whistled to the wind, but the paramount character of our national allegiance is denied and overthrown.

It had been asserted that the allegiance of the citizen is due only to the State to which he belongs. The principle which claims this allegiance for the United States was to be found interwoven in many of our laws. Congress is authorized to establish rules of naturalization—for what? Why, to convert an alien—a foreigner—into a citizen of the United States; to give to an Irishman, an Englishman, a Frenchman, or any other foreigner, the privileges of a native. How had Congress carried out this principle of naturalization? In reference to this established rule, (said Mr. D.) there is no test, no standard, which applied to native citizens. The individual who is born in Charleston, unless he quits the ranks of private life, and takes a public office, is never subjected to the obligation of an oath. But it is not so with the foreigner. We put a test to his lips the moment he desires to enter the sanctuary of our citizenship. What is it? He abjures all allegiance to a foreign sovereign—to the King of England, the King of France, or whoever it may be, and swears, not to support the constitution of any particular State, but the constitution of the United States. This, time out of mind, has been acted on as a constitutional law. He would ask the gentleman from North Carolina, whether, if the doctrine of paramount allegiance to a State should prevail, all the persons thus naturalized by the law of the United States would not be denaturalized and outcasts? There could be no doubt, therefore, that this principle was in violation of the constitution. These foreigners were sworn to support the constitution of the United States; but we were now told of an allegiance paramount in its character, and which they never heard of before, to which they were required to submit. This was not only an abrogation of the provision in the constitution which authorizes Congress to form rules of naturalization, but it was a violation of the personal rights of all those foreigners who had thrown themselves on the hospitality of our country. The constitution required no test but the oath of one who had arrived at full age, and who had come here of his own accord; when he wished to become a citizen, the oath was administered, and he was admitted to all the privileges and immunities of citizenship in every State. After taking that oath, he might go to any part of the United States wherever his disposition might lead him, for he had passed the Rubicon, and entered the temple of Liberty with us; and whether he became a resident of South Carolina, or any other State, he was entitled to the community of privileges.

I, (said Mr. D.) who have these rights, value as highly as any of her sons the citizenship of Pennsylvania. The privileges in that State were equal to those of any State. But he valued much more that privilege which, while it retained to him the reality of the citizenship of Pennsylvania, gave him also the title of citizen of twenty-three other equally respectable States. The title of citizen of the United States superadded loftiness and dignity of character to the other. It did not extinguish local pride and local affections; they ought to be cherished and preserved. But he did not consider that a common attachment to the other States diminished or interfered with those feelings.

Such were the extraordinary circumstances which constituted the cause of this bill being presented for the consideration of the Senate. Having reviewed these considerations, he could not help asking the Senators from South Carolina what was the actual condition of that State? What was her social and political condition? Those who were involved in the warmth of her local exasperations could not be aware of it. If they could withdraw their hearts and their minds for a moment from the sphere of that burning excitement, and view her condition with the eye of a stranger, they could not help deducing some inferences of a most lamentable character. What constitutes a republican form of Government? It was a broad question, and he would not pretend to answer it. But he might safely say that was not a republican Government where one man, or any combination of men, possessed lastingly, uncontrolled and unchecked, the entire powers of sovereignty. What is the definition of the Government now exercised in South Carolina? There is a constitutional Legislature in the State, but there is another power, not at this moment in actual session, which holds in its discretion all the right and the whole sovereignty of the people. This body was not restricted to any limits in action. Its power was indefinite, unbounded, and incalculable. It was not in session, but it appeared that the breath of a single man was sufficient to counteract or suspend their measures. Highly as he respected the people of South Carolina, possessing as they did all the rights inherent in a people, he could not but observe that their sovereign power was, in this instance, but an instrument in the hands of an individual, or a few individuals.

Every one knew what was the operation and meaning of a convention. A convention usually assembled for a special purpose. When they had completed the work for which they had convened, what followed? That which was done in the case of the constitution of the United States—the result was submitted to the people for their ratification. Was that done in South Carolina? The people had in contemplation nullification, not secession, and that peacefully. The ordinance of South Carolina provides for secession, and leads of necessity to force, and contemplates a conflict. Why had not that ordinance been submitted to the people for their ratification? The convention, whose duration may be prolonged at its own pleasure, holds the life of every man in South Carolina, his liberty, and his entire property, at its mercy. It was a standing revolutionary convention, untrammelled, in a republican country. These also were considerations which caused the present legislative measure to be submitted for adoption.

There was cause sufficient not only to justify, but to demand legislative interference. It was the action of a free and sovereign State, done with a settled and premeditated purpose. It jeopardizes the lives and property of citizens of the United States. There is a discretion vested, whether in a few or many no matter, which is hostile to all laws, to annul not one or two laws, but a whole volume of laws, which violates the constitution, endangers the rights of the States and the peace of the Union. And when this case is obviously, practically put to every man who looks the matter in the face, whatever the delusions of abstract theories, is it necessary to tell honorable Senators, who are bound to preserve the rights committed to their charge, that they should act; that they will be recreant to their oaths and their consciences, if they do not? It must be some reasoning stronger than any he had yet heard, some form of mind almost beyond the capacity of man, which could satisfy him that it was not necessary to legislate in this matter.

The second of the inquiries which he had set up as a sort of finger-post to guide him in his argument, was, Have we the constitutional power to enact this bill into a law? The Senator from South Carolina [MR. CALHOUN] had considered this to be the main question. It seems to me, said Mr. D., to be conceded by the argument of the gentleman from North Carolina, who is not now in his place, [MR. MANGUM,] that if we have the constitutional power to pass this bill, it is not merely expedient, but we are bound by our duty to do so. He would meet this question as fully as his limited powers would enable him. By this bill, continued Mr. D., we are asked to enforce the laws of the United States against a sovereign act of abrogation. This is the question precisely, as I understand it. We are asked to enforce the laws of the United States against an alleged sovereign act of abrogation. Can we do so? In my opinion, we can; and because we can, we must. I do not stop to inquire into the validity of the ordinance issued by South Carolina. As I understand the 11th and 12th articles of the constitution of that State, that ordinance is absolutely void. Irregularly precipitated, without having been submitted to prescribed forms, I believe it to be null. I have said, and do say, that they who made this ordinance, without relying on the purity of their own motives, ought to have sent it forth to receive the ratification of all the citizens. They had not done this. I feel some amazement that they did not adopt this mode of ascertaining the public will. After so essentially changing the course of justice, as to trammel the judges and jurors of the State, after embracing the feature of force, I think they should have sent their ordinance forth for the ratification of the citizens of the State. But let them settle that among themselves.

Have we the power to enact this bill? If the State authorities have the power to abrogate our laws, can they disclaim the constitution? If they can do one of those two things, they can do the other. I do not know that I should not prefer secession to nullification. Secession is manly, unmasked, open, and aboveboard; but nullification is secession in disguise, with a constitutional mask, partial in its pretensions, and covert in its operation. It is admitted that both put the State out of the Union; the one to the extent of its own rule, the other unqualifiedly. They are essentially dependent upon the same constitutional reasoning and principles; and what I have to say as to either will equally apply to both.

In discussing and determining a case of conflict between sovereignties, actual or alleged, we are necessarily driven to fundamental principles and researches. What, then, said Mr. D., is sovereignty? It is the power of self-government. Strictly speaking, a Government, in the ordinary acceptance of the word, is the mere agency or machinery through which the powers of society are exerted, and its rights enforced; sovereignty does not belong to it as an attribute. It may be considered representatively sovereign, but not otherwise. I agree, then, without hesitation, in this view of the subject, that the Government of the United States, (that is the Executive, Judicial, and Legislative branches, separately or conjointly,) are not sovereign. The people alone are the absolute owners and uncontrollable movers of such sovereignty as human beings can claim to exercise. It was unnecessary to remind us of this truth; although it seemed to be propounded as a forcible novelty. I hold it essential to the existence of republicanism, here or elsewhere. Had a startling been taught to repeat at my ear, every hour of my life, the phrase "the people are sovereign," I should not have known it better than I have always known it.

But exalted as is the attribute of sovereignty, like every thing else of which we can form any conception whatever, it is subject to the eternal and unchangeable rules of justice, of truth, and of good faith. Hence I say that sovereignty may curtail or surrender its own rights or powers, and to such extent cease, in fact, to be sovereign; and that it may be, nay, must be, bound to the perpetual observance of a pledge once voluntarily given, and involving in its continuance the happiness, interests, and existence of other sovereignties. Speaking in reference to mere physical liberty of action, sovereignty can do as it pleases; but the moral law is out of its reach; it cannot violate that, and be more justified than the humblest individual. He did not speak of cases of necessity. They are above all law, or rather are governed by a law of their own. They convert rebellion into revolution.

These views are as applicable to leagues, treaties, alliances, and mere confederations, as they are to national constitutional unions. The casuists of nullification strengthen their doctrine very little, if at all, by insisting that our Government is but a treaty or league between independent sovereigns. Who ever heard that such an obligation as that which results from a treaty or league could be rightfully cancelled or avoiled, by either party to it, at his pleasure? The parchment may be torn to tatters; the seal may be cut from the instrument; but the moral obligation outlives the violated scroll; it rises like the phoenix from the relics; it cannot be destroyed. The injured party may persuade, and ultimately demand its fulfilment; if refused, war may enforce it. Sovereignty, then, however transcendental, must conform to the inexorable and all-pervading laws of right and wrong; and this is the only limit I prescribe to that which the Senator from South Carolina [MR. CALHOUN] seems to regard as absolutely unbounded, uncontrollable, and irresponsible.

The great leading question here is, what relation does the sovereign State of South Carolina bear, under the constitution, to the twenty-three other States, or to their acknowledged representative and agent, the Government of the United States? This can be determined solely by the constitution itself. Does that expressly or impliedly recognise her right to dissolve at her pleasure the Union it perfects, or the laws which that Union may enact? If it do not, the controversy is at an end. Clearly it contains no express recognition of either asserted right, nullification or secession. But they are both said to be implied, in the nature of our good political organization, and to be among the reserved rights of State sovereignty.

Let us, said Mr. D., inquire into the nature of our political structure. What is this political being—the Union, commonly styled “the United States?” A consolidated multitude? Certainly not. A federation merely of totally distinct masses of people? Certainly not. It is something then of a complicated character, between these two, or combining them both. To be justly appreciated, it must be well understood, and not flimsily considered. Generalization and vague abstractions delude us, and necessarily lead to false conclusions. No one denies or doubts that the constitution was formed by the people of the United States; and no one denies or doubts that it acts directly upon the people. Its origin and action are therefore popular or national. But was it not formed by the people as distinct aggregates called States, in their sovereign capacities? Clearly it was. And is it not carried on, through some of its essential processes, by the separate States, as sovereigns? Clearly it is. Its origin and action are then federative. Thus it is both popular and federative; or, in other words, it is an entire National Government, of which both the Union and the distinctiveness of the sovereign States are fundamental and inherent qualities.

The frame of our Government would seem to have two aspects; and all disputations arise from the common propensity to insist that it has but one. The hardy champions of what is called consolidation, and the jealous guardians of State rights, adhere obstinately to their respective theories; keep at a stern and steady distance from each other; and, like parallel lines, never can approach or unite. They reminded him, said Mr. D., of the trite old tale of the two travelling knights, who, passing on different sides of a sculptured image in the road, began to debate about it; the one insisting that its color was white, and the other asserting it to be black; an humble friar whom they met, and to whom they submitted their controversy, adjudged the image to be both black and white, and proved it so, by making each of the knights examine the side which before had been seen by his opponent only. Let the constitution of our Government undergo a similar trial by the partisans of the respective opposing theories, and the result will be similar; they would ultimately agree that it is not wholly what either represents it to be, and yet that it possesses the properties which both ascribe to it.

I am apprehensive, said Mr. D., that historical references can throw but little light on the true nature of our constitution. It must be its own best expounder. It is written. Its features are strongly delineated and powerfully expressive. It was designed to last for ages; and was intended to be, in word and spirit, just as comprehensible and clear to the eleven new State sovereignties by which it has been embraced since 1787, and to countless future ones, as to the original thirteen. Historical narrative is often contradictory, often imperfect, and very rarely within the reach of that great mass by whom this instrument was meant to be understood. Upon the leading point, the popular or federative character of our political institutions, we might be fatally misled, according as our attention was more or less turned to the circumstances of four striking periods of our annals. He would advert to them for a moment; more in dread of the maxim “qui hæret in litera hæret in cortice,” than from a belief that any but the last could be usefully dwelt upon. These epochs were those of, 1st. The General Congress which met at Philadelphia on the 5th of September, 1774; 2d. The declaration of independence, of the 4th of July, 1776; 3d. The articles of confederation, of the 9th of July, 1778; and, 4th. The present constitution, of the 17th of September, 1787.

1. The composition of the Congress of 1774 was governed by no uniform principle. Its delegates, or deputies, or representatives, were appointed and assembled without reference to any basis either of federation or consolidation. It may, without any want of respect to the great spirits and patriots who constituted it, be described as a scrambling Congress; one raked together irregularly and confusedly from all parts of the country; whose constituents disregarded, or were ignorant of, the jealous refinements of distinct territorial sovereignty; and got together, and kept together, under the influence of a common sympathy, of common wrongs, and of common purposes. It was certainly an assemblage more national, or popular, in its apparent origin and influence, than federative. It was designated the Congress of the United Colonies, notwithstanding the looseness of its formation. Confidence supplied the place of preconceived system. I hold in my hand, said Mr. D., an analysis of the proceedings in each of the colonies, by which the members of this celebrated Congress were selected and empowered to consult and act for the common good. It may not be useless briefly to refer to it. The members who came from New Hampshire were chosen on the 21st of July, 1774, at a meeting of deputies of several towns. Those from Massachusetts Bay were appointed by the House of Representatives of that province in June, 1774. In August, 1774, the General Assembly of Rhode Island chose delegates, who were commissioned by the Governor. In Connecticut, the Colonial Committee of Correspondence appointed persons to consult and advise with the commissioners or committees of the several English colonies in America, in July, 1774. In New York, the members were elected by committees from the city and county, and from other districts. In New Jersey, deputies to represent the colony in Congress were appointed by committees convened in the several counties. The province of Pennsylvania was provided with a committee, to meet the committees or delegates from the other colonies, by the Assembly, on the 22d of July, 1774. In the three counties of Newcastle, Kent, and Sussex, in Delaware, delegates were appointed by the Assembly, on the 1st of August, 1774, to a general continental Congress, to determine on such measures as ought to be immediately and unitedly adopted by the colonies. In Maryland, a general meeting of delegates from different counties appointed deputies to attend a general Congress of deputies from the colonies, to effect one general plan of conduct. In Virginia, the same course was pursued as in Maryland. In South Carolina, deputies were nominated at a general meeting of the inhabitants of the colony, which the Commons House of Assembly confirmed. The meeting of these delegates, thus variously designated and authorized at Philadelphia, on the 5th of September, 1774, was by themselves, in one of their earliest and ablest documents, an address to the inhabitants of Quebec, delineated as “a bright and strong chain of union.”

Mr. D. begged pardon for entering into these detailed statements. They served to show, however, that union preceded independence. Independence, indeed, and the sovereignty wrested with it from the crown of Great Britain, were achievements of union, and were wholly unattainable without it. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. TILER] was historically inaccurate when he conceived independence to have been declared by any single State. North Carolina and Virginia spoke the word earliest; but only in resolutions recommendatory of its declaration by the general Congress for the United Colonies. It would have savored of folly or madness for any one of the colonies to have contemplated or attempted its detached independence. So far, indeed, were they from any thing of the sort, that an idea of subordinate dependence upon the Congress seems to have actuated Massachusetts, Virginia, Pennsylvania, and other colonies, when they in succession took instruction from that body as to the expediency and mode of establishing new local Governments.

2. On the declaration of independence, it could not be expected, said Mr. D., that he should say much. Its language was as familiar as household words. The manner in which it was referred to by General Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, a member of the South Carolina convention of 1788, was applicable to our inquiry, and would supersede the necessity of comment. Mr. D. here read from Elliot's State Convention Debates: "The separate independence and individual sovereignty of the several States were never thought of by the enlightened band of patriots who framed the declaration; the several States are not even mentioned by name in any part of it, as if it was intended to impress the maxim in America, that our freedom and independence arose from our union, and that without it we could be neither free nor independent; let us then consider all attempts to weaken this Union, by maintaining that each State is separately and individually independent, as a species of political heresy which can never benefit us, but may bring on us the most serious distresses."

Thus far, said Mr. D., history is, upon the main point, at the least equivocal. The next epoch, however, is peremptory and indisputable.

3. The articles of confederation of 1773 removed all probability of subsequent cavil. They were an agreed compact, whose second line began with the emphatic announcement that "each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence; and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not, by this confederation, expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled."

But I hasten, continued, Mr. D., to the only period of history really illustrative and binding upon the existing Government—that of the present constitution of the United States. And this must be viewed in respect to its formation, and in respect to its ratification. My own conviction always has been, after carefully examining the instructions and powers with which they were invested by their respective constituencies, that the members of the convention of 1787, wise, virtuous, and patriotic, as they undoubtedly were, transcended their authority. Their prescribed task was in truth, and simply, to amend the articles of confederation, in those parts especially which experience had proved to be defective and inefficient. They were not directed nor empowered to make a totally new system; to settle political and social relations upon altogether a new plan, and with new combinations; to relinquish the subsisting, and devise a substantially different form of Government. The American people intrusted them with no such extensive discretion; they intended to burden them with no such Herculean labor. Such was the opinion of many of the members of that convention who struggled hard and long to enforce it, and to maintain, in its purity, unimpaired, the mere federative character of our institutions. Robert Yates and John Lansing, of New York, with Luther Martin, of Maryland, were conspicuous among these. They have left an interesting and authentic record of the progress of principle and result in the convention. The constitution, as now formed, was resisted by these gentlemen, and their associates, on the ground of its being a structure unauthorized by the people or the States, and as establishing a united National Government. It is a mistake to think otherwise. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. TYLER] must permit me to say again, that he is inaccurate in representing the constitution to have been finally accommodated to the sentiments of those who opposed its earliest and latest steps. Mr. Yates and Mr. Lansing left the convention in utter despair of effecting any change in the views and work of the majority. And Mr. Martin, in his "Genuine Information," subsequently laid before the Legislature of Maryland, placed imperishably upon record his protest against the instrument as perfected, and submitted, for adoption or rejection, to the people. This constitution was understood, both by its friends and its enemies, to involve a partial surrender of State sovereignty; by the first, this surrender was described as limited to certain powers or rights, though absolute as to these; by the second, this surrender was magnified into an utter divestiture of State rights, and as producing a grand and dangerous consolidation. I speak the words of Jefferson, said Mr. D., when I insist upon taking the constitution in the sense in which it was adopted by the States; that in which it was advocated by its friends, and not that which its enemies apprehended. The very men who studiously elaborated every sentence of it, conveyed its characterizing peculiarity to Congress, in the letter by which they accompanied the act of depositing it for scrutiny before that body, and the people at large. I refer, said Mr. D., to the letter signed by George Washington, as President of the convention, dated the 17th September, 1787. "It is obviously impracticable in the Federal Government of these States, to secure all rights of independent sovereignty to each, and yet provide for the interest and safety of all." "It is at all times difficult to draw with precision the line between those rights which must be surrendered, and those which may be reserved;" and, lastly, "In all our deliberations on this subject, we kept steadily in our view that which appears to us the greatest interest of every true American—the consolidation of our Union, in which is involved our prosperity, felicity, safety, perhaps our national existence."

Whatever, however, may be the success of ingenuity in explaining away language thus clear, used by those who formed the constitution, it is impossible to mistake the sense in which it was finally ratified by the people in the conventions respectively representing or embodying their State sovereignties. And here, after all, is the authoritative point of investigation. No matter who concocted the system; no matter what may have been their actuating motives, or impelling principles; no matter whether they were originally warranted by their letter of attorney; no matter how they regarded the tendencies of the Government which their labors had matured into form and shape; was it understood by those who ratified and adopted it? Was its true character fairly and fully developed? Did the American people make it, theirs, understandingly and intentionally? These are the only questions whose solution definitively terminates dispute. Sir, said Mr. D., in every one of the sovereign conventions it was avowed to be, and called, a National Government, of a compound nature, for specified purposes, whose constitution and laws were to be paramount and supreme. This was the definition and representation of all who advocated its establishment; and this was the sense in which it was every where adopted. I turn, said Mr. D., in proof of what I say, to three leading examples—the discussions in the conventions of Pennsylvania, South Carolina, and Virginia; and I select the views of those statesmen who are known to have led to the conclusion attained in each. James Wilson and Thomas McKean, in Pennsylvania, Pinckney and Rutledge, in South Carolina, and Madison, in Virginia; and I cannot even mention the name of this last eminent man, said Mr. D., without accompanying it with the expressions of an abiding belief that, for purity of heart, lucidness of intellect, integrity of purpose, wise and patriotic forbearance, and unflinching firmness of truth, our country has not furnished his superior in the walks of public or private life. He will go down to our most distant posterity as the best model we have yet had of what an American statesman should be.

[Mr. D. then read extracts from the debates in the several conventions to which he had referred, tending to show that the constitution was distinctly and impressively declared not to be a league, an alliance, a council, a confederacy, but a Federal and National Government, in the structure of which each State surrendered a portion of its sovereignty, which was competent to enforce its own laws against State power, and whose Judiciary, within its prescribed sphere, was uncontrollable by that of any State.]

These illustrations, continued Mr. D., are conclusive to show the sense in which the constitution was ratified by the people of the several States. He placed little or no reliance upon mere detached words or phrases; his confidence was in broad and distinct explanations of principles and powers. It is more curious than convincing to observe, as he had done, in the fac simile of the original draught of the Declaration of Independence, that its first line stood thus: "When, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for a people to dissolve the political bands," &c., and that subsequently the indefinite and unmeaning article was made to give way to an interlineation of pregnant signification, and the sentence altered to what it now stands: "When, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands." It was also more curious than convincing to notice, as he had, the conjunctive import of the phrase, "We, the people of the United States," in the preamble of the constitution. "The United States" must have been here used in the sense in which it is undeniably used in every other part of the same instrument. It involves no allusion whatever to the separate sovereign States. It is the corporate style of the nation, and suggests to his mind exactly the same idea as "America" did to our early patriots, or "Columbia" would have suggested, had it been adopted, as was once proposed. And so also is it more curious than convincing to notice the undistinguishing, and, if he might be allowed the expletive, the unfederative description of the country contained in two small words of the second clause of the sixth article of the constitution: "This constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." There is a consolidating aspect about "the land," as descriptive of the range within which our constitution and laws were to be supreme, not perhaps discernible in any other single sentence of that instrument. But enough of critical niceties. They, nor any of the matters to which he had referred, were not resorted to as evidence of the existence of one consolidated people. He detested, equally with any man, such a conclusion, as alike destructive of the federative columns on which the constitution has reposed the Government, and dangerous to the liberties of the country.

Mr. D. hoped he had not altogether failed in showing the nature of our political organization. The people, in distinct aggregates of States, had made it. The same people can destroy it. But how can they destroy it? By one of two ways only: by the process of constitutional amendment or change, as prescribed; or by the process of revolution. Both ways are sovereign rights: the first, reserved and directed in the constitution itself; the second, inherent and unalienable by nature. But can any alteration of the constitution be, consistently with its provisions, effected, except in the manner it expressly ordains? If it can, any manner is as effective as the one agreed upon; and our sages very absurdly burdened the instrument. Sir, said Mr. D., shall a single State, exercising her sovereignty by the force of a majority of her citizens, do that which is unequivocally prohibited to less than three-fourths of the States? Such an exertion of sovereignty is incompatible with the essence, the moral essence, of the constitutional compact. It denies and renounces the obligations of justice and good faith. It is a claim to cancel and ride over the most sacred engagements entered into with the highest and most imposing solemnities of sovereign action. It involves a pretension to do wrong without responsibility. I have admitted the physical power, the competency of force and numbers; but I deny, wholly and unqualifiedly I deny, the moral right.

It struck him, continued Mr. D., as practically incongruous and preposterous, to reserve a right to resume at pleasure what is agreed to be surrendered, and has been finally surrendered. But I am asked, who shall be the judge whether the surrender has really been agreed upon or actually made? In other words, whether the exercise of a power by law be constitutional or not? I do not say the Supreme Court, nor do I say the entire Government of the United States; although I am inclined to believe that they who insist upon either or both of them have the warrant of the constitution for their positions. There is another tribunal in the way of nullification or secession; and I answer, that the only judge in the last resort, whether the constitution shall be at an end or not, whether the Government shall be arrested in its operations or not, is the very sovereignty by which it was created, and from which it received its first impulse; that sovereignty is "the people of the United States." No earthly power can, of right, impede the course of their Government, except those whom they have, from the starting place, commissioned to do so, or themselves. If they have commissioned, as I am disposed to think, a Judiciary constituted by themselves, upon principles and after forms prescribed by themselves, to revise and determine, well; if they have confided in the whole Government, perpetually renovated and supervised by themselves, this discretion, well again; but if neither of these tribunals be vested with this great attribute, then I say it is with themselves; it has certainly been given to no other agency or being. The right to judge finally, then, is with the same sovereignty whence the constitution emanated. It belonged to no isolated or detached portion of it. I plant myself also upon the reserved rights of the States, like my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. Brown.] Not on the reserved rights of any one of the States, but of all. The constitution was the creature of all; its destruction or abandonment cannot be rightfully accomplished, except by a movement which shall bind all.

Sir, said Mr. D., I cannot find in the constitution, expressly or impliedly, a warrant for the course of South Carolina, and can therefore entertain no doubt of our constitutional power to enact this bill into a law. What are its tendencies and objects?

It is painful to see the true character of a legislative measure so strangely perverted or misconceived as this has been in the course of the present debate. We have it in print before us; it has lain upon our desks for many days, liable to the strictest examination; it hangs, inaccessible to vision, upon no lofty pillar; it has already travelled through the press, and has been canvassed by the people, in a variety of ways; it cannot now be deformed by mere rhetoric, nor buried under a mound of obloquy. Like the constitution on which I have been commenting, its words are plain and intelligible, and it is meant for the home-bred, unsophisticated understandings of our fellow-citizens. Who cannot perceive that, in every one of its provisions, in all its possible action, it is purely and simply defensive? It is illuminated with a declaration to which a Senator adverted, "let us alone, and we will let you alone." It is called into being by the ordinance, laws, and military demonstrations of South Carolina; and it cannot work, except as counteractive of avowed schemes to evade, resist, and nullify our laws. These schemes, it is agreed on all hands, must succeed, if we supinely fold our arms. If they are legitimate and just, let them succeed; if they are wrong, and subversive of our peace, our con-situation, and our statutes, we must act, or give up the Government as incapable or unfit to be administered. The bill proposes to exhaust the civil and judicial means of carrying the laws into execution, before a single movement of a different kind be countenanced. When our legal custody of imported goods, under the duty act, is avowedly to be defeated by the extraordinary replevin law, can we do less than double the number and strength of our custom-house bolts and bars? When the avenues to justice are poisoned or polluted by test oaths, can we do less than devise modes of reaching and entering her eternal temple, through purer and safer channels? And when the sublime terrors of the blue cockade and the Palmetto button are paraded before our eyes, may we not be excused, if, in mere effort to keep our courage from oozing out at our fingers' ends, we permit the eagle to soar a little, only a little, and the stars and stripes to fan but gently our fainting spirits? Sir, said Mr. D., law is alike odious and dangerous to those who wish to disobey it. Restraint is always arbitrary, dictatorial, despotic, in the vocabulary of those who desire to do as they please, and what they please. Yet are the people of this country strongly impressed with the conviction that, without law, there can be no liberty; and that they who preach disobedience to the one, are the most apt to disregard the other. There is something very oppressive about the course of control which this bill sanctions. Obedience to the revenue laws is to be enforced first, through collectors, surveyors, and tide-waiters. Is not this, sir, quite unprecedented? Then, the interference of marshals, bailiffs, and tipstaves, is authorized. Who can imagine a greater extension of arbitrary power? Anon, impartial (aye, there's the rub) judges and jurors are provided. Is not this assuming a most belligerent and offensive attitude? But it gets worse and worse; if our laws are threatened with prostration, our officers with violence, and the community with riot, conflagration, and bloodshed, why then the bill, in pure, unmixed, unmitigated despotism, arms the President with the overwhelming and exterminating power of issuing death warrants. No! his proclamation to disperse! Sir, the Boston port bill, the Jersey prison ship, the imperial ukase of desolation against Poland, was nothing to this; all their virtues concentrated could not equal a Presidential proclamation to enforce the payment of duties on a hoghead of sugar! But enormity accumulates upon enormity; and this dreadful bill, denounced as a declaration of war, actually authorizes the officers of the customs, when the property under their charge shall be endangered by unruly combinations and force, to back out of the scrape, run away, and not to stop until they have a river between themselves and their assailants! It is too much; the principles of '98, the holy cause of human freedom, the blood of our ancestors, the blue cockade and the palmetto button, cannot sanction or endure it.

Sir, said Mr. D., this is, in plain reality, the outline of the bill, until we reach a point at which, for the purpose of protecting the lives, liberties, and properties of our fellow-citizens in South Carolina, it may become necessary to quell refractory and treasonable disobedience with the vigor and promptness of military or naval force. If the emergency be brought on by those who are bent upon throwing off their allegiance to the constitution and laws of the land, we may deplore, but we cannot avoid it; we must meet it with every possible forbearance, but with firmness. Ours will not be the responsibility for consequences, unless we fail in preparing adequately and effectively to prevent or ameliorate them. Nor have I the dread, which is entertained by others, of using, on special occasions, and by authority of law, the regularly armed energy of the country. In its present reduced condition as to numbers, though admirable state as to discipline, more force could not be expected to be at any time, or on any point, at the disposition of the Executive, than Mr.

Jefferson called out, under one of the precedents for the present law, to carry into effect the embargo.

In all such cases we shall probably find, as that Chief Magistrate found, that there was great efficacy in being prepared; that the maxim is universally applicable, "ostendite bellum, pacem habebitis." But, sir, I have heard our army and navy strangely characterized in the course of this discussion; they have been termed hired mercenaries! Do they merit the imputation? Are the band of gallant officers who have shielded you from invasion, or carried the national flag in triumph over every sea, and under every sun, hired mercenaries? We used no such language during the war for free trade and sailors' rights; while our tars were humbling a haughty foe, and sending into our ports, to be greeted with our acclamations, prize after prize; or while the scarlet trappings of British enterprise and valor glittered on the heights of Baltimore, or the plains of New Orleans, destined, at both places, to encounter a relic of revolutionary worth. We used no such words as hired mercenaries, then; they were unknown, alike to our hearts and our lips; and may they pass into utter oblivion before times equally trying shall again occur!

Our Union, said Mr. D., is an incalculable blessing. While it has lasted, what have we not accomplished, both in peace and in war? All the great objects of human associations have been cultivated and attained with almost unexampled rapidity and ease. Liberty has been chastened, and made forever stable; science has been stormed in her hundred trenches, and mastered in all her ramparts; happiness has gently diffused itself throughout an immense population, taking its own ways over a boundless region of country; and wealth and power have gradually made the American people rivals of Greek and Roman fame. All the high aims, too, of a virtuous ambition have been reached in war. Independence consummated; renown every where acknowledged; glory, bright among the brightest! Yield away the constitution and the Union, and where are we? Frittered into fragments, and not able to claim one portion of the past as peculiarly its own! Sir, our Union is not merely a blessing; it is a political necessity. We cannot exist without it. I mean, that all of existence which is worth having must depart with it. Our liberties could not endure the incessant conflicts of civil and conterminous strife; our independence would be an unreal mockery; our very memories would turn to bitterness. The Senator from Virginia justly compared our political institutions to the planetary system. I wish he would agree with me in saying, that the great principles of attraction and repulsion are equally necessary in the two cases; that the sudden interruption of either must be fatal; that the National Union of sovereign States can alone preserve us from chaos.

Mr. MILLER, of South Carolina, then rose, and said that after the powerful argument to which the Senate had just listened, and the condemnatory tone of that argument, in reference to the conduct of the State of South Carolina, it was incumbent on him to make some observations in justification of the proceedings in that State. He would either proceed now, or postpone his remarks until to-morrow, at the pleasure of the Senate. Mr. M. here gave way to a motion to adjourn, and The Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 9.

MILITARY ORDERS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution offered by Mr. POINDEXTER, calling for copies of all orders, &c. to military and naval commanders at Charleston, &c.

Mr. GRUNDY, remarking that a few moments only of time remained before the hour at which the special order was to be called, said he should be brief in what he had to say in reply to the remarks made yesterday upon the amendment proposed by him, having for its object to leave the usual discretion with the Executive in regard to the papers proposed to be asked for.

From what he (Mr. G.) had said, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had seemed to draw an inference that some correspondence, of an exceptional nature, had taken place between the President and some individuals in some part of South Carolina. I have only to say, upon that point, said Mr. G., that that inference can find no foundation or support in any remarks of mine. I said nothing whatever to warrant it. Nothing that I say or know must be relied upon as evidence of such facts, as the gentlemen seems to suppose to exist. What I said was this: that, considering the peculiar situation of affairs in the State of South Carolina, it was a thing to be expected that individuals should have written to the President on the subject; not that the President had responded to such communications, or given information in return. I spoke, in saying this, the inference of my own mind, drawn from what every one knows to be the state of things there. When parties were arrayed against one another as they are there, and a great excitement existed, it was not to be presumed that every one would remain silent, and that the General Government would have no information of what took place there. This was a supposition entirely inadmissible by any well-regulated mind. But he had not intimated that the President had responded to such communications, nor had he heard it charged that he had. He had indeed seen something in a South Carolina paper, importing that the proclamation of the President had been known of there before it was known here; but he had seen that rumor contradicted here by a paper entitled to as much credit as the one which promulgated it, and he had no belief in it.

It had been said, that the President could withhold any information he chose, without the qualification proposed to be given to the resolution. That was very true, Mr. G. said. It had also been remarked, that the President was not afraid of responsibility. That was true, too, Mr. G. said. Every body knew it to be so. But, in asking him for information, it ought to be so asked as not to seem to require from him more than he ought to communicate. What is it, said Mr. G., that we wish not to be communicated? Only that the names of private individuals, if any such are connected with the information in possession of the President, may not be exposed. There was no necessity for any such disclosure. Whatever the Executive had done, he would communicate; and why he had done it.

It was merely to prevent private individuals from being compromised, that Mr. G. wished to limit this call. Was not party excitement already high enough in South Carolina? Was it not already high enough throughout the nation? Did gentlemen want to add fuel to the flame? If they did, Mr. G. said he was opposed to it. He would rather see peace, and good will, and harmony prevail, than by any act or vote of his increase the discord.

Mr. CALHOUN here apologizing for interrupting Mr. GARDNER, suggested that it would perhaps save him some time to apprise him that the mover of the resolution was not present in the Senate at this time.

Mr. GRUNDY said he should soon finish what little he had to say, when the resolution might be laid over till the mover was present. He wished that this resolution, without being the means of any unnecessary excitement, should be promptly acted upon, because he believed that it would elicit information which would go in a great degree to allay the public feeling, and to remove groundless apprehensions; that it would indeed abate rather than increase the existing excitement in the South.

The Senator from South Carolina had seemed yesterday to intimate that the information which he (Mr. G.)

had then given ought to be regarded as semi-official. Now, Mr. G. said he wished that Senator and all others to understand this: that when he spoke on this floor, he spoke as one of the representatives of the State of Tennessee, and that no other individual was to be affected or committed by what he said. When he did speak for others, he would say so: when he did not say so, he spoke only as one of the representatives of Tennessee. He disclaimed any remarks of his being taken for any thing but the dictates of his own judgment, for which no other person was responsible.

He would now state to the Senate (that there might be no misunderstanding of the subject) what kind of a resolution would answer all his purposes, anxious, as he really was, that the whole matter should be spread before the American people, believing that it would appear to be of a peaceful and not warlike character. The resolution might read thus: That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the Senate copies of all orders which have been issued in relation to the operation of the troops or armed vessels of the United States in or near the State of South Carolina, since the first day of July last, (or any other date that gentlemen pleased.) Under such a resolution (said Mr. G.) we should get the whole of the information desired, without requiring, or appearing to require, of the President any information which might injuriously affect any individuals.

[The debate here ended for the present.]

SPECIAL ORDER.

The CHAIR having called the special order, being the bill to provide further for the collection of the duties on imports—

Mr. FORSYTH moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Monday, with a view of proceeding to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WILKINS asked for the yeas and nays, which being taken, stood:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clayton, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Rives, Robinson, Smith, Sprague, Tipton, Tyler, Waggaman, White, Wright—23.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Buckner, Chambers, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Johnston, Knight, Prentiss, Robbins, Seymour, Tomlinson, Webster, Wilkins—17.

So the motion to postpone was agreed to.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 11.

MODIFICATION OF THE TARIFF.

Mr. CLAY gave notice that he should on to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill to modify the various acts imposing duties on imports.

MILITARY ORDERS.

The Senate then proceeded to consider the resolution offered by Mr. POINDEXTER.

Mr. POINDEXTER said, he did not rise to go into a further discussion of this subject, but merely to mention, that a call, analogous to this, was once made on Mr. Jefferson, at the period of what was called the Burr conspiracy; when a resolution was introduced, in the other House, by Mr. Randolph, which went further than this. It was to ask of the Secretary of State what had been done in relation to the supposed conspiracy, and what was intended to be done.

Mr. GRUNDY: I am thoroughly persuaded it is of great importance that the public should be in possession of the orders, whatever they may be, that have been issued from the War Department, in relation to this subject. My fear is, that if we keep on discussing the resolution every morning up to the time when the order of the day is taken up, we shall lose the benefit of having these papers spread before the Senate and the public; and may, perhaps, change the character of the discussion now going on in relation to the bill pending before the Senate. Hoping that the evils which he had originally feared from the adoption of the resolution without amendment might not happen, he was induced to withdraw his proposition to amend, and to request the Senate to adopt the resolution in the regular form.

The resolution was then agreed to without amendment.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

The Senate having proceeded to consider the bill to provide further for the collection of the duties on imports:

Mr. MILLER rose, and said he was greatly indebted to the motives of the Senate for rising after the conclusion of the Senator from Pennsylvania. He was persuaded that the liberal spirit which dictated this course had its origin in a source of benevolence more enlarged than mere personal courtesy to himself. It is very obvious (said Mr. M.) that this bill is in the nature of a bill of outlawry against South Carolina; a species of trial for political heresy; common justice requires that he should be permitted to plead. She has the plighted faith and sacred honor of representatives of the States that an impartial sentence will be pronounced. The elevated rank which that State has always maintained cannot make her indifferent to the opinions of others; yet a firm reliance on the correctness of her principles will not permit her, out of deference to others, to disown them, or dissemble where she does not believe. I may be permitted, once for all, to say, we are attached to the Union as we are to all good things; we cherish it for the blessings it bestows. While we admire and venerate the Union, let us not be understood as so far enchanted by a name, as to surrender every thing to it. We love the Union, but we love our rights and constitutional freedom more. I shall attempt to prove, by fair reasoning and facts, that the people of South Carolina are bound to obey the ordinance which is the inducement to our present legislation. If I can make good this position, it will follow that any act of Congress which shall control such obedience is unauthorized, and must find its support in the power to act, and not in the right to do so. In advance, I protest against the doctrine that the States never were sovereign. South Carolina was sovereign before the 4th of July, 1776; her separate character was never merged by the Declaration of Independence, nor by the articles of confederation. The old articles of confederation were concessions by the States of certain powers in derogation of their sovereignty, but not subversive thereof; they retained every power not delegated, and some of the powers conceded were as purely sovereign as any in the present constitution; the right to enforce the powers conceded was as ample and conclusive. The Union was declared to be perpetual by the old confederation; when the proposition was made to adopt the present constitution, all were free to adopt or reject it. The first revenue law recognised North Carolina and Rhode Island as out of the Union; they were adherents to the confederation. The other eleven States seceded from the then Union, and had no right to declare war against North Carolina and Rhode Island, to compel them to come into the present Union: they might have remained out of the Union up to this time. Their rights were the same then as all others, and all others the same as theirs; they were all independent States, free to come in or not.

South Carolina, in her sovereign character, came into the Union. If the States were sovereign when they adopted the constitution, and did not, at that time, intend their own annihilation, then they certainly can maintain the right to protect themselves against annihilation. Every superior court exercises the power of self-protection. It is impossible to conceive of sovereign power divested of the right of self-protection. To recognise such a principle is political suicide. The intention to surrender this vital principle cannot be presumed. It must be express. No inference from doubtful premises will authorize the assumption that a sovereign meant, by parting with a portion of power, to surrender all. A contract which would deprive a freeman of his liberty, to make him a slave, must not depend on implication. No man ought to be construed out of his life; no sovereign ought to be supposed, intentionally, so blind and reckless, as to stipulate for his own disfranchisement, unless upon the most explicit terms. There was no motive to destroy the States as sovereign communities at the time of the adoption of the constitution. The terms used will not warrant such a construction; and, out of abundant caution, the rights not delegated were reserved expressly. If it can be shown that the opposite theory, the one which supports this bill, does not regard the States as having any rights whatever; that there is not a vestige of power that they can call their own, or assert as their own, but which this Government may supersede by force, that theory cannot be right. What right can a State have which she may lawfully refuse to surrender? Not one. There is not a principle of municipal or criminal law, but what Congress may repeal, and enforce by the sword. They may pass laws of primogeniture, to foster manufacturing arts and civilization. They may foster capital, and make it accumulate in the eldest son, to promote the general welfare; and, when this is done, the federal judges will have jurisdiction of such cases, and will surely support the law. The whole criminal code can be made tributary to the clause that "excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unjust punishment inflicted." It may be urged in vain: this restriction applies alone to the Federal Government.

We have heard the Senator from Pennsylvania denounce South Carolina for not conceding a fair trial under the sixth amendment, which was intended, when adopted, to apply only as a restraint upon the Federal Government. Under the clause authorizing naturalization, Congress may declare no American citizen shall lose his life under State laws, or be deprived of the rights of a citizen by decapitation; and the armed force of the nation be put at the power of the President to enforce the right of citizenship against the criminal power of the State. Every culprit may appeal to the federal courts, and the whole criminal justice of the country be superseded. Take a clause in the bill under consideration as a sample.

"Sec. 3. Upon suggestion and affidavit of a rogue or villain, that he is prosecuted for something done under law of Congress, this, ipso facto, is to transfer the case from the State court to the federal court."

It must be for something done in furtherance of the revenue law; but who is to decide whether it is a flagrant highway robbery, or the innocent execution of the revenue laws; that it is to be transferred by the defendant, the culprit, upon his own construction of his own rights? He has the absolute right to decide the character of the charge, and, upon his oath, stained with perjury, warped by prejudice, or bottomed in ignorance, he is transmuted into the federal court. If he be really guilty of misdemeanor against a State law, or has committed a capital crime, and sees the approach of his punishment, his guilt apparent, or the proof ready forthwith to subject him to the retributive justice of the violated laws of a State—without the slightest foundation for the truth, the State judge must, if the guilty person makes the affidavit, transfer him to the federal court or federal jail. When he is brought for trial in the federal court, it may appear on the trial that the court has not the pretence of jurisdiction, and thereupon the prisoner may be discharged; there is no power to remand him to the State court. By this means a criminal may escape his punishment, and the State courts and the State authority trampled on by the lawless felon. The right to transfer is preceded by no examination; the prisoner is to be judge in his own cause, and would be blind to his own prospect of escape, if he did not swear roundly where he was clearly guilty, in order to get out of the clutches of the law.

Thus it appears that the States may not only lose all power to punish offenders against their laws purely local, but that it is proposed actually to enact such a provision. The Senator from Delaware, to whom I always listen with pleasure—to none more so—in his argument against the rights of the States, puts an extreme case. He says: Suppose 10,000 foreigners to become naturalized, and to locate themselves in Delaware; they would be equal to the present number of votes in that State; they might nullify a law of Congress; and that this would be an efficient means in the hands of foreigners to subvert our Government. Sir, I admit this is an extreme case, and a violent supposition; but I will meet it; I will never be driven from a general rule laid down by me, by an extreme case; a principle, to be worth any thing, should be able to resist all extreme cases. Although the Senator has thought proper to disparage State rights in the person of Delaware, so ably represented by him on this floor, I will not follow his example. I have known a judge refuse to let counsel suppose him capable of committing a fraud. I consider it somewhat a discourteous supposition, that a concentration of foreigners in the State of Delaware might be the means of introducing foreign influence, and injury to the operations of our Government. My reply to this case is, that if ten thousand foreigners are naturalized in the United States, and settle in Delaware, they will be citizens of that State. If, by their votes, a law of Congress is arrested, no matter from what motive, you must apply the ultimate reforming power, as was done when Burr ran for President against Jefferson, and Chisholm sued the State of Georgia. Because the State of Delaware, from her numbers, may not be able to resist the force of numbers thrown upon her under the laws and constitution of the United States, it is no good reason to argue either Delaware or any other State out of her reserved sovereign powers and rights.

If Congress were to levy an export duty, (if they can lay a general embargo, they can levy an export duty by the same reasoning—the greater power includes the minor,) in that event, ought not Delaware to disregard it, or any other State? And yet any legislative declaration, sustaining the rights of the citizen, may be met with military power. Instead of the States being sovereign, the opposite argument makes them slaves. The definition of a slave is one who holds his rights at the pleasure of another; the States hold their rights at the will of Congress; ergo, the States are slaves. Where two persons claim land under different grants, the correct rule is to locate in favor of the elder grant. In doubtful cases, begin at the old well known corner, which is, the States were sovereign and independent when they made the constitution, and fairly allow to each party within their grants what the compact gives, and to the States the benefit of the above rule. In politics, you may as well dispute the proposition, that in the beginning the States were sovereign, as in religion, to dispute that in the beginning the “word was God.” He who does either is an infidel to the true faith of our constitution and religion, and I will waste no words with him, but proceed from premises admitted to conclusions denied.

After the adoption of the federal constitution in a convention of the people, South Carolina made her own, in which there is this article: “All power is originally vested in the people, and all free Governments are founded on their authority, and are instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness.” Now, it may be asked, what “people” is meant in this article? Surely, not the people in the world, nor either of the four quarters thereof, but in the very people who were then organizing a Government for themselves—the people of South Carolina.

It does not appertain to a citizen of South Carolina to deny the authority of his Government, thus instituted.

The people of South Carolina have the supreme power, so far as to govern themselves. They divested themselves of this power, except when they should be called together by two-thirds of both branches of the Legislature. “No convention of the people shall be called, only by the concurrence of two-thirds of both branches of the whole representation.” Having established the principle that all power was in them, they put their Government in motion, and limited their own power by a check that they would not resume it, except by two-thirds of the representation consenting thereto. When, therefore, two-thirds agree that the power shall be resumed, which is a first principle in their Government, the Government then becomes a pure democracy.

Mr. HOLMES here inquired when the constitution of South Carolina was adopted; whether it was not subsequent to the federal constitution?

Mr. MILLER answered, in 1790, subsequent to the federal constitution. Mr. M. said, he did not consider the Senator from Maine could make much out of the time, since he contended that one convention was equal to another. A convention had adopted the federal constitution; a convention of the same people, after this, for themselves, at least, could say that all power lies with themselves, for their own government. Subsequent laws abrogate prior laws, if they conflict. One Congress cannot prevent a subsequent one from repealing a law; nor can one convention of the people of South Carolina have more power than another. Things that are equal cannot bind one another. A people that are sovereign to-day, must, when assembled rightfully, be sovereign to-morrow: the last act of the sovereign power must govern those who are subject to it.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALLAS] has objected that the acts of the late convention in South Carolina were not submitted to the people. This objection proceeds upon a capital error as to the nature of a convention; they were the people themselves, and their act was the act of the people, without any further confirmation.

The constitution of the United States was adopted by a similar convention, and never brought before the people. The meaning of a convention was an assembly of every person having any political rights in the State, and the majority of the people to govern.

What would the Sumters, Pinckneys, and Taylors have thought, if, by the assertion in our State constitution, that all “power is in the people,” the basis of the acts of the late convention, the Federal Executive had thereupon issued his proclamation, commanding them to reassemble and snatch this heresy, this disorganizing edict, from their archives. Sir, they would have placed their hands on their swords, and, like the sturdy barons of old, replied, we are unwilling that our constitution shall be changed. If the position be correct, “that the aggression may be regarded as committed when it is officially authorized, and the means of enforcing fully provided,” then the aggression now complained of was committed when this clause was introduced into the State constitution; since that has given the power to do what has been done, and also the power to provide the means.

Let me ask, what is law? It is a rule of conduct prescribed by the supreme authority, commanding what is right, and forbidding what is wrong. If the people in South Carolina have all the powers of self-government, who shall interpose? Upon what principle, human or divine, can the General Government punish a citizen of South Carolina, for obeying a law emanating from the supreme power in that State? This fundamental principle of civil liberty has held a place in our charter for forty-two years, and now we are called upon, by force, to expunge this article from our constitution, and substitute, "all power is in Congress; there is but one God, who is the Federal Government; there is but one prophet, who is Andrew Jackson."

For the present, I shall assume that the article is still retained, and from it deduce the right to construe the constitution of the United States, to which they became a party.

Sir, the whole of the present bill under consideration assumes that the people of South Carolina are bound by the ordinance and the laws. If the people of South Carolina are bound to obey the ordinance, it follows, as a just consequence, that any effort, by force, in that State, to compel the people to disobey their own laws, is war—regular, legitimate war. War is the assertion of a right, by force, of one nation against another nation. I deny that the United States can constitutionally carry on war against a State. If a State violates the constitution, you must correct the error by the Supreme Court, or by a convention of the States. It is a barbarous and tyrannical assumption, that this Government can, by force, overturn State legislation.

Our Government being an imperium in imperio, neither power can, by force, resist the other power.

I shall now proceed to consider the ordinance.

Although I have shown that the people of South Carolina having, in their sovereign character, put their construction on their rights, which stops all further consideration, except of an unconstitutional or belligerent nature, I will proceed to consider this question as subordinate to the constitution of the United States.

The first section declares the tariff laws null and void. The State has the right, consistent with the constitution, to make this declaration. It is the mere recital of a truth; only declaring what was originally so. But it is argued that the tariff is constitutional. If so, we are not now to decide that question; that is for another forum. We are not to expound and enforce our own law.

Is the tariff constitutional? This question must be decided in the affirmative, before you can enforce its provisions, or impugn its ordinance. The power to protect domestic manufactures is not to be found in terms in the constitution. If it is to be found at all, it must be among the incidental powers. Thus, under the taxing power, the right to protect is set up. But it is the opinion of the great body of the people of South Carolina, that the right to tax for revenue does not extend the right to tax for protection. It is said by the President, that, as the power to tax is in Congress, they can tax to any extent, without the right, on the part of any one, to question the motive; this I deny, as a correct principle of constitutional construction. The people have the right to examine the motive. A limited power to tax can only be properly restrained by looking at the motive. Congress have the power to fix their own compensation; they may, under the taxing power, levy a tax on the people, intending to distribute the same among themselves; this could only be prevented by the people refusing to pay it, if the tax is laid with an improper motive. The true way to test this tax is to analyze the law, and then determine whether it is competent to levy a tax, to give the benefit thereof to the manufacturers. We have the treasury estimate of an extra amount of taxation, equal to six millions; take this sum, and then inquire, can Congress levy that amount, and give the same to the manufacturers? This right to levy a tax for protection is by some referred to the power to regulate commerce. By looking into the proceedings preliminary to the adoption of the Federal Government, to be found in the first volume of the laws of Congress, it will be there seen that this power was desired only to protect the navigating interest; the object being clearly to invigorate and encourage commerce, not to cripple and destroy it. I will not dwell on this subject. I delivered my opinions at length in the debate on the passage of the last tariff. This subject has undergone a most thorough investigation, and the united voice of the planting States pronounced the principle of protection unconstitutional. This is no new doctrine, for the first time broached by the convention of South Carolina. It has been pronounced from Virginia to Mississippi for the last eight years. But it has been urged that the revenue is repealed, as well as the protection; and, therefore, the ordinance is unconstitutional.

Sir, let us examine a little the validity of this objection to the ordinance. If it be partly contaminated, the whole is void. The fraudulent execution of an invalid power makes the deed null. A dollar, part silver, part pewter, is a counterfeit. Where a wrong-doer mixes his goods with those of another, if there is no way to ascertain how much belongs to each, he who produces the difficulty must lose what belongs to him. Who could expect to be paid for sugar sold, if half were sand? It is the fault of him who practises the fraud, if he loses that which might have been valuable.

The third section declares, that appeals shall not be taken from the State court. This contravenes the 25th section of the judiciary act, it is said.

It is well known that the right to take a case from the State court, by an appeal to the Supreme Court, has been contested in every form, ever since the enactment of this law.

"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

By this clause in the constitution, it is declared that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain.

The whole of the judicial power is thus vested in the United States court. By what authority can any power be transferred by Congress to the State courts? There is no such power. "The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and the treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States; and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects."

Having provided for the courts in the first clause, they have, in this one, provided for the jurisdiction, which is limited to all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution and laws of the United States. "Extend to," means, reach to, cover. These words do not give exclusive jurisdiction.

Judicial power is a generic term, including the Supreme Court, and the inferior courts of the United States.

A State court is not an inferior court of the United States, and therefore no appeal can fairly be predicated on the proceedings of the State courts.

There is a subsequent clause which provides that the State courts shall be bound by the constitution, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, and to treaties; this was the only check which was intended to secure the rights of persons under the constitution, laws, and treaties.

Revenue Collection Bill.

There is no more ground to suppose State courts could not be trusted to execute such cases as might be brought in State courts, where rights were secured under the Federal Government, than the Governors.

Where fugitives may be demanded, the United States cannot control this officer; he may demand, or not; so the State officers must swear to support the constitution of the United States; if they do not, there is no way for this Government to compel them, unless by a resort to force, which was not intended.

The President relies on this clause: "This constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding," to prove the State courts bound to sustain the United States laws. This is not denied; but not when those laws are in violation of the constitution; and it was not intended that the State judges should have their decisions questioned any more by federal judges, than federal judges should have their opinions questioned by State judges; both were to be final in their sphere. State courts are of general jurisdiction, nothing presumed out of their jurisdiction; federal courts limited. Every thing must be proven to give jurisdiction. Upon general principles, there would be more propriety in the State courts reversing the federal decisions, than the converse, because all courts of limited jurisdiction may be kept within their province by courts of general jurisdiction.

The President, in his proclamation, says, the laws, constitution, and treaties, are the supreme law of the land. This is not a correct view of the constitution. The President seems to consider a law above the constitution, and the treaties subject to it; now, I understand it to be exactly different. The treaties are not required to be made in pursuance of the constitution, but the laws are.

A treaty may become necessary, impairing, in some instance, the constitution; and it is incident to the war power. The treaty-making power may fairly be considered as an independent substantive one, involving the highest political rights; and, when sanctioned by two-thirds of the Senate, binding on the constituted authorities of the United States and the States. And here I will remark, there seems no ground to suppose that the terms "law of the land," mean any thing more than that the constitution, and laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, and treaties, are, by this clause, made the law of the land of the States, not of the United States; they have no land but the public land; the lex terræ referred to here is the local law; and the federal laws are made a part of the local law, and to be locally administered. So much for the argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania, who seeks to enlarge the powers of the United States by this clause.

Luther Martin has been referred to, on the other side, as authority. In his report of what was done in the convention, to the Maryland Legislature, he says, the convention expressly refused to trust the State courts to be the agents of the United States, so far as to try cases in the first instance; and confirms precisely my construction of the judicial clauses.*

I will read a part of Madison's report on this subject, which I shall consider a part of my argument.

"The resolution having taken this view of the federal compact, proceeds to infer, 'that, in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of other powers, not granted by the said compact, the States, who are parties thereto, have the right, and are in duty bound, to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining, within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties appertaining to them.'

"It appears to your committee to be a plain principle, founded in common sense, illustrated by common practice, and essential to the nature of compacts, that, where resort can be had to no tribunal superior to the authority of the parties, the parties themselves must be the rightful judges in the last resort, whether the bargain made has been pursued or violated. The constitution of the United States was formed by the sanction of the States, given by each in its sovereign capacity. It adds to the stability and dignity, as well as to the authority of the constitution, that it rests on this legitimate and solid foundation. The States, then, being the parties to the constitutional compact, and in their sovereign capacity, it follows, of necessity, that there can be no tribunal above their authority, to decide, in the last resort, whether the compact made by them be violated; and, consequently, that, as the parties to it, they must themselves decide, in the last resort, such questions as may be of sufficient magnitude to require their interposition.

"It does not follow, however, because the States, as sovereign parties to their constitutional compact, must ultimately decide whether it has been violated, that such a decision ought to be interposed, either in a hasty manner, or on doubtful and inferior occasions. Even in the case of ordinary conventions between different nations, where, by the strict rule of interpretation, a breach of a part may be deemed a breach of the whole, every part being deemed a condition of every other part, and of the whole, it is always laid down that the breach must be both wilful and material, to justify an application of the rule. But, in the case of an intimate and constitutional union, like that of the United States, it is evident that the interposition of the parties, in their sovereign capacity, can be called for by occasions only deeply and essentially affecting the vital principles of their political system.

"The resolution has accordingly guarded against any misapprehension of its object, by expressly requiring for such an interposition 'the case of, a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous breach of the constitution, by the exercise of powers not granted by it.' It must be a case, not of a light and transient nature, but of a nature dangerous to the great purposes for which the constitution was established. It must be a case, moreover, not obscure or doubtful in its construction, but plain and palpable. Lastly, it must be a case not resulting from a partial consideration, or hasty determination, but a case stamped with a final consideration and deliberate adherence. It is not necessary, because the resolution does not require that the question should be discussed how far the exercise of any particular power, ungranted by the constitution, would justify the interposition of the parties to it. As cases might easily be stated, which none would contend ought to fall within that description—cases, on the other hand, might with equal ease be stated, so flagrant and so fatal, as to unite every opinion in placing them within the description.

"But the resolution has done more than guard against misconstruction, by expressly referring to cases of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous nature. It specifies the object of the interposition which it contemplates, to be solely that of arresting the progress of the evil of usurpation, and of maintaining the authorities, rights, and liberties appertaining to the States, as parties to the constitution.

"But it is objected, that the judicial authority is to be regarded as the sole expositor of the constitution, in the last resort; and it may be asked, for what reason the declaration of the General Assembly, supposing it to be theoretically true, could be required at the present day, and in so solemn a manner?

"On this objection, it might be observed, first, that there may be instances of usurped power, which the forms of the constitution would never draw within the control of the judicial department; secondly, that if the decision of the judicial be raised above the authority of the sovereign parties of the constitution, the decisions of the other departments, not carried by the forms of the constitution before the Judiciary, must be equally authoritative and final with the decisions of that department. But the proper answer to the objection is, that the resolution of the General Assembly relates to those great and extraordinary cases, in which all the forms of the constitution may prove ineffectual against infractions dangerous to the essential right of the parties to it. The resolution supposes that dangerous powers, not delegated, may not only be usurped and executed by the other departments, but that the judicial department, also, may exercise or sanction dangerous powers beyond the grant of the constitution; and, consequently, that the ultimate right of the parties to the constitution to judge whether the compact has been dangerously violated, must extend to violations by one delegated authority, as well as by another; by the Judiciary, as well as by the Executive, or the Legislature.

"However true, therefore, it may be, that the judicial department is, in all questions submitted to it by the forms of the constitution, to decide in the last resort, this resort must necessarily be deemed the last in relation to the authorities of the other departments of the Government; not in relation to the rights of the parties to the constitutional compact, from which the judicial, as well as the other departments, hold their delegated trusts. On any other hypothesis, the delegation of judicial power would annul the authority delegating it; and the concurrence of this department with the others in usurped powers, might subvert forever, and beyond the possible reach of any rightful remedy, the very constitution which all were instituted to preserve.

"The truth declared in the resolution being established, the expediency of making the declaration at the present day may safely be left to the temperate consideration and candid judgment of the American public. It will be remembered, that a frequent recurrence to fundamental principles is solemnly enjoined by most of the State constitutions, and particularly by our own, as a necessary safeguard against the danger of degeneracy to which republics are liable, as well as other Governments, although in a less degree than others. And a fair comparison of the political doctrines, not unfrequent at the present day, with those which characterized the epoch of our revolution, and which form the basis of our republican constitutions, will best determine whether the declaratory recurrence here made to those principles ought to be viewed as unreasonable and improper, or as a vigilant discharge of an important duty. The authority of constitutions over Governments, and of the sovereignty of the people over constitutions, are truths which are at all times necessary to be kept in mind; and at no time, perhaps, more necessary than at present."

Mr. M. further read from the proceedings of the Ohio Legislature, in 1820, against the Bank of the United States, to prevent its establishment in that State.

"Resolved, by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That in respect to the powers of the Governments of the several States, which compose the American Union, and the powers of the Federal Government, this General Assembly do recognise and approve the doctrines asserted by the Legislatures of Virginia and Kentucky, in their resolutions of November and December, 1798, and January, 1800; and do consider that their principles have been recognised and adopted by a majority of the American people."

On this subject, the report which precedes the resolution contains the following words:

"The States and the people recognised and affirmed the doctrines of Kentucky and Virginia, by effecting a total change in the administration of the Federal Government. In the pardon of Calender, convicted under the sedition law, and in the remittance of his fine, the new administration unequivocally recognised the decision and the authority of the States and of the people. Thus has the question, whether the federal courts are the sole expositors of the constitution of the United States, in the last resort, or whether the States, "as in all other cases of compact among parties having no common judge," have an equal right to interpret the constitution for themselves, where their sovereign rights are involved, been decided against the pretension of the federal judges, by the people themselves, the true source of legitimate power."

Resolutions against the jurisdiction of the United States court in the case of the Bank, and all cases involving political rights; and against the powers of the General Government, establishing the Bank, in these words:

"Resolved further, That this General Assembly do protest against the doctrines of the federal circuit court, sitting in this State, avowed and maintained in their proceedings against the officers of the State, upon account of their official acts, as being in direct violation of the eleventh amendment of the constitution of the United States.

"Resolved, further, That this General Assembly do protest against the doctrine that the political rights of the separate States that compose the American Union, and their power as sovereign States, may be settled and determined in the Supreme Court of the United States, so as to conclude and bind them in cases contrived between individuals, and who are, no one of them, parties direct."

So in his letter to Judge Johnson, in answer to the argument "that there must be an arbiter somewhere," Mr. Jefferson says, "True; but this does not prove that it must be in either party. The ultimate arbiter is the people, assembled by their deputies in convention. Let them decide to which they mean to give an authority claimed by two of their agencies."

And, again: "With respect to our State and Federal Governments, (says Thomas Jefferson,) I do not think their relations are correctly understood by foreigners. They suppose the former subordinate to the latter. This is not the case. They are co-ordinate departments of one simple and integral whole. But you may ask, if the two departments should claim each the same subject of power, where is the umpire to decide between them? In cases of little urgency or importance, the prudence of both parties will keep them aloof from the questionable ground; but if it can neither be avoided nor compromised, a convention of the State must be called to ascribe the doubtful power to that department which they may think best."

Hear Mr. Jefferson's opinions:

"That the principle and construction contended for by sundry of the State Legislatures, that the General Government is the exclusive judge of the extent of the powers delegated to it, stop nothing short of despotism; since the discretion of those who administer the Government, and not the constitution, would be the measure of their powers.

"That the several States who formed that instrument, being sovereign and independent, have the unquestionable right to judge of its infraction; and that a nullification by those sovereignties of all unauthorized acts done under the color of that instrument, is the rightful remedy."

The Senator from Delaware has gone into an argument to prove that Congress can control the federal courts, if, by corruption or otherwise, they should decide against the Federal Government.

SENATE.]

Revenue Collection Bill.

Mr. CLAYTON here said, he used this argument in reply to the Senator from Kentucky. He referred to the jurisdiction of the inferior courts, but did not intend to say that Congress should, in any event, interpose with the Supreme Court.

Mr. MILLER resumed. He understood the Senator perfectly, he said, and concurred entirely in the position, that Congress could, by its legislation, make the federal courts speak what they please. The question is not, what security the Federal Government has against the bias, the prejudice, or corruption of the federal courts, when they incline to State authority; but what security the States have against their bias or corruption? The point in debate is, where is the conservative principle of State rights? All admit the States to have certain rights. When we inquire, where is their guaranty? our adversaries tell us the Supreme Court; and yet, the Senator from Delaware undertakes to prove, and does prove, that Congress can take care of federal rights against the usurpation or corruption of the federal courts; but he does not tell us who takes care of State rights, when invaded by these tribunals. Those gentlemen who talk about State rights, and yet leave those rights at the mercy of the party having an interest to invade them, remind us of the Indian philosopher, who supposed the globe rested on a terrapin; but when asked what that rested on, not knowing, he could not say.

The authorities adverted to show that South Carolina is not an inventor of the doctrine we now contend for; on the contrary, she has followed in the footsteps of other distinguished members of the Union, in sustaining the true principles of the Jefferson or democratic school. In this faith she has been a constant believer ever since 1798, with but occasional aberrations, not varying more, or vibrating further from this creed, than the magnetic needle from the pole.

How these authorities referred to can be said to exclude the construction put on them by South Carolina, I am at a total loss to conceive. Human language cannot be adapted more precisely to any purpose, than these authorities to the entire support of the South Carolina construction. It surely cannot be contended that the elaborate argument of Mr. Madison was intended only to establish the right of revolution. The Virginia resolutions of 1798 and 1799 establish, as the true theory of our Government the one indicated by Mr. Jefferson in his letter to Mr. Cartwright, and in the Kentucky resolutions. There are no two ways about it; you cannot resolve this vexed question into any thing but what we contend for, or what the old federalists do. So far as the reasoning of the report goes, the States have the right, when they think the compact violated, to put their construction on the constitution, and that, having done so, the Federal Government must rightfully acquiesce in this construction; and, to avoid the inconvenience, they must call a convention of all the States, to settle the question. "The right to fight" is a codification of international law, not predicated on the reasoning or theory recognised in the above authorities. If the principles of Virginia in 1809 underwent an obscuration, as they have been quoted by the Senator from New Jersey, they have been restored by the resolutions of 1828; and, so far as the opinions of that State can go, we have her in 1798 against herself in 1809. When the Senator from New Jersey appeals to Virginia authority, let him abide by the appeal. I cannot say altogether what produced that impression, but the fact is, I always have considered the years of the embargo and non-intercourse covering what may be called the dark era of our history. Hence, I do not give much weight to the Virginia sentiments of 1809, on the subject of the Supreme Court being the proper arbiter. She did not express the sentiments which, through a current of years, at various and repeated times, she has acknowledged as her settled conviction, viz: that the Supreme Court is not the arbiter. At that time, I admit, she was found sleeping at her post, and has suffered her authority fairly to be quoted against the then opinions of Pennsylvania. Having attempted to prove the Supreme Court has no right to notice the tribunals of the State court, and, therefore, that this clause in the ordinance is not a violation of the constitution, I will proceed to consider the test oath clause, as it is called. This has been inveighed against both by the Executive and the honorable gentlemen who have preceded me, in terms of unmerited reproach.

The practice of requiring officers to support the law of the land, whether fundamental or merely legislative, is almost universal. There is not a State in the Union which does not make its citizens, when they take office under the same, swear to support the constitution of the State. The State of South Carolina requires every officer, who takes a commission from her, to swear to support the constitution; it forms a condition precedent to taking office in that State. If the constitution should be altered or changed according to the terms thereof, the supreme power altering the constitution may make it the duty, as well of all in office, as those afterwards appointed, to conform to the universal custom of swearing to support the highest known law, the will of the sovereign in whose employ they are. Without any express requisition in the ordinance to that effect, the oath administered to support the constitution of South Carolina would incorporate, within the sanction thereof, this ordinance, since it is the constitution, abrogating and cancelling every thing in that instrument to the contrary thereof. The objection is a most novel and singular one, that an officer has a right to take or hold office without swearing to sustain the constitution of the State appointing him. It is a most degrading, a most humiliating reflection, to impeach so far the State sovereignties, as not to allow them the scant power of determining on what terms they shall employ and pay their own servants. Here is a great civil contest, founded on adverse views of the theory of our political institutions; and South Carolina does not propose by the sword to decide the question, but by her civil institutions. With a view to counteract the usurpations of the agents of the Federal Government, she arms herself with all her moral strength, and calls into existence the most incontestable powers to sustain what are the disputed ones. One of these most indubitable powers is, to exact obedience of her own citizens to the supreme power of that State, and more particularly to require her public officers to reflect her opinions on the contested questions.

However weak she may be against the General Government, she has the power left her to make those who feed upon her bounty either to leave her service, or fulfil the duties which she enjoins. The exercise of her high sovereign powers to effect this purpose must depend on her will; and she must be the judge of the necessity which forces the resort to powers deemed by others arbitrary. Power must be met by power. We see in the physical system, when one sense is destroyed, nature restores the defect often, by giving a greater perfection to the reserved senses. When one limb is amputated, the other corresponding is always invigorated; hence, in this controversy, if we were to follow the analogies of the providence of Heaven, it would be requisite that the mutilated limbs of our State Government should be compensated, by infusing into the reserved ones great strength and vigor.

The Federal Government usurps the powers of the States, appoints its agents with a view to sustain its usurpation, and yet is loud in complaint that South Carolina will not permit that Government to plough with her heifer; she must consent to repose her strength in the hands of faithless Delilahs, or subject herself to the imputation of tyranny and oppression on her own citizens.

FEB. 11, 1833.]

Revenue Collection Bill.

[SENATE.]

Sir, no Government will consent to wage a war with officers in the interest of the adversary. Could any thing be more stupid than to select, as the champions of a great contest, men openly clamorous against the claims of those selecting them? Suppose an officer to desert his standard, and go over to the enemy; with what grace would the sovereign of the deserting officer receive his application for rations and pay, while he was most strenuously fighting the battles of the opposite side?

Our State officers must elect which party they wish to serve, the Federal or State Government; this oath, in the mildest form, puts that election to incumbents, and requires all after officers to take office subject to the terms annexed to its tenure. He who gives can most unquestionably impose any condition he pleases; if the donee dislikes the condition, let him eschew the gift. No one can serve two masters at the same time. It is not our fault that the common service of the State and Federal Governments has become incompatible on this point. Our officers must decide either to serve God or Mammon; follow their conscience, or conform to the conditions on which they are commissioned and paid. He must be a singular saint who subsists by regular draughts upon Satan for his salary.

I call the attention of the Senate to some sound principles on this subject, to be found in the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts, in the convention of that State, while considering the propriety of establishing a test oath on the subject of religious belief:

"By the fundamental principle of popular and elective Governments, all office is in the free gift of the people. They may grant or they may withhold it at pleasure; and if it be for them, and them only, to decide whether they will grant office, it is for them to decide also on what terms and on what conditions they will grant it. Nothing is more unfounded than the notion that any man has a right to an office. This must depend on the choice of others, and, consequently, upon the opinions of others in relation to his fitness and qualification for office."

Again, sir: let us see whether other States do not touch the conscience of their officers upon as delicate points as the duties enjoined by our constitutional law, the ordinance.

In Vermont, the following oath is exacted of all officers:

"You do solemnly swear (or affirm) that you will be true to the State of Vermont; and that you will not, directly or indirectly, do any act or thing injurious to the constitution or Government thereof, as established by the convention: So help you God."

In this constitution, adopted after the federal constitution, requiring its officers to swear allegiance to the State of Vermont, there is no reservation of paramount allegiance to the United States: it requires the positive and direct allegiance of the officer to the laws of the State in a contest with the federal laws. What would the State of Vermont say, if her officers violated the above oath? Would it not be an impeachable offence? And if they were to impeach and eject them from office, who could interpose? That State goes further; and makes her people, before they exercise their right of suffrage, take the following oath:

"You do solemnly swear (or affirm) that whenever you give your vote or suffrage touching any matter that concerns the State of Vermont, you will do it so as in your conscience you shall judge will most conduce to the best good of the same, as established by the constitution, without fear or favor with any man."

Here is the test oath of Massachusetts:

"I, A. B., do solemnly swear that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the commonwealth of Massachusetts, and will support the constitution thereof: So help me God."

This oath will cover any ordinance or law of that State.

I have always considered the people of this State as a high-minded people, bold in the maintenance of their rights, and not slow to put forth the decision of the State to the primary allegiance of her citizens. When the President of the United States made his requisition on the Governor for calling forth the militia during the late war, the Governor replied, that the militia, by the constitution, could only be called out "to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." That neither of these contingencies had occurred in his opinion; therefore, he would not comply. Here was positive nullification of the act of Congress, giving the President the power to call on the Governors for the militia, when he thought the contingencies had occurred.

I have no fault to find with this act of Governor Strong: he submitted the matter to the judges, and they all decided that the Governor had the right to refuse, if he thought the events had not occurred which could alone support the right to call out the militia. Whatever censure may be cast on that State for her course during the late war, must be for other matters than putting herself on her reserved right to construe the constitution. If she halted and hesitated in her support of the war, that was another matter; since no one can deny but that Congress can declare war; when declared, it is the duty of all good citizens to sustain such war by all constitutional means. Legislative enactments are often required to be supported on oath, by all called on to enforce them, where the vice is a fashionable one, or public opinion discountenances the prosecution, such as gambling and duelling. If the oath is prescribed, State officers cannot be permitted to put themselves upon their reserved rights, and put the law at defiance. A juryman does not swear to convict the defendant, as is supposed to be the case, and strongly stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. DALLAS;] he only swears to execute a particular law, or find a verdict according to law and evidence—not a very unreasonable requirement, I submit, since it would subvert all justice, if he were not to do so, without swearing; and a juryman who would not consent to find a verdict upon such premises, ought not to be the agent of the law. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALLAS] says he admits the United States Government is a league among several States, and asks the question, triumphantly, "Who ever heard, that, among independent nations, a league had been broken with impunity?" True, no person ever heard the right of one party to break a league existing, without the right of the other party to raise a question as to the propriety of doing so.

In reply, I will ask, suppose the league broken, no matter how wantonly, who ever heard the citizens of the infracting party putting themselves on the league against the act of their Government?

Take the case of the French treaty of amity and commerce, made with a Government that gave us help in time of need; nourished and supported us when we were in our aurelian state. We nullified that treaty by an act of Congress, in 1798. Did our citizens have a right to inquire whether this was properly done or not? Would our judges put themselves on the treaty, and say, "As two parties made the treaty, two parties must agree to rescind before the rescision is good? The Senator from Kentucky has routed that argument fully, in the able view he has presented. Take the case of Maine: we have had a dispute with Great Britain about the boundary; we referred the matter to the King of the Netherlands, who made an award which we had not confirmed. Will any one contend that our judges can determine a right by considering that treaty? Upon a writ of ejectment, suppose the line established by the award should be set up to divest the jurisdiction of the court; would the court consider the treaty as confirmed, and the line established? Will they inquire whether the award was made in pursuance of the submission? I will put a still stronger case to test this question of primary allegiance, impaired by external obligations. We have a treaty with Spain, by which, for valuable consideration, we agreed to pay our own citizens five millions of dollars. In good faith, we must perform this treaty; having the money in the treasury, it is our duty to pay it to those to whom Spain was bound to pay it. Now, suppose we do not pay it; is this ipso facto a recognition of war existing between us and Spain? No, it is ground of complaint; and if Spain, in the chivalry of the days of her Castilian honor, chose to declare war, because we faithlessly keep our own citizens out of the money due them, what would be the consequence of such a war upon the very persons injured by the omission of this Government to fulfil the treaty? Sir, they would have to draw the sword, and maintain the rights of this Government, in such a war. If a citizen who is injured by his Government must sustain it, how much more ought one who is fed, and clothed, and pampered by its bounty? This idea of the conscience of an officer of Government releasing him from the obligations due to the Government, is a sublime refinement in political morality. If tolerated, it would make the Government not only contemptible in the opinion of the world, but would supersede the Government itself, and set its officers above it. The States having the power only by their reserved rights to appoint officers, if these officers are paramount to the fundamental law, they are the State Government, and the people should have nothing more to do with it.

The Senator from New Jersey, in strains of lugubrious eloquence, pitied the Union party in South Carolina. They were proscribed, and, by one fell swoop, driven from office. How is the fact? The State, in a great effort to throw off a burden equally cumbrous to both parties, (except the agents of the manufacturers,) by the exercise of her reserved rights, makes all her officers swear to support her constitution and fundamental laws. Yet this every-day custom, deeply engrafted into the municipal regulations of every State, is considered shocking to every moral sense. In South Carolina, every revenue officer suspected of favoring State laws was removed. The gallant Laval, disabled in the service of his country, whose limbs were shattered by the cannon of the enemy, was proscribed and turned out.

W. E. Hayne, the only son of Col. Hayne, of revolutionary memory, was dismissed—every other one, including patriots of the revolution—to make way for more trustworthy agents. You hear from us not a whisper of complaint. If the President has the power under the constitution, that is all we consider.

Under our State constitution, the Governor is required to see the laws faithfully executed; but such a power was never supposed to authorize removals from office. We are a people jealous of power, and watchful of our liberty. We require the common pledge of every Government on earth, that the agents of the Government shall sustain it or be substituted.

No one regrets more than I do the necessity which forces this recurrence to first principles. We have proscribed no man for opinion's sake. We desire to turn no one of our citizens out of office. All we ask is, that they will, in obedience to the will of those whom they serve, not lend their official sanction to the collection of unconstitutional tribute—yes, admitted to be so, by nine-tenths of the very incumbents subject to the provisions of this ordinance; and, trusting to the justice and liberal spirit of this Government, all incumbents are exempted from taking this oath, until all hope of the repeal of the tax is exhausted.

Sir, I am willing to meet the Senator on the golden rule of "do unto others as we would they should do unto us." I can join him in the appeal to Heaven—

"Teach me to feel another's woe,
To hide the faults I see;
That mercy I to others show,
That mercy show to me."

We believe the tariff a violation of the constitution. The charity of the Senator will, I am sure, induce him to believe me when I say so.

We have sworn to support the constitution of the United States, as well as that of our own State, both of which oaths enjoin us to war with this protective system. Our allegiance to the federal constitution—our allegiance to our own constitution, religion and law, make it our duty to obey the ordinance; and yet the Senator, with a Shylock grip upon the constitution, proposes to burn our houses, lay waste our fields, make widows of our wives, and orphans of our children.

We put our citizens to the election of surrendering office or of supporting our law. He presents to our citizens the alternative of giving up their sense of duty or their lives.

With a horrible reverence for the supremacy of the laws of Congress, we are doomed by the Senator not only to lose office, but liberty, property, and life, or bow down and worship the image which presumptuous rulers have erected in the plains of Dura.

Sir, when the Senator from New Jersey marches his troops upon a peaceable law-abiding people, I trust he will not profane the banner—the star-spangled banner—on which South Carolina shines in history as bright as any one of the galaxy.

Let him substitute the Asiatic vulture for the American eagle; the sun for the stars. Let him erase the motto e pluribus unum, and inscribe parcere subjectis et debellare superbos. Let the nullification stripe, the emblem of State sovereignty, disappear, and the crimson sheet float in the breeze over his invading army.

I will not believe some of the sentiments of the Senator were duly considered; being himself without fear and without reproach, he has taken too severe a view of the rights of this Government. He has not made any allowance for the errors, if he will have them so, of a warm-hearted, generous, and brave people, struggling for the liberty bequeathed to them.

The last clause, the subject of secession, has been misunderstood by some, and misrepresented by others. The constitutionality of secession, or whether it shall be peaceable or not, is not involved in the principles laid down. It is predicated on the assumption of a belligerent posture by the Federal Government towards South Carolina. It is not true that any attempt on the part of the General Government to enforce the revenue law is made the condition upon which the secession shall take place. The exception is a very broad one—any attempt, [except by the "civil institutions" of the country. This most material qualification has been left out by the President, when adverting to this subject in the proclamation. The Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILKINS,] when reading the ordinance, and commenting on it, stopped in the middle of the sentence, and left out this material condition and qualification of the right of the Federal Government to enforce the tariff laws also. In the report of the speech of the Senator, I see I am made to ask the reading of the latter part of the sentence, and the condition is put in as if read by the Senator, before I asked the further reading. Now, the fact is, the Senator read the clause up to the words "null and void," and there stopped, when I requested him to read on the following words, "otherwise than by the civil institutions of the country." I am certain the honorable Senator did not intend to make an impression different from what he considered the fair inference from the clause: he adverted to it merely to correct the report. He had been misunderstood upon another matter by the reporters: when he explained the meaning of the word traverse, he believed the Senate had fully comprehended his explanations; but for fear they did not, he would merely say, that he understood the word traverse, in the act referred to, as meaning a right arbitrarily to postpone the trial—the first court, without cause shown, in denying the right to traverse, the right to plead not guilty, to continue, upon affidavit or good cause, were not denied; it was, in criminal proceedings, analogous to an imparlance in civil.

But to return. This latter clause is considered another violation of the constitution of the United States. It is only the declaration of a purpose, and not the execution of one. There is nothing to be considered but the abstractions contained therein. He said, upon the general right to secede, he would only state what his opinions were; the convention of South Carolina would determine for themselves. He did not think, as a political principle, the Federal Government could recognise this right, simply because no Government, unless it is so agreed upon in its constitution, can recognise that which may lead to its own dissolution. Social compacts, from their nature, imply a perpetuity; political compacts, such as our federal system, do so likewise. The constitution contains stipulations of a binding character to associate, but none to secede. Even admitting the most indubitable and extensive sovereignty to be recognised as belonging to the States, still the Federal Government could not admit the right of the States to secede. Yet if a State shall be constrained under any circumstances, which I trust may never occur, to discuss this question, whether the circumstances upon which she places her rights will justify her, must of course be for her consideration, not mine. I can scarcely conceive of a state of facts in which secession would not follow a state of things making it immaterial to inquire whether it is peaceable or revolutionary. There are many things which Government cannot formally admit, which necessity forces it to acquiesce in; thus, for instance, the absolute unqualified right to emigrate cannot be admitted by Government, since the admission of this right might operate exceedingly harsh on the residue of the community, if pushed to extremity; although the Government may have the right to guard against its own dissolution, or an unjust withdrawal of individuals from the common burdens, yet, still, this would be an arbitrary power, and must be resorted to only in the very last resort. To arrest a citizen and confine him, because he proposes to emigrate, would in most cases involve the Government in more trouble and expense than the detention would compensate for. A father cannot admit the right of a daughter to marry without his consent; yet, if she does marry, he must submit, and make the most of the new relationship of his child. So of suicide: no Government can admit the right of any one to take his own life; yet, if he will destroy himself, you cannot punish him.

I consider that a State has the same right to secede that a citizen has to emigrate. It is, in fact, only a different mode of doing the same thing. Every citizen of a State may emigrate, and thus destroy the State; in that event, the United States could not take possession of the soil. The Federal Government cannot, in the abstract, admit of secession; nor can a State admit in the abstract the right of emigration, unless covenanted for, as in Connecticut. Yet if a State will secede, and a citizen will emigrate, there is no way to prevent them, but by the exercise of such arbitrary power, as will shock the moral sense of a people accustomed to live in a free Government. To make war on a State to keep her in the Union, would be but the extension of the right of hanging a man to prevent his emigration. The States must keep their citizens by wise and liberal policy, wholesome and benevolent laws; and the United States must keep the States from seceding in the same way. The use of force may show the tyrant, but cannot prevent the act.

After all, this ordinance can be considered only in the nature of a lease entry, and ouster, to try title with the manufacturers.

I have thus attempted to prove that our ordinance does not, in any one instance, violate the constitution of the United States.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [MR. DALLAS] has urged many other constitutional objections to this ordinance. It violates the right of impartial trial by jury, he says. This I have already noticed, to show with what facility restraints introduced in the amendments to the federal constitution are made to apply to the States, when they were intended only to apply to the Federal Government.

The provision in our own constitution is, that the trial by jury shall be had as heretofore, referring to existing laws. There is nothing in existing laws which would prevent the Legislature even extending the right of a jury to find a general verdict according to the law as well as the facts. The true answer is, the constitution of the United States does not have any bearing on this subject, and the State constitution can be altered by the act of the convention. Our constitution provides two ways for amendments: one is by the concurrence of two-thirds of two succeeding Legislatures. It provides for the calling of a convention by two-thirds of one Legislature. It has not said they shall have the power to alter the constitution; that was not thought necessary. Its framers understood too well the theory of our popular Government to instruct the sovereigns, when they should be assembled, what they should do. The Senator [MR. DALLAS] had, throughout his whole argument, shown that he took his meridian from the central Government. He has shown that former professional bias followed him; he could only look at one side of this subject, and that was the side of the Federal Government. When he admitted the analogy between our political system and the solar one, he said consolidation and confederation were the attractive and repulsive principles which kept the planets in their orbits. The whole fallacy or opposite argument is embraced in this illustration. The gentleman's opposite qualities consist in the compound of two central tendencies. His meat is ham and bacon; his drink is wine and the juice of the grape. If he will permit, I will furnish him with the true combination, which will sustain the perpetual revolution of our orbits around the central Government. It is consolidation and nullification; one is the centripetal, the other the centrifugal tendency. We have been told by the Senator [MR. DALLAS] of the two knights who quarreled about the color of silk; one maintained that it was white, the other black; and they grew so warm, that they were about to proceed to the ultima ratio, when the hermit interposed, and showed them they were both right and both wrong; that it was changeable silk, and both colors were reflected. Now for the point and moral in the fable: will the Senator tell us which knight ought to have surrendered his opinion, if the hermit had not interposed? That is the question. Ought they not to have consented that each should peaceably maintain his own opinion? Would the Senator have either chevalier to give up that he was wrong, as a concession to the opposite party?

Again: I will illustrate my opinion by stating a plain proposition. A and B agree together that B shall build a house for A, for so much money, say ten thousand dollars, of the best materials; with a covenant that if a dispute arose about the quality of the materials, the matter should be left to C; and further, if any variations were made in the plan, B should be compensated pro rata the specified agreement; but no one is appointed to settle, in the latter case, a contested point. Well, B proposes to put up inferior materials; A objects. The casus fœderis has occurred; yet will it be contended, in the case where the referee was to settle the matter, that B should summon the workmen, and put up the inferior materials by force? This would be the case of the present bill. You do not propose to let your referee decide the matter, but propose, in the first instance, to apply force.

Again: Suppose a question arises on the latter part of the agreement, where no umpire is appointed; has C any right to thrust himself in, to decide the casus omnisus?

Mr. M. said, the chairman [Mr. WILKINS] had referred to his vote on the bill in 1818, to increase the duty on hammered or unrolled iron; he had the printed speech before him, and should proceed to correct some of the facts, and explain others. Every thing he had to remark on this subject should be done with the most perfect respect for the Senator from Pennsylvania, whom he regarded as benevolent and liberal in his opinions. The charge of inconsistency had been heretofore made on him for the same vote. He did not admit the fact that there was any foundation for the charge; but, suppose there was, upon what principle could it be contended, that a politician had not a right to change his opinion? When God made man, he at first pronounced him good; afterwards he changed his opinion, and pronounced him evil. Was St. Paul less worthy as a christian, because he at first persecuted the followers of Christ? We prove ourselves rational beings, fulfilling our moral destiny, when we surrender wrong opinions, and close with the right ones; none could expect to reach heaven, but by changing his opinions. The Senator does not regard the vote given by me in 1818 as wrong; no, he acknowledges that I rendered his State a service. I should have lived to little purpose, if, in the last sixteen years, I had not changed my opinions on many subjects. The past opinions of a politician are matters of history; his present are those the public have a right to inquire after. No lawyer ever quotes the cast-off opinions of the judge, with any prospect of success, against well-considered subsequent ones; the principal virtue in consistency is to be always right, not always wrong. The Senator from Maine had read us a homily on his consistency, and the inconsistency of all others. He thanks his stars that he is not like other men. It is not my purpose to sit in judgment on the inconsistency of the Senator from Maine. I believe he always does what he thinks right, and from the most liberal sentiments. We have nothing to do with motives, if men act correctly. Yet still one may seem very good, when he is very bad; perjury may be committed by swearing to the truth, and a politician may be inconsistent the most when most consistent he seems, at one time acting pro honore, at another causâ lucri. I should not have noticed the pleasantries of the Senator, in commendation of his own consistency, but for the purpose of complimenting his argument, and replying to his wit. We had been told the fact, that the late dormant partner of the firm of the Senators from Tennessee and Maine had gone over to the nullifiers. It would be seen that, thus far, the Senator recognises the right of secession. If the fact be true, as stated, that the nullifiers have received this accession, it is evidence that their cause is not without hope. Old fashions, in the progress of time, are resumed. It is a long lane that has no turn. It is well known that this old gentleman has an instinct for the majority as strong as any one on this floor, not excepting either the Senator from Maine, or from Tennessee.

[Mr. HOLMES here asked leave to explain, but Mr. M. said, pleasantly, he must be excused for refusing; the Senator was so skilful in explanations, he would rather they should come in their due season.] But, to the question—my vote in 1818. The printed speech is so erroneous, I must content myself with stating what were the facts, all of which will appear by the journal now before me. I was not in Congress in 1816, when the tariff was passed. On the proposition to increase the duty on hammered iron, in 1818, it appeared, in the course of debate, and the facts are verified by the journal, that the duty on this article was reported, in the general adjustment of the duties to the exigencies of the country, by the Committee of Ways and Means, (Mr. Lowndes, chairman,) in 1816, at seventy-five cents per cwt. on unrolled iron or hammered iron. Upon the passage of the bill some person, over anxious for iron, moved to increase the duty on this unrolled iron much higher; upon which the House, in one of those freaks which often occur, punished the mover by striking the duty down to forty-five cents; the application was, in 1818, to restore the rate proposed in 1816, as establishing the just proportion between this and other articles. Sir, with the most perfect sense of justice and disinterestedness, I voted to do, in 1818, what seemed to be the opinion of many ought to have been done in 1816. I had no desire to see the iron interest depressed below all others; neither myself, nor any of my constituents, had any interests in the manufacture of this article. I gave a liberal and independent vote in aid of the old commonwealth of Pennsylvania, raising the duty from forty cents per cwt. to seventy-five cents. It will be remarked, that iron was selling from five to seven dollars per cwt., which would resolve the specific duty into an ad valorem duty of about sixteen per cent. The country was then just out of a war, with more than one hundred millions of debt to pay. Our staple (cotton) at the South selling from twenty to twenty-five cents. I took the act of 1816 as the basis of revenue. What protection it might afford as incidental, I was very willing should be extended. During the same session, it will be recollected, the act to extend the time when cotton goods should come down to twenty per cent. was passed; against this I voted, in a very small minority. I voted, also, to reduce the duty on salt, setting myself against breaking in upon the arrangement made for revenue, and the gradual letting down the manufactures of cotton to the revenue point. Take up the act of 1816 and the act of 1832, and the most marked difference will be seen. In 1816, all the unprotected articles were subjected to duties, averaging pretty fairly with the protected ones. Take the duties of 1816 as the basis, and let the ten millions for the sinking fund be dispensed with, and reduce the duties protected, and I will give my hearty assent to such a bill now. But let us see what this same hammered iron was fixed at in 1832; ninety cents per cwt. It is now contended, says the Senator from Pennsylvania, "that a duty of eighteen dollars upon the same article, two dollars below his own proposition, as fixed by the tariff of 1832, is so onerous, oppressive, and tyrannical, that the whole country is to be involved in civil war." I cannot perceive how seventy-five cents per cwt. can be made more than ninety cents per cwt.; there are great mistakes in the gentleman's figures.

In 1818, we have seen, the change of the specific duty into an ad valorem duty, would have been about sixteen per cent.; the change of the specific duty, in 1832, into an ad valorem duty, would amount to about eighty per cent., or one hundred per cent. Now, the strange inconsistency consists in the voting for a duty equal to sixteen per cent. ad valorem on hammered iron, in 1816, and refusing to vote for a duty of one hundred per cent. in 1832 on this article.

Now, upon this statement, which gives the whole truth, what do the facts amount to? In 1818, when we were in debt one hundred millions, or more, with our staple prosperous beyond all example, I voted against breaking into the arrangement made, to give three years to the cotton manufactures to come down, and to place iron where the act of 1816 ought to have placed it, thereby establishing an ad valorem duty of about sixteen per cent.; and because I oppose, as an outrageous infraction upon every provision of the bill of 1816, the act of 1832, wherein iron is established at an ad valorem duty of eighty or one hundred per cent., it said I am inconsistent. Now, if there be any virtue in consistency, in resistance to the protective system, I think, upon the facts, I am entitled to the benefit; and there is a total failure to establish the strange inconsistency. I have been thus particular, because the report made of the Senator's speech has not stated the case on the record correctly; nor would I have cause to wince in this matter, if inconsistency were a crime.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILKINS] has said the laws of South Carolina were harsh beyond any thing in feudal times. The Senator will find, by recurring to feudal history, much harsher proceedings than any thing in our law. He might have found the trial for witchcraft, where the prisoner was tried by throwing her into the water; if she sunk or drowned, she was innocent; if she floated, she was hung for her sorcery. This was much harsher than any thing in our laws, but not more so than the present bill. A citizen of South Carolina, between the conflicting claims of two Governments, stands no chance to escape. If he take sides with the State, he is to be punished by the Federal Government; if he join the federal party, the State will punish.

Sir, the proceedings by which the Pope was ousted of municipal jurisdiction bore a strong resemblance to our proceedings, but they were much harsher. The papal authority began to extend itself rapidly in the municipal regulations of England, when it became necessary to confine it to ecclesiastical affairs. He had compelled a cowardly and degenerate monarch to surrender his crown, and then leased it back to him at so many marks. When a king of more character mounted the throne, he checked these usurpations and intrusions of a foreign potentate into his territorial kingdom, by making his subjects to swear not to take leases from the Pope; and, finally, by withdrawing the protection of the law from all who had any communication with the Pope in temporal matters. This checked the evil, and was the foundation of the famous bills of premunire, by which the English people were relieved from tribute to the Pope, by the nullification of Peter's pence.

The President, in his proclamation, makes a charge against the leaders in South Carolina. Let me say, the President has had as much agency as any one man in establishing the present politics of that State. He was considered a politician of the republican Jeffersonian order. The Jeffersonian doctrine covers all sort of nullification. When the people of South Carolina began to discuss the remedy for usurpations of the Federal Government, they may be said to have been divided into three classes: one class believed that nullification was not only the true theory of the Government, but that the Federal Government would admit it to be so, so far as to call a convention, or effect a reform; a second class, which believed that nullification was consistent with the theory of the Government, but were doubtful whether the Federal Government would consent to a convention, or any thing else but a direct enforcement of the law; and a third class believed it a downright positive heresy, not to be countenanced in any form; this was the state of parties when the President came into power. The Georgia controversy, which was about being brought to a crisis by the late President, received, throughout, the support of the Executive. In a reply to the call made concerning the execution of the Indian intercourse law, made in 1831, the President says "he has no power, under the constitution, to prevent the State of Georgia from extending her jurisdiction over the Indian land within her limits." "To maintain the contrary doctrine, and to require the President to enforce it by employment of military force, would be to place in his hands a power to make war upon the rights of the States, and the liberties of the country—a power which should be placed in the hands of no individual."

In the face of a writ of error, Georgia hung Tassels; thus treating with contempt the process of the Supreme Court, and taking the life of a human being in despite of the alleged supremacy of that court. This act of State rights remained unrebuked by the Chief Magistrate, and the Supreme Court never instituted any proceeding to maintain the dignity of their process. Again: the Supreme Court pronounced a decree in favor of certain missionaries, who, in violation of the laws of Georgia, took protection under federal laws. When a solemn and final decision was pronounced, and Georgia refused to obey the decree of that court, no reproof for her refractory spirit was heard; on the contrary, a learned review of the decision came out, attributed to Executive countenance and favor. This was not all. After the adjournment of Congress, and the question coming up before the people, what shall be done? no one scarcely, who considered the States as having any rights, thought the last tariff any improvement of the agricultural situation of the South; the remedy was pressed again, with the bank veto version of the constitution, which the Senator from Massachusetts understood as the people of South Carolina did, when, in his Worcester speech, he said, any one that could put two ideas together could make it nothing more than nullification in its most enlarged, and, as he thought, disastrous form. The President, in that veto message, laid down the correct principles of our Government, when he said each co-ordinate branch must answer for itself, and its own reading of the constitution. Now, as the States are a co-ordinate branch of our political Government, acknowledged by all to have some rights, the position that each swore to support the constitution as understood by themselves would extend to the State authorities, and they would have the right to expound the constitution as they understood it. Hence the President, who was the medium alone through which any force could reach South Carolina, not only furnished his opinions of the right of a State to resist the decree of the Supreme Court, but had given it as his opinion that the States, as co-ordinates, might, according to their oaths, expound the federal constitution. The most timid and wavering disciple of the Jeffersonian creed could scarcely hesitate, when such was the source through which all the force could reach them.

Under these auspices, the canvass was carried on last summer for a convention to nullify. This required two-thirds of both Houses; one-half of the Senate were in, only one-half to elect. Sixteen Senators would prevent a convention, and the contest was close in some of the districts. I hazard nothing in saying, if the President had published his opinion of the duty he should feel under to enforce the decree of the Supreme Court last summer, instead of permitting an inference to be deduced that he would not, no convention or nullification would be in force in South Carolina at this time; a different issue would have been tendered. Georgia, in her contest, was a great way ahead; she was thought to be the pioneer in the cause of State rights. Sir, I shall say nothing as to the motive from which her position has been changed, nor the means used to effect it. My object is to show that we followed the President's theoretical opinion, and his practical one also, up to the issuing of the proclamation. Here, for the first time, after every step had been taken by South Carolina, comes the President's exposition of his opinions, calling upon the people to recant their proceedings, retrace their steps, and snatch from their archives this disorganizing edict.

I do not deem it proper to impeach the motives of the President. When a public functionary must act, he is not a volunteer; nor can he escape from the responsibility of censure from some quarter; common justice and charity require that we should attribute correct motives, and a desire to escape from his position, by doing what is right. But it is very clear that the President had no legal right to issue this proclamation as an official act. Had his opinions, heretofore expressed, been consonant with it, it would, under no circumstances, have been necessary. It is a principle of equity, that when one is silent, and rights spring up under that silence which it would be unjust to take away, the party who ought to have spoken is not afterwards to set up his rights. Sir, so far as the President is concerned, the principles in that paper are not only ex post facto, but subversive of the constitution and the various expositions given thereof by himself, and should have prevented the President from denouncing his followers, in the paper, for the first time furnishing the proof that he had abandoned his own principles. He should have spared his followers of the school of Jefferson from reproach and charge of intended disunion. I regret, therefore, that in the discharge of his public duty, as understood by himself, he should have found it necessary to speak in such harsh terms of the leaders, as he has designated certain individuals, as well as the measures adopted by the people.

The fact is, that in every stage of this controversy, the United States have done the first wrong; they first passed the unconstitutional tariff, when it was proposed to try the validity of that matter judicially. As we are now in the federal court, the Senator from Pennsylvania will permit us to take advantage of the right to an impartial jury trial; but the man, who, as early as 1820, I believe, at a town meeting in Charleston, stood alone the advocate of the tariff as a constitutional as well as a political measure, was the judge. He was committed in advance upon the trial. This same judge refused to let it be given in evidence what the bond was given for, under the plea of non est factum, against the established rule that you may show any thing under the general issue, which, if true, would make the bond void. Now, if the bond was given for a tax which the Government had no right to impose, it was clearly void. This was a question of fact. What was the consideration of the bond? The political security reserved by the jury trial against the encroachment and usurpations of Government were entrenched upon. Suppose a special plea put in, and demurrer and rejoinder, the court could not have seen on the record that the tariff was to protect the manufacturers.

The Senator from New Jersey says, they have always been ready to recite that the tax was levied for protection; this title was refused expressly in 1828 and 1832.

I believe it could be well established that the military preparations on the part of the United States preceded the precautionary suggestions made by the Governor of South Carolina in his message.

The act of the Legislature authorizing the Governor to call out the militia is bottomed upon the concentration and use of the military force of the United States, to coerce submission of our judicial officers to the collector. But the Senator from Pennsylvania says, we have violated the constitution in keeping a standing army. Not so. We have no military force embodied except a municipal guard in Charleston, authorized and kept up ever since the insurrectionary movement of Denmark Vozey, in 1821 or 1822. Yet the Federal Government has now a large naval and military force in or near Charleston, and that fair city is in daily peril of being assailed as the citadel of a common enemy; the houses burnt, and the town sacked by the regular army; friend and foe involved in one common fate, and subject to the common ruin of regular war.

Mr. M. said he had been desirous of noticing some of the most exceptionable doctrines contained in the proclamation. His health and time would not permit him to notice them. They were so numerous, and the medium through which our proceedings had been reflected so distorted, that it required much time to correct and refute them; he would notice one or two as a specimen—a question of law, and a criticism on the late Governor's message. The President had said that the posse comitatus could not be considered a peaceable remedy, and had given a history of the early character of this branch of the common law, to prove that it was military in its character, and repudiates it as the offspring of a barbarous and feudal time. It was necessary to stamp the character of the sheriff's power with the military character, before a resort could be had to the military power on the other side. This right of the sheriff is essentially civil in its nature, and, without it, the most disastrous results must ensue in the execution of the State laws. It consists simply in the power of the sheriff to make deputies at his will; every person summoned to assist the sheriff is a peace officer. I will state a case or two illustrative of the character and necessity of this power. A gentleman of some property and credit was about to emigrate, whilst he had a note outstanding; and the creditor not being willing to permit him to leave the country without security, sued out a writ of ne exeat; the man being somewhat surprised at the arrest and suit before the note was due, consented to go to jail or with the sheriff reluctantly, and, after getting some distance, he got off his horse and said he would not resist him, but he would lie down, and the sheriff must literally carry him, or he would not go. How was the sheriff to act under these circumstances? The old common law has told him that he must gather deputies enough to take peaceably the debtor to jail; this, of course, he did; since, if he had let him go, he would have been chargeable with the debt. This would have been as barbarous as to call upon bystanders to help him peaceably to do his duty.

Now, what does the opposite party propose as a substitute for the posse? It is powder and ball. They would say to the sheriff when his prisoner refused to proceed further, Draw your pistol, put it to his temple and blow out his brains. Without the posse, this must be the result.

Again: A man is convicted of murder. On the day of execution, he had procured arms; and when the sheriff went to bring him out for execution, he presented his arms, and put the sheriff at defiance. How was the sheriff to act? Not kill in turn. No, assemble the posse, which he did; deluged his insurgent prisoner with water until he destroyed his powder, and then they proceeded and carried him peaceably to the gallows. It would be murder in the sheriff to kill, except to save his own life. He must use the peaceable means provided, time out of mind, to execute the law. There is no military quality about it. The law has furnished the sheriff and posse for the judge, not the Executive, to carry into effect his judgments.

"The State might have proposed the call for a general convention to the other States; and Congress, if a sufficient number of them concurred, must have called it. But the first magistrate of South Carolina, when he expressed a hope that, 'on a review by Congress, and the functionaries of the General Government, of the merits of the controversy,' such a convention will be accorded to them, must have known that neither Congress nor any functionary of the General Government has authority to call such a convention, unless it be demanded by two-thirds of the States. This suggestion, then, is another instance of the reckless inattention to the provisions of the constitution with which this crisis has been madly hurried on; or of the attempt to persuade the people that a constitutional remedy had been sought and refused. If the Legislature of South Carolina 'anxiously desire' a general convention to consider their complaints, why have they not made application for it in the way the constitution points out? The assertion that they 'earnestly seek it,' is completely negatived by the omission."

The President here supposes that the late Governor was so ignorant of the constitution, that he did not know who were to call a convention; and, from want of correctness in one particular, he infers similar errors in hastening the crisis. Now, who are the functionaries referred to? He does not mean Congress; if he had, he would not have repeated the same idea. What is a functionary? That which performs an office or duty. Now, are not the State Governments the functionaries of the General Government, so far as to call a convention to amend the constitution? They are the agents for that purpose. It seems the Legislature has, in conformity with the suggestion of the late Governor, performed its functions so far as to ask for a convention.

Again: "At this annual period of our assembling, it becomes us to review the occurrences of the last year, connected with our domestic concerns, if not with a minute scrutiny, at least with a sentiment of fervent gratitude to the Great Disposer of human events. These tributes of our grateful acknowledgment are due for the various and multiplied blessings He has been pleased to bestow upon our people. Abundant harvests in every quarter of our State have crowned the exertions of our agricultural labors; health, almost beyond former precedent, has blessed our homes, as yet undisturbed by the frightful ravages of that new and terrible pestilence which has elsewhere made such portentous havoc in a large portion of the human family. Nor have we less reason for thankfulness in surveying our social condition. If a political excitement, connected with the public liberty of the country, has stimulated the public mind to a degree of fervor and vigor beyond all former example, this very excitement has furnished the consoling exponent of our fitness for the enjoyment of this inestimable blessing; for, in spite of a painful exasperation of public feeling, social order has been preserved, and the majesty of the law has been supreme."

This is a quotation from the Governor's message, upon which the following strong inference of great exaggerations of the evils of the tariff system, here, is the commentary:

"That this system, thus pursued, has resulted in no such oppression upon South Carolina, needs no other proof than the solemn and official declaration of the late Chief Magistrate of that State in his address to the Legislature. In that he says, that 'the occurrences of the past year, in connexion with our domestic concerns, are to be reviewed with a sentiment of fervent gratitude to the Great Disposer of human events; that tributes of grateful acknowledgment are due for the various and multiplied blessings he has been pleased to bestow on our people; that abundant harvests in every quarter of the State have crowned the exertions of agricultural labor; that health, almost beyond former precedent, has blessed our homes; and that there is not less reason for thankfulness in surveying our social condition.' It would, indeed, be difficult to imagine oppression, where, in the social condition of a people, there was equal cause of thankfulness as for abundant harvests, and varied and multiplied blessings with which a kind Providence had favored them."

I submit whether judgment could fairly be entered up against South Carolina, upon the admission of the Governor.

There is certainly ground to complain that, when our words are brought up in judgment against us, we are not permitted to be heard through the whole sentence. This quotation of the Governor's message would make us contending for our extreme rights as mere amateurs. Sir, there were points of controversy between these two public officers and the two Governments, of more moment than to raise a question whether we had a right to thank God for his mercies, and congratulate ourselves as a social people that our throats were not yet cut, except upon the condition that judgment should be entered upon this confession, that we were in a most prosperous condition, and mere amateur malcontents.

Mr. President, there are three propositions presented for the grave consideration of this body, springing out of the position of South Carolina, or rather three remedies proposed: the 1st, To adjust the taxes fairly, and modify the tariff with this view. 2d, To call a convention. 3d, To declare war. The latter seemed to be the favorite alternative.

I had intended to comment on the provisions of this bill, but I will content myself by simply stating the positions. Other gentlemen have discussed them. I will only remark that the precedents referred to are laws requiring the use of force without the body of any State, and which in one instance the President refused to enter, because it was at war with the rights of the State and the first principles of liberty; I mean the Indian intercourse law in the case of Georgia.

The bill is unconstitutional, because it confers the war power on the President.—1st and 8th section of the constitution.

It subjects a citizen to punishment when he has been guilty of no crime, by seizing his property, and compelling him to pay cash duties.—5th article of amendment.

It violates the rights of the people of the State, so far as to give a preference to other ports.—9th section.

It deprives the citizens of South Carolina of the same rights as citizens of other States.—5th section.

It places the military of the United States above the civil authority of a State.

It confers on the President legislative powers to shut up the port of Charleston.

It gives federal courts jurisdiction of cases which do not arise under the laws and constitution.—2d section, 3d article.

It subjects, without trial or process of law, citizens to be arrested and deprived of their liberty.

It punishes the freedom of speech and of the press.

It authorizes the President to consider the Legislature of a State as a mob, and, by issuing his proclamation, to disperse them by force.

It imposes cruel and unjust fines, and indirectly forfeits the office of State officers, who must obey their own laws, or be disfranchised.

It substitutes armed force for the judicial tribunals of the country. It makes a district court an appellate court over the State courts, as to habeas corpus.

It compels persons to prosecute suits in the federal courts, where the court must only nonsuit the party for want of jurisdiction, or take jurisdiction upon the suggestion of a defendant not warranted by law; thereby making the jurisdiction of the court to depend on the error or wickedness of all defendants.

I have attempted to prove that a State has a right to judge in the last resort of a violation of the constitution; that the proceedings of the State of South Carolina violate no provision of the constitution; that the means resorted to to protect her reserved rights are for her judgment alone; that, strong as they appear, they are warranted by the usurpations of this Government; that the questions presented to the descendants of a glorious ancestry, are liberty or slavery; the constitution with the Union, or the Union without a constitution; that we do not propose to secede, except this Government treats us as a public enemy, and drives us to the necessity of choosing between the halter and the bayonet; that you have the physical right, not the moral one, to pass the bill now under consideration; that it is the assertion of your rights by force against an organized Government, and is therefore war; that, in utter contempt of the fundamental principles of the Government, in derogation of the theory of federalism itself, you substitute force for law, the sword for the ermine; that the sacred principles of justice require you to reduce the taxes, and relieve a patriotic and a suffering people from poverty and oppression.

Knowing as I do (and which is too well attested by the events of the day for any honorable Senator to be ignorant of) that a deep and settled sense of discontent pervades the great mass of the people of South Carolina; that the sober, calm, patriotic population of Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, revolt at this system of protection, as an invasion of their constitutional rights, I cannot help expressing a deep solicitude that this bill, in its present offensive form, may not receive the sanction of the present Congress.

I shall not run any parallel between this controversy and the revolutionary struggle. The doctrine upon which we rest our rights do not involve such principles. Sir, I regret that suspicions of the personal hatred of the President towards the people of South Carolina should, in the opinion of her public authorities, have rendered it necessary to arm in protection of their personal rights, as well as in defence of their fundamental laws.

Sir, placing myself in a purely selfish position, there is no honorable Senator who has higher motives to preserve the peace and good order of society. I have nothing to gain, every thing to lose by civil commotion.

If the first clause of this bill is retained and passed, I have substantial, well-grounded fears of the consequences. The exception in the last clause in the ordinance is a very extensive one, yet I am not prepared to say this bill will make a case without the exception. If the Senator from Pennsylvania, or any other Senator, supposes that both or either of the representatives of South Carolina on this floor hold that State in the palm of their hands, it is a great mistake. Non nostrum tantas componere lites. The political power of that State is now in the hands of intelligent and independent planters, who think for themselves, and act accordingly. What course will be taken upon the passage of this bill, and omission to modify the tariff, I am not prepared to say. From an article in the leading paper at the capital of that State, one exercising much influence, and reflecting a respectable portion of public opinion, it seems but little attention will be paid to the interference of Virginia, at least in the opinion of that writer. This article, although written with great ability, I am sure does injustice to the motives of our elder and much respected sister. Be that as it may, every motive of benevolence, justice, and prudence, urge us to abstain from rash or unskilful legislation. Who will try the strength of the diamond by the hammer and the anvil? To that impertinent curiosity which wishes to test the virtue of the Union, I would refer to the fate of Anselmo. Believe me, sir, the experiment is a useless, and may prove a fatal one.

I fear interested and malevolent persons have lent themselves to the basest and most profligate purposes, in misrepresenting both the President and the dominant party in South Carolina to each other. I know that a very strong conviction prevails that the Chief Magistrate mixes up personal with public considerations on this topic; that he seeks to indulge in the passion of revenge, and imbrue his hands in the blood of some of the public men of that State. And I know, moreover, that before this shall happen, a generous and spirited population will come to their rescue. The people will not permit their public functionaries, acting under their command, and clothed with the panoply of their power, to be led like criminals to the charnel-house. Before this will take place, many a brave man will perish. What Senator can desire to see the States pass under the yoke? How long since this body has surrendered their independence to the high behests of the Executive? Balfour and Rawdon have not contended, in the pages of history, for the honor of the execution of Hayne. If blood and carnage flow from this bill, the Senate, in after times, will not be emulous of the share they had in passing it.

Sir, I do not deny the power to pass such a bill. Cain had the power to kill his brother. Elizabeth had the power to take the life of the unfortunate Mary. The regicide court had the power to overrule the plea to its jurisdiction, by Charles the First. Bonaparte had the power to poison his prisoners at Jaffa. The question I make is, as to your right—moral right—by force, to compel the people of South Carolina to disobey their oaths and violate their most sacred obligations to their State Government.

It may be asked, if this bill be passed, what rights are left to South Carolina? She has the right to slink from her position, and, like a thievish slave, submit to the lash of a master. Nay, she has the further right left her—that right which Lucretia had, after she was dishonored. She has the right left her, which Virginus had, after the decree was pronounced which made his daughter a slave. She has the right which Leonidas had, to dispute the passage of the Persian army at the Straits of Thermopylæ. She has the right to resist unconstitutional taxation, as her fathers did; and she has the reserved right, which no Government can take away, nor tyranny destroy—the glorious right to live free or die.

Mr. WILKINS moved the following amendments to the bill, which were severally agreed to:

In 1st section, line 4, strike out "unlawful threats and menaces;" and after the word "thereof," in line 28, strike out the remainder of the section.

In section 2d, line 13, insert "revenue" before the word "law," so as to read "under the authority of any revenue law." Amendments to correspond with this were made informally in the other sections.

In the 5th section, line, 4, strike out "one of the district judges," and insert "any judge of any circuit or district court." In line 18, strike out "resist and."

Add a new section to the bill, providing that the act shall remain in force until the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer.

Fill blanks in section 7, with "1000," and "two months."

Mr. FORSYTH then moved to strike out the 3d section, as follows:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That in any case where suit or prosecution shall be commenced in a court of any State against any officer of the United States, or other person, for or on account of any act done under the laws of the United States, or under color thereof, or for or on account of any right, authority, or title set up or claimed by such officer, or other person, under any law of the United States, it shall be lawful for the defendant in such suit, or prosecution, at any time before trial, upon a petition to said court setting forth the nature of said suit, or prosecution, and verifying the said petition by affidavit, (which said petition and affidavit shall be presented to said court or to the clerk thereof, or left at the office of the said clerk,) to remove the said suit or prosecution to the circuit court of the United States then next to be holden in the district where the said suit, or prosecution, is commenced; and, thereupon, it shall be the duty of the said State court to stay all further proceedings therein; and the said suit, or prosecution, upon presentment of said petition, or affidavit, on leaving the same as aforesaid, shall be deemed and taken to be removed into the said circuit court; and any further proceedings, trial, or judgment therein, in the said State court, shall be wholly null and void; and on proof being made to the said circuit court of the presentment of said petition and affidavit, or of the leaving the same as aforesaid, the said circuit court shall have authority to entertain jurisdiction of said suit, or prosecution, and to proceed therein, and to hear, try, and determine the same, in like manner as if the same had been originally cognizable and instituted in such circuit court. And all attachments made, and all bail and other security given upon such suit, or prosecution, shall be and continue in like force and effect as if the same suit, or prosecution, had proceeded to final judgment and execution in the State court. And if, upon the removal of any such suit, or prosecution, it shall be made to appear to the said circuit court that no copy of the record and proceedings therein in the State court can be obtained, it shall be lawful for said circuit court to allow and require the plaintiff to proceed de novo, and to file a declaration of his cause of action; and the parties may thereupon proceed as in actions originally brought in said circuit court; and on failure of so proceeding, judgment of non pros. may be rendered against the plaintiff, with costs for the defendant."

Mr. FORSYTH was aware, he said, that there was a precedent for the provisions of this section; but he objected to them as injurious and unnecessary in application to the state of things in South Carolina. If Carolina persisted in her course, the case in her courts must go on, and both the State and federal courts will therefore proceed ex parte. No cause can be fairly tried when both of the parties are not heard. Conflicting judgments will be rendered by the courts at an early day, one to be enforced by the marshal, and the other by the sheriff. All the parties will be put to great cost and trouble. The jurisdiction of the United States court was sufficiently well secured in other respects by the bill. It would be better, he thought, for the officers to carry the cause, first, to the highest court in the State, and then appeal to the federal court, if he do not obtain justice.

Mr. WEBSTER thought this the most important provision of the whole bill, as respects the protection of the federal officers. After the case had been decided in the courts of South Carolina, there could be no writ of error of the case tried. It would be impossible to get any thing like a fair trial in a court where the jurors are sworn to support the ordinance; and the writ of error would only go on the law of the case. We give a chance to the officer to defend himself where the authority of the law was recognised. If the judgments of the State court conflicted with those of the federal court, the right of jurisdiction must be tried. There was a stronger reason now in favor of those provisions than there was for a stronger law than this which was created during the existence of the non-intercourse and embargo acts. He hoped the Senator from Georgia would reconsider the motion.

Mr. WILKINS said this section was indispensably necessary, and, by the amendment just adopted, was applied to the revenue laws only. The committee thought this would be a less offensive mode of protecting the officers of the Government than to take an appeal from the solemn judgment of the highest State tribunal, which last course had been particularly offensive to some States of the Union. The only question was, whether it would be better to risk a collision between the federal and State courts, or leave the officers at the mercy of the State tribunals, framed as they are. If the State resisted the judgment of the federal courts, unpleasant consequences must result; but if the State courts are so organized that an impartial jury trial is out of the question, he saw no propriety in leaving the officers whom we employ at their mercy. An appeal after decision by a State court would be ineffectual. Even to ask leave to appeal is an offence punishable by fine and imprisonment. Rather than expose a party to this penalty, or to the unlimited punishment for contempt of court, he would run the risk of a conflict of jurisdiction.

Mr. GRUNDY said, that in the prosecutions and suits against the officers, many other questions might arise than those which are contemplated. But the whole case would be shut out from the Supreme Court when the appeal was made. That a collision might arise between the two jurisdictions, was no argument against the measure; for, if a collision must come, it might as well come in this as in any other form.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 12.

MODIFICATION OF THE TARIFF.

Mr. CLAY rose, and addressed the Senate to the following effect:

I yesterday, sir, gave notice that I should ask leave to introduce a bill to modify the various acts imposing duties on imports. I, at the same time, added that I should, with the permission of the Senate, offer an explanation of the principle on which that bill is founded. I owe, sir, an apology to the Senate for this course of action, because, although strictly parliamentary, it is nevertheless out of the usual practice of this body; but it is a course which I trust that the Senate will deem to be justified by the interesting nature of the subject. I rise, sir, on this occasion, actuated by no motives of a private nature, by no personal feelings, and for no personal objects; but exclusively in obedience to a sense of the duty which I owe to my country. I trust, therefore, that no one will anticipate on my part any ambitious display of such humble powers as I may possess. It is sincerely my purpose to present a plain, unadorned, and naked statement of facts connected with the measure which I shall have the honor to propose, and with the condition of the country. When I survey, sir, the whole face of our country, I behold all around me evidences of the most gratifying prosperity—a prospect which would seem to be without a cloud upon it, were it not that through all parts of the country there exist great dissensions and unhappy distinctions, which, if they can possibly be relieved and reconciled by any broad scheme of legislation adapted to all interests, and regarding the feelings of all sections, ought to be quieted; and, leading to which object, any measure ought to be well received.

In presenting the modification of the tariff laws which I am now about to submit, I have two great objects in view. My first object looks to the tariff. I am compelled to express the opinion, formed after the most deliberate reflection, and on a full survey of the whole country, that, whether rightfully or wrongfully, the tariff stands in imminent danger. If it should even be preserved during this session, it must fall at the next session. By what circumstances, and through what causes, has arisen the necessity for this change in the policy of our country, I will not pretend now to elucidate. Others there are who may differ from the impressions which my mind has received upon this point. Owing, however, to a variety of concurrent causes, the tariff, as it now exists, is in imminent danger; and if the system can be preserved beyond the next session, it must be by some means not now within the reach of human sagacity. The fall of that policy, sir, would be productive of consequences calamitous indeed. When I look to the variety of interests which are involved, to the number of individuals interested, the amount of capital invested, the value of the buildings erected, and the whole arrangement of the business for the prosecution of the various branches of the manufacturing art which having sprung up under the fostering care of this Government, I cannot contemplate any evil equal to the sudden overthrow of all those interests. History can produce no parallel to the extent of the mischief which would be produced by such a disaster. The repeal of the edict of Nantes itself was nothing in comparison with it. That condemned to exile and brought to ruin a great number of persons. The most respectable portion of the population of France were condemned to exile and ruin by that measure. But in my opinion, sir, the sudden repeal of the tariff policy would bring ruin and destruction on the whole people of this country. There is no evil, in my opinion, equal to the consequences which would result from such a catastrophe.

What, sir, are the complaints which unhappily divide the people of this great country? On the one hand, it is said by those who are opposed to the tariff, that it unjustly taxes a portion of the people, and paralyzes their industry; that it is to be a perpetual operation; that there is to be no end to the system, which, right or wrong, is to be urged to their inevitable ruin. And what is the just complaint, on the other hand, of those who support the tariff? It is, that the policy of the Government is vacillating and uncertain, and that there is no stability in our legislation. Before one set of books are fairly opened, it becomes necessary to close them, and to open a new set. Before a law can be tested by experiment, another is passed. Before the present law has gone into operation, before it is yet nine months old, passed as it was under circumstances of extraordinary deliberation, the fruit of nine months' labor, before we know any thing of its experimental effects, and even before it commences its operations, we are required to repeal it. On one side we are urged to repeal a system which is fraught with ruin; on the other side, the check now imposed on enterprise, and the state of alarm in which the public mind has been thrown, render all prudent men desirous, looking ahead a little way, to adopt a state of things, on the stability of which they may have reason to count. Such is the state of feeling on the one side and on the other. I am anxious to find out some principle of mutual accommodation, to satisfy, as far as practicable, both parties; to increase the stability of our legislation; and at some distant day, but not too distant, when we take into view the magnitude of the interests which are involved, to bring down the rate of duties to that revenue standard for which our opponents have so long contended. The basis on which I wish to found this modification, is one of time; and the several parts of the bill to which I am about to call the attention of the Senate, are founded on this basis. I propose to give protection to our manufactured articles, adequate protection, for a length of time, which, compared with the length of human life, is very long, but which is short in proportion to the legitimate discretion of every wise and parental system of government; securing the stability of legislation, and allowing time for a gradual reduction on one side, and on the other proposing to reduce the rate of duties to that revenue standard for which the opponents of the system have so long contended. I will now proceed to lay the provisions of this bill before the Senate, with a view to draw their attention to the true character of the bill.

Mr. C. then proceeded to read the first section of the bill. According to this section, he said, it would be perceived that it was proposed to come down to the revenue standard at the end of little more than nine years and a half, giving a protection to our own manufactures, which he hoped would be adequate, during the intermediate time. Mr. C. recapitulated the provisions of the sections, and showed, by various illustrations, how they would operate.

Mr. C. then proceeded to read and comment at great length upon the second section of the bill. It would be recollected, he said, that at the last session of Congress, with the view to make a concession to the Southern section of the country, low priced woollens, (those supposed to enter into the consumption of slaves and the poorer classes of persons,) were taken out of the general class of duties on woollens, and the duty on them reduced to five per cent. It would be also recollected that at that time the gentlemen from the South had said that this concession was of no consequence, and they did not care for it; and he believed that they did not now consider it of any greater importance. As, therefore, it had failed of the purpose for which it was taken out of the common class, he thought it ought to be brought back again, and placed by the side of the other descriptions of woollens, and made subject to the same reduction of duty as proposed by this section.

Having next read through the third section of the bill, Mr. C. said, that, after the expiration of a term of years, this section laid down a rule by which the duties were to be reduced to the revenue standard which had been so long and so earnestly contended for. Until otherwise directed, and in default of provision being made for the wants of the Government in 1842, a rule was thus provided for the rate of duties thereafter: Congress being, in the mean time, authorized to adopt any other rule which the exigencies of the country or its financial condition might require. That is to say, if, instead of the duty of 20 per cent. proposed, 15 or 17 per cent. of duty was sufficient, or 25 per cent. should be found necessary, to produce a revenue to defray the expenses of an economical administration of the Government, there was nothing to prevent either of those rates, or any other, from being fixed upon; whilst the rate of 20 per cent. was introduced to guard against any failure on the part of Congress to make the requisite provision in due season.

This section of the bill, Mr. C. said, contained also another clause, suggested by that spirit of harmony and conciliation which he prayed might preside over the councils of the Union at this trying moment. It provided (what those persons who are engaged in manufactures have so long anxiously required for their security) that duties shall be paid in ready money; and we shall thus get rid of the whole of that credit system into which an inroad was made in regard to woollens, by the act of the last session. This section further contained a proviso, that nothing in any part of this act should be construed to interfere with the freest exercise of the power of Congress to lay any amount of duties, in the event of war breaking out between this country and any foreign Power.

Mr. C. having then read the fourth section of the bill, said that one of the considerations strongly urged for a reduction of the tariff at this time was, that the Government was likely to be placed in a dilemma by having an overflowing revenue; and this apprehension was the ground of an attempt totally to change the protective policy of the country. The section which he had read, Mr. C. said, was an effort to guard against this evil, by relieving altogether from duty a portion of the articles of import now subject to it. Some of these, he said, would, under the present rate of duty upon them, produce a considerable revenue; the article of silks alone would probably yield half a million of dollars per annum. If it were possible to pacify present dissensions, and let things take their course, he believed that no difficulty need be apprehended. If, said he, the bill which this body passed at the last session of Congress, and has again passed at this session, shall pass the other House, and become a law, and the gradual reduction of duties should take place which is contemplated by the first section of this bill, we shall have settled two (if not three) of the great questions which have agitated this country—that of the tariff, of the public lands, and, I will add, of internal improvement also. For, if there should still be a surplus revenue, that surplus might be applied, until the year 1842, to the completion of the works of internal improvement already commenced; and, after 1842, a reliance for all funds for purposes of internal improvement should be placed upon the operation of the land bill, to which he had already referred.

Modification of the Tariff.

[SENATE.]

It was not his object, Mr. C. said, in referring to that measure in connexion with that which he was about to propose, to consider them as united in their fate, being desirous, partial as he might be to both, that each should stand or fall upon its own intrinsic merits. If this section of the bill, adding to the number of free articles, should become law, along with the reduction of duties proposed by the first section of the bill, it was by no means sure that we should have any surplus revenue at all. He had been astonished, indeed, at the process of reasoning by which the Secretary of the Treasury had arrived at the conclusion that we should have a surplus revenue at all, though he admitted that such a conclusion could be arrived at in no other way. But what was this process? Duties of a certain rate now exist; the amount which they produce is known; the Secretary, proposing a reduction of the rate of duty, supposes that the duties will be reduced in proportion to the amount of the reduction of duty. Now, Mr. C. said, no calculation could be more uncertain than that. Though, perhaps, the best that the Secretary could have made, it was still all uncertainty; dependent upon the winds and the waves, on the mutations of trade, and on the course of commercial operations. If there was any truth in political economy, it could not be that the result would agree with the prediction; for we are instructed by all experience that the consumption of any article is in proportion to the reduction of its price, and that in general it may be taken as a rule, that the duty upon an article forms a portion of its price. Mr. C. said he did not mean to impute any improper design to any one; but, if it had been so intended, no scheme for getting rid of the tariff could have been more artfully devised to effect its purposes than that which thus calculated the revenue, and, in addition, assumed that the expenditure of the Government every year would be so much, &c. Could any one here say what the future expenditure of the Government would be? In this young, great, and growing community, can we say what will be the expenditure of the Government even a year hence, much less what it will be three, or four, or five years hence? Yet it had been estimated, on assumed amounts, founded on such uncertain data, both of income and expenditure, that the revenue might be reduced so many millions a year!

Mr. C. asked pardon for this digression, and returned to the examination of articles, in the fourth section, which were proposed to be left free of duty. The duties on these articles, he said, now varied from 5 to 10 per cent. ad valorem; but low as they were, the aggregate amount of revenue which they produced was considerable. By the bill of the last session, the duty on French silks was fixed at five per cent., and that on Chinese silks at ten per cent. ad valorem. By the bill now proposed, the duty on French silks was proposed to be repealed, leaving the other untouched. He would frankly state why he made this distinction. It had been a subject of anxious desire with him to see our commerce with France increased. France, though not so large a customer in the great staples of our country as Great Britain, was a great growing customer. He had been much struck with a fact going to prove this, which accidentally came to his knowledge the other day; which was, that within the short period of fourteen years, the amount of consumption in France, of the great southern staple of cotton, had been tripled. Again, it was understood that the French silks of the lower grades of quality could not sustain a competition with the Chinese, without some discrimination of this sort. He had understood, also, that the duty imposed upon this article at the last session had been very much complained of on the part of France; and, considering all the circumstances connected with the relations between the two Governments, it appeared to him desirable to make this discrimination in favor of the French product. If the Senate should think differently, he should be content. If, indeed, they should think proper to strike out this section altogether, he should cheerfully submit to their decision.

After reading the fifth and sixth sections, Mr. C. said, he would now take a view of some of the objections which would be made to the bill. It might be said that the act was prospective; that it bound our successors; and that we had no power thus to bind them. It was true that the act was prospective, and so was almost every act which we ever passed; but we could repeal it the next day. It was the established usage to give all acts a prospective operation. In every tariff law there were some provisions which go into operation immediately, and others at a future time. Each Congress legislated according to their own views of propriety; their acts did not bind their successors, but created a species of public faith which would not rashly be broken. But, if this bill should go into operation, as he hoped, even against hope, that it might, he had not a doubt that it would be adhered to by all parties. There was but one contingency which would render a change necessary, and that was the intervention of a war, which was provided for in the bill. The hands of Congress were left untied in this event, and they would be at liberty to resort to any mode of taxation which they might propose. But, if we suppose peace to continue, there would be no motive for disturbing the arrangement, but, on the contrary, every motive to carry it into effect. In the next place, it will be objected to the bill, by the friends of the protective policy, (of whom he held himself to be one, for his mind was immutably fixed in favor of that policy,) that it abandoned the power of protection. But, he contended, in the first place, that a suspension of the exercise of the power was not an abandonment of it; for the power was in the constitution according to our theory; was put there by its framers, and could only be dislodged by the people. After the year 1842, the bill provided that the power should be exercised in a certain mode. There were four modes by which the industry of the country could be protected: First, the absolute prohibition of rival foreign articles. That was totally unattempted by the bill; but it was competent to the wisdom of the Government to exert the power whenever they wished. Second, the imposition of duties in such a manner as to have no reference to any object but revenue. When we had a large public debt, in 1816, the duties yielded thirty-seven millions, and paid so much more of the public debt; and subsequently, they yielded but eight or ten millions, and paid so much less of the debt. Sometimes we had to trench on the sinking fund. Now, we had no public debt to absorb the surplus revenue, and no motive for continuing the duties. No man can look at the condition of the country, and say that we can carry on this system, with accumulating revenue, and no practicable way of expending it. The third mode was attempted last session, in a resolution which he had the honor to submit last year, and which, in fact, ultimately formed the basis of the act which finally passed both Houses. This was to raise as much revenue as was wanted for the use of the Government, and no more; but to raise it from the protected, and not from the unprotected articles. He would say, that he regretted, most deeply, that the greater part of the country would not suffer this principle to prevail. It ought to prevail; and the day, in his opinion, would come, when it would be adopted as the permanent policy of the country. Shall we legislate for our own wants, or those of a foreign country? To protect our own interests, in opposition to foreign legislation, was the basis of this system. The fourth mode in which protection could be afforded to domestic industry was, to admit, free of duty, every article which aided the operations of the manufacturers. These were the four modes for protecting our industry; and to those who say that the bill abandons the power of protection, he would reply, that it did not touch that power; and that the fourth mode, so far from being abandoned, is extended and upheld by the bill. The most that can be objected to the bill by those with whom he had co-operated to support the protective system was, that, in consideration of nine and a half years of peace, certainty, and stability, the manufacturers relinquished some advantages which they now enjoyed. What was the principle which had always been contended for in this and in the other House? That, after the accumulation of capital and skill, the manufacturers would stand alone, unaided by the Government, in competition with the imported articles from any quarter. Now give us time; cease all fluctuations and agitations for nine years, and the manufacturers, in every branch, will sustain themselves against foreign competition. If we can see our way clearly for nine years to come, we can safely leave to posterity to provide for the rest. If the tariff be overthrown, as may be its fate next session, the country will be plunged into extreme distress and agitation. I, said Mr. C., want harmony. I wish to see the restoration of those ties which have carried us triumphantly through two wars. I delight not in this perpetual turmoil. Let us have peace, and become once more united as a band of brothers.

It may be said, that the farming interest cannot subsist under a twenty per cent. ad valorem duty. His reply was, "sufficient for the day is the evil thereof." He would leave it to the day when the reduction took effect, to settle the question. When the reduction takes place, and the farmer cannot live under it, what will he do? I will tell you, said Mr. C., what he ought to do. He ought to try it—make a fair experiment of it; and if he cannot live under it, let him come here and say he is bankrupt, and ruined. If then nothing can be done to relieve him—Sir, I will not pronounce the words, for I will believe that something will be done, and that relief will be afforded without hazarding the peace and integrity of the Union. This confederacy is an excellent contrivance, but it must be managed with delicacy and skill. There were an infinite variety of prejudices and local interests to be regarded; but they should all be made to yield to the Union.

If the system proposed cannot be continued, let us try some intermediate system, before we think of any other dreadful alternative. Sir, it will be said, on the other hand—for the objections are made by the friends of protection, principally—that the time is too long; that the intermediate reductions are too inconsiderable; and that there is no guaranty that, at the end of the time stipulated, the reduction proposed would be allowed to take effect. In the first place should be recollected the diversified interests of the country; the measures of the Government which preceded the establishment of manufactures; the public faith in some degree pledged for their security; and the ruin in which rash and hasty legislation would involve them. He would not dispute about terms. It would not, in a court of justice, be maintained that the public faith was pledged for the protection of manufacturers; but there were other pledges which men of honor are bound by, besides those of which the law can take cognizance.

If we excite in our neighbor a reasonable expectation which induces him to take a particular course in business, we are in honor bound to redeem the pledge thus tacitly given. Can any man doubt that a large portion of our citizens believed that the system would be permanent? The whole country expected it? The security against any change of the system proposed by the bill was in the character of the bill—as a compromise between two conflicting parties. If the bill should be taken by common consent, as we hope it will be, the history of the revenue will be a guaranty of its permanence. The circumstances under which it was passed will be known and recorded; and no one will disturb a system which was adopted with a view to give peace and tranquillity to the country.

The descending gradations by which he proposed to arrive at the minimum of duties must be gradual. He never would consent to any precipitate operation, to bring distress and ruin on the community.

Now, said Mr. C., viewing it in this light, it appeared that there were eight years and a half, and nine years and a half, taking the ultimate time, which would be an efficient protection; the remaining duties would be withdrawn by a biennial reduction. The protective principle must be said to be, in some measure, relinquished at the end of eight years and a half. This period could not appear unreasonable, and he thought that no member of the Senate, or any portion of the country, ought to make the slightest objection. It now remained for him to consider the other objection—the want of a guaranty to there being an ulterior continuance of the duties imposed by the bill, on the expiration of the term which it prescribes. The best guaranties would be found in the circumstances under which the measure would be passed. If it were passed by common consent; if it were passed with the assent of a portion, a considerable portion, of those who had hitherto directly supported this system, and by a considerable portion of those who opposed it; if they declared their satisfaction with the measure, he had no doubt the rate of duties guarantied would be continued after the expiration of the term, if the country continued at peace. And, at the end of the term, when the experiment would have been made of the efficiency of the mode of protection fixed by the bill, while the constitutional question had been suffered to lie dormant, if war should render it necessary, protection might be carried up to prohibition; while, if the country should remain at peace, and this measure go into full operation, the duties would be gradually lowered down to the revenue standard, which had been so earnestly wished for.

But suppose that he was wrong in all these views—for there were no guaranties, in one sense of the term, of human infallibility; suppose a different state of things in the South; that the Senate, from causes which he should not dwell upon now, but which were obvious to every reflecting man in this country—causes which had operated for years past, and which continued to operate; suppose, for a moment, that there should be a majority in the Senate in favor of the Southern views, and that they should repeal the whole system at once; what guaranty would we have that the repealing of the law would not destroy those great interests which it is so important to preserve? What guaranty would you have that the thunders of those powerful manufacturers would not be directed against your Capitol, because of this abandonment of their interests, and because you had given them no protection against foreign legislation? Sir, said Mr. C., if you carry your measure of repeal without the consent, at least, of a portion of those who are interested in the preservation of manufactures, you have no security, no guaranty, no certainty, that any protection will be continued. But if the measure should be carried by the common consent of both parties, we shall have all security; history will faithfully record the transaction; narrate under what circumstances the bill was passed; that it was a pacifying measure; that it was as oil poured from the vessel of the Union, to restore peace and harmony to the country. When all this was known, what Congress, what Legislature, would mar the guaranty? What man, who is entitled to deserve the character of an American statesman, would stand up in his place, in either House of Congress, and disturb this treaty of peace and amity?

Sir, said Mr. C., I will not say that it may not be disturbed. All that I can say is, that there is all reasonable security that can be desired by those on the one side of the question, and much more than those on the other would have, by any unfortunate concurrence of circumstances. Such a repeal of the whole system should be brought about as would be cheerfully acquiesced in by all parties in this country. All parties might find in this measure some reasons for objection. And what human measure was there which was free from objectionable qualities? It had been remarked, and justly remarked, by the great Father of our country himself, that if that great work which is the charter of our liberties, and under which we have so long flourished, had been submitted, article by article, to all the different States composing this Union, the whole would have been rejected; and yet, when the whole was presented together, it was accepted as a whole. He (Mr. C.) would admit that his friends did not get all they could wish; and the gentlemen on the other side did not obtain all they might desire; but both would gain all that, in his humble opinion, was proper to be given in the present condition of the country. It might be true, that there would be loss and gain in this measure; but how was this loss and gain distributed? Among our countrymen. What we lose, no foreign hand gains; and what we gain, has been no loss to any foreign Power. It is among ourselves the distribution takes place. The distribution is founded on that great principle of compromise and concession which lies at the bottom of our institutions, which gave birth to the constitution itself, and which has continued to regulate us in our onward march, and conducted the nation to glory and renown.

It remained for him now to touch another topic. Objections had been made to all legislation at this session of Congress, resulting from the attitude of one of the States of this confederacy. He confessed that he felt a very strong repugnance to any legislation at all on this subject at the commencement of the session, principally because he misconceived the purposes, as he had found from subsequent explanation, which that State had in view. Under the influence of more accurate information, he must say, that the aspect of things, since the commencement of the session, had, in his opinion, greatly changed. When he came to take his seat on that floor, he had supposed that a member of this Union had taken an attitude of defiance and hostility against the authority of the General Government. He had imagined that she had arrogantly required that we should abandon, at once, a system which had long been the settled policy of this country. Supposing that she had manifested this feeling, and taken up this position, he (Mr. C.) had, in consequence, felt a disposition to hurl defiance back again, and to impress upon her the necessity of the performance of her duties as a member of this Union. But, since his arrival here, he found that South Carolina did not contemplate force, for it was denied and denounced by that State. She disclaimed it; and asserted that she is merely making an experiment. That experiment is this: By a course of State legislation, and by a change in her fundamental laws, she is endeavoring, by her civil tribunals, to prevent the General Government from carrying the laws of the United States into operation within her limits. That she has professed to be her object. Her appeal was not to arms, but to another power; not to the sword, but to the law. He must say, and he would say it with no intention of disparaging that State, or any other of the States, it was a feeling unworthy of her. As the purpose of South Carolina was not that of force, this at once disarmed, divested legislation of one of the principal objections which it appeared to him existed against it at the commencement of this session. Her purposes are all of a civil nature. She thinks she can oust the United States from her limits; and unquestionably she had taken good care to prepare her judges beforehand, by swearing them to decide in her favor. If we submitted to her, we should thus stand but a poor chance of obtaining justice. She disclaimed any intention of resorting to force, unless we should find it indispensable to execute the laws of the Union by applying force to her. It seemed to him, the aspect of the attitude of South Carolina had changed; or rather, the new light which he had obtained enabled him to see her in a different attitude; and he had not truly understood her, until she had passed her laws by which it was intended to carry her ordinance into effect. Now, he ventured to predict, that the State to which he had referred must ultimately fail in her attempt. He disclaimed any intention of saying any thing to the disparagement of that State. Far from it. He thought that she had been rash, intemperate, and greatly in error; and, to use the language of one of her own writers, made up an issue unworthy of her. He thought the verdict and judgment must go against her. From one end to the other of this continent, by acclamation as it were, nullification had been put down, and put down in a manner more effectually than by a thousand wars, or a thousand armies—by the irresistible force, by the mighty influence, of public opinion. Not a voice beyond the single State of South Carolina had been heard in favor of the principle of nullification, which she has asserted by her own ordinance; and he would say, that she must fail in her law-suit. He would express two opinions: the first of which was, that it is not possible for the ingenuity of man to devise a system of State legislation to defeat the execution of the laws of the United States, which could not be countervailed by federal legislation. A State might take it upon herself to throw obstructions in the way of the execution of the laws of the Federal Government; but federal legislation can follow at her heel quickly, and successfully counteract the course of State legislation. The framers of the constitution foresaw this, and the constitution has guarded against it. What has it said? It is declared, in the clause enumerating the powers of this Government, that Congress shall have all power to carry into effect all the powers granted by the constitution, in any branch of the Government. Under this sweeping clause, for they have not specified contingencies, because they could not see what was to happen; but whatever powers were necessary—all, all are given to this Government, by the fundamental law, necessary to carry into effect those powers which are vested by that constitution in the Federal Government. That is one reason. The other is, that it is not possible for any State, provided this Government is administered with prudence and propriety, so to shape its laws as to throw upon the General Government the responsibility of first resorting to the employment of force; but if force is at all employed, it must be by State legislation, and not federal legislation; and the responsibility of employing that force must rest with, and attach to, the State itself.

I, said Mr. C., shall not go into the details of this bill. I merely throw out these sentiments for the purpose of showing you that South Carolina, having declared her purpose to be this, [to make an experiment—whether by a course of legislation, in a conventional form, or a legislative form of enactment, she can defeat the execution of certain laws of the United States, I, for one, will express my opinion, that I believe it is utterly impracticable, whatever course of legislation she may choose to adopt, for her to succeed. I am ready, for one, to give the tribunals and the Executive of the country, whether that Executive has or has not my confidence, the necessary measures of power and authority to execute the laws of the Union. But I would not go a hair's breadth further than what is necessary for those purposes. Up to that point I would go, and cheerfully go, for it is my sworn duty, as I regard it, to go to that point.

Again: taking this view of the subject, South Carolina is doing nothing more, except that she is doing it with more rashness, than some other States have done—that respectable State, Ohio, and, if he was not mistaken, the State of Virginia also. An opinion prevailed some years ago, that if you put the laws of a State into a penal form, you could not oust federal jurisdiction out of the limits of that State, because the State tribunals had an exclusive jurisdiction over penalties and crimes; and it was inferred that no federal court could wrest the authority from them. According to that principle, the State of Ohio passed the laws taxing the branch of the United States Bank, and high penalties were to be enforced against every person who should attempt to defeat her taxation. The question was tried. It happened to be my lot, said Mr. C., to be counsel at law to bring the suit against the State, and to maintain the federal authority. The trial took place in the State of Ohio; and it is one of the many circumstances which redounded to the honor of that patriotic State, she submitted to federal force. I went to the office of the public treasury myself, to which was taken the money of the Bank of the United States; it having remained there in sequestration until it was peaceably surrendered in obedience to the decision of the court, without any appeal to arms. In a building which I had to pass in order to reach the treasury, I saw the most brilliant display of arms and musketry that I ever saw in my life; but not one was raised, or threatened to be raised, against the due execution of the laws of the United States, when they were then enforced. In Virginia, (but I am not sure that I am correct in the history of it,) there was a case of this kind; persons were liable to penalties for selling lottery tickets. It was contended that the State tribunals had an exclusive jurisdiction over the subject. The case was brought before the Supreme Court; the parties were a Myers and somebody else; and it decided, as it must always decide, no matter what obstruction, no matter what the State law may be; the constitutional laws of the United States must follow and defeat it, in its attempt to arrest the federal arm in the exercise of its lawful authority. South Carolina has attempted, and I repeat it, in a much more offensive way, attempted to defeat the execution of the laws of the United States. But it seems that, under all the circumstances of the case, she has, for the present, determined to stop here, in order that, by our legislation, we may prevent the necessity of her advancing any further. But there are other reasons for the expediency of legislating at this time. Although I came here fully impressed with a different opinion, my mind has now become reconciled.

The memorable first of February is past. I confess I did feel an unconquerable repugnance to legislation until that day should have passed, because of the consequences that were to ensue. I hoped that the day would go over well. I feel, and I think we must all confess, we breathe a freer air than when the restraint was upon us. But this is not the only consideration. South Carolina has practically postponed her ordinance, instead of letting it go into effect, till the fourth of March. Nobody who has noticed the course of events can doubt that she will postpone it by still farther legislation, if Congress should rise without any settlement of this question. I was going to say, my life on it, she will postpone it to a period subsequent to the fourth of March. It is in the natural course of events. South Carolina must perceive the embarrassments of her situation. She must be desirous—it is unnatural to suppose that she is not—to remain in the Union. What! a State, whose heroes in its gallant ancestry fought so many glorious battles along with those of the other States of this Union; a State with which this confederacy is linked by bonds of such a powerful character! I have sometimes fancied what would be her condition if she goes out of this Union; if her five hundred thousand people should at once be thrown upon their own resources. She is out of the Union. What is the consequence? She is an independent Power. What then does she do? She must have armies and fleets, and an expensive Government; have foreign missions; she must raise taxes; enact this very tariff, which had driven her out of the Union, in order to enable her to raise money, and to sustain the attitude of an independent Power. If she should have no force, no navy to protect her, she would be exposed to piratical incursions. Their neighbor, St. Domingo, might pour down a horde of pirates on her borders, and desolate her plantations. She must have her embassies; therefore, must she have her revenue. And, let me tell you, there is another consequence—an inevitable one; she has a certain description of persons recognised as property, south of the Potomac and west of the Mississippi, which would be no longer recognised as such, except within her own limits. This species of property would sink immediately to one-half of its present value, for it is Louisiana and the Southwestern States which are her great market.

But I will not dwell on this topic any longer. I say it is utterly impossible that South Carolina ever desired, for a moment, to become a separate and independent State. If the existence of the ordinance, while an act of Congress is pending, is to be considered as a motive for not passing that law, why this would be found to be a sufficient reason for preventing the passing of any laws. South Carolina, by keeping the shadow of an ordinance ever before us, as she has it in her power to postpone it from time to time, would defeat our legislation forever. I would repeat that, under all the circumstances of the case, the condition of South Carolina is only one of the elements of a combination; the whole of which together constitutes a motive of action which renders it expedient to resort, during the present session of Congress, to some measure, in order to quiet and tranquilize the country.

If there be any who want civil war, who want to see the blood of any portion of our countrymen spilt, I am not one of them; I wish to see war of no kind; but, above all, do I not desire to see a civil war. When war begins, whether civil or foreign, no human foresight is competent to foresee when, or how, or where it is to terminate. But when a civil war shall be lighted up in the bosom of our own happy land, and armies are marching, and commanders are winning their victories, and fleets are in motion on our coast, tell me, if you can—tell me, if any human being can tell, its duration? God alone knows where such a war will end. In what state will be left our institutions? In what state our liberties? I want no war; above all, no war at home.

Sir, I repeat, that I think South Carolina has been rash, intemperate, and greatly in the wrong; but I do not want to disgrace her, nor any other member of this Union. No; I do not desire to see the lustre of one single star dimmed of that glorious confederacy which constitutes our political sun; still less do I wish to see it blotted out, and its light obliterated forever. Has not the State of South Carolina been one of the members of this Union in "days that tried men's souls"? Have not her ancestors fought alongside our ancestors? Have we not, conjointly, won together many a glorious battle? If we had to go into a civil war with such a State, how would it terminate? Whenever it should have terminated, what would be her condition? If she should ever return to the Union, what would be the condition of her feelings and affections? what the state of the heart of her people? She has been with us before, when her ancestors mingled in the throng of battle, and as I hope our posterity will mingle with hers for ages and centuries to come in the united defence of liberty, and for the honor and glory of the Union. I do not wish to see her degraded or defaced as a member of this confederacy.

In conclusion, allow me to entreat and implore each individual member of this body to bring into the consideration of this measure, which I have had the honor of proposing, the same love of country which, if I know myself, has actuated me, and the same desire for restoring harmony to the Union which has prompted this effort. If we can forget for a moment—but that would be asking too much of human nature; if we could suffer, for one moment, party feeling and party causes—and, as I stand here before my God, I declare I have looked beyond those considerations, and regarded only the vast interests of this united people—I should hope that, under such feelings, and with such dispositions, we may advantageously proceed to the consideration of this bill, and heal, before they are yet bleeding, the wounds of our distracted country. Mr. C. concluded with asking leave to introduce his bill.

Mr. FORSYTH presumed, he said, that the motion for leave, in its present stage, was a subject of discussion; if so, he begged leave to say a word or two in opposition to it. The avowed object of the bill would meet with universal approbation. It was a project to harmonize the people, and it could have come from no better source than from the gentleman from Kentucky; for to no one were we more indebted than to him for the discord and discontent which agitate us. But a few months ago it was in the power of the gentleman, and those with whom he acted, to settle this question at once and forever. The opportunity was not seized, but he hoped it was not passed. In the project now offered, he could not see the elements of success. The time was not auspicious. But fourteen days remained to the session; and we had better wait the action of the House on the bill before them, than, by taking up this new measure here, produce a cessation of their action. Was there not danger that the fourteen days would be exhausted in useless debate? Why, twenty men, with a sufficiency of breath, (for words they would not want,) could annihilate the bill, though a majority in both Houses were in favor of it. He objected, too, that the bill was a violation of the constitution, because the Senate had no power to raise revenue. Two years ago, the same Senator made a proposition, which was rejected on this very ground. The offer, however, would not be useless; it would be attended with all the advantages which could follow its discussion here. We shall see it, and take it into consideration as the offer of the manufacturers. The other party, as we are called, will view it as a scheme of diplomacy; not as their ultimatum, but as their first offer. But the bargain was all on one side. After they are defeated, and can no longer sustain a conflict, they come to make the best bargain they can. The Senator from Kentucky says, the tariff is in danger; aye, sir, it is at its last gasp. It has received the immedicable wound; no hellebore can cure it. He considered the confession of the gentleman to be of immense importance. Yes, sir, the whole feeling of the country is opposed to the high protective system. The wily serpent that crept into our Eden has been touched by the spear Ithuriel. The Senator is anxious to prevent the ruin which a sudden abolition of the system will produce. No one desires to inflict ruin upon the manufacturers; but suppose the Southern people, having the power to control the subject, should totally and suddenly abolish the system; what right would those have to complain who had combined to oppress the South? What has the tariff led us to already? From one end of the country to the other, it has produced evils which are worse than a thousand tariffs. The necessity of appealing now to fraternal feeling shows that that feeling is not sleeping, but nearly extinguished. He opposed the introduction of the bill as a revenue measure, and upon it demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, observed, that the bill was no cure at all for the evils complained of by the South. They wished to try the constitutionality of protecting duties. In this bill there was nothing but protection, from beginning to end. We had been told that if the bill passed with common consent, the system established by it would not be touched. But he had once been cheated in that way, and would not be cheated again. In 1816 it was said the manufacturers would be satisfied with the protection afforded by the bill of that year, but in a few years after they came and insisted for more, and got more. After the first four years, an attempt would be made to repeal all the balance of this bill. He would go no further than four years in prospective reduction. The reduction was on some articles too great. He would go no lower than 20 per cent. on cotton.

Mr. HOLMES confessed that this was the first time but one that he ever heard an objection made to a motion of leave. Common courtesy required that any Senator should have leave to introduce any bill he pleased. He did not know whether he should like the principles of this bill, but he would like to have it on the table, and see whether he would approve of it. As to punishment, the friends of protection would submit to none, for they had committed no crime. The cotton interest of the United States had grown up under a protection of three cents a pound, which it had enjoyed since the year 1790; and since, by this crime, it had been protected enough, its friends were very willing to denounce protection. It was extraordinary that a proposition of reconciliation should not be received, and that the yeas and nays should be called upon it. When he reflected that this is a proposition intended as a peace-offering, and considered the manner of its reception, he almost wished that he had complied with the request of his constituents a little before, and resigned. Then he would not have been here to see such a proposition rejected.

Mr. FORSYTH replied, that if the Senator from Kentucky had not explained the provisions of the bill, and shown them to be unconstitutional, he should have no objections to its introduction. If the Senator from Maine had never before heard of an objection to a motion for leave to introduce a bill, he would probably hear of it hereafter. He had not spoken of any punishment for the friends of the protective system in this body, but of the manufacturers generally. I know, said Mr. F., that the friends of the manufacturers are undergoing their sentence at this moment.

Mr. POINDEXTER returned his hearty thanks to the Senator from Kentucky for introducing this bill, and he hoped he would have leave. We have arrived at a singular state of things, (said Mr. P.) We see honorable Senators decrying the tariff as ruinous and oppressive, and yet voting for fleets and armies to carry it into effect. When an honorable Senator proposes conciliation, it is opposed as something which ought to be averted and avoided. Fourteen days we have spent here in idle debate, upon a question whether we should declare war upon South Carolina, or not. The Senator from Kentucky has offered at last an olive branch; but though the Senator from Georgia is willing to make war, to enforce the accursed tariff, yet he will refuse the tender of an offer to remove its burdens. As to the constitutional point, the only violation of the rule prohibiting the Senate from originating a bill raising revenue would take place at the consummation, not at the inception of the measure. We have had a previous bill before us, which ought to have been kicked out of this body as soon as it was shown here; but this measure, which looks to the peace and tranquillity of the country, did not meet with as much favor as that from the honorable Senator from Georgia. The sovereign panacea for healing all our wounds, and restoring perfect health to the body politic, is that which the Judiciary Committee has reported, viz: doses of cannon balls, bullets, and bayonets. He protested against an inconsistency which would bring out the whole of the country to carry the tariff laws into effect, and then refuse to receive any proposition to modify the tariff.

Mr. SPRAGUE said, time enough had not yet been afforded to determine whether he should be able to give this important bill his ultimate support or not. That would depend upon a more deliberate examination of its principles and details. The only question now before the Senate was, whether leave should be given to introduce it, whether it should be laid before the Senate. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FOSYTH] had confined himself simply to his constitutional objections, he (Mr. S.) would not have arisen. But what had the Senate heard? What was the condition of the country? Disquieted, disturbed, almost convulsed; laws annulled; violent resistance to their enforcement threatened; apprehension of disaster and ruin on the one hand, and civil war on the other, spreading far and wide. Already the din of preparation is borne upon the southern breeze; and we may almost hear the clangor of arms. On all sides of the House, and from all quarters out of the House, they had heard the anxious hope expressed, that some measure might be devised which should give peace to the country. It was their solemn and official duty to seek, anxiously to seek, and embrace, measures of tranquillity. A proposition to that effect, from a source entitled to the highest consideration, is presented to us, accompanied by an explanation conciliatory in its language, and elevated in its sentiments. How has it been met, and that, too, by a Senator from that section of country which raised aloud the cry of oppression, and which the bill proposes to relieve? In the first place, by a sarcasm upon the honorable mover! By telling the gentleman from Kentucky that a measure of peace comes with peculiar propriety from him, who, of all men, had most contributed to the distraction which pervades the country. Is this the mode in which tranquillity is to be restored, by repelling propositions with reproaches upon its author? Are the feelings thus excited in order to produce harmony and concord?

But the gentleman did not stop there. The feelings of all who have heretofore sustained the great American system were assailed in a manner to excite any emotions but those of conciliation. The gentleman sounded the note of triumph and victory, vaunting as over a fallen foe, and denouncing punishment and retribution! He would not even receive from them propositions of peace; unconditional submission seemed to be demanded. One would have thought that they were suppliants at his feet, and that he could trample upon them with impunity. But he warned the gentleman against trusting to so gross a delusion. They are yet erect, with arms in their hands, and vigor and spirit to wield them with effect. If war is to be waged, he will find that the battle is not yet won; and let him that putteth off the harness boast, not him that putteth it on. The time for his shout of victory and triumph has not yet arrived. Triumph over whom? The friends and supporters of protection—the North, Middle, and Western sections of our country!

In his assumption that this has emanated from the weakness of the friends of protection, the gentleman is in profound error; it proceeds not from their weakness, but their strength. The feeble cannot yield with safety or honor; the powerful may with both. It is a proposition from the strong to the weak: and it is because they are strong, that they can make the concession with dignity. Does the gentleman suppose that the little cloud that lowers in the Southern horizon, the speck of war there risen, has already overwhelmed the whole Northern, Middle, and Western country? Has brought them to unconditional submission? He much mistakes the temper of the times. The spirit of concession which he sees, is not the offspring of fear, but forbearance; it is from the magnanimity of conscious power, and which nothing is more likely to destroy than an imperious tone of demand in those towards whom it is extended.

There is yet another ground of objection. He says, if this bill should be generally popular, if it should be every where received with favor, the effect might be to arrest the progress of a measure in the other House, and defeat an adjustment. That is indeed a danger which few would have had the sagacity to discover. The popularity, the acceptableness of a measure, being so great as to supersede all others, is to be the means of preventing the desired arrangement from being accomplished! To other minds, this would have appeared to be one of its greatest recommendations.

Mr. S. said he wished to repeat, that he had not had an opportunity to give that deliberate examination to the principle and details of the bill which would enable him to say at this moment whether it should receive his support or not; but he was anxious to have it legitimately and regularly before the Senate, and hoped the leave asked would be granted.

Mr. FORSYTH said that he was in a very unfortunate condition, as he had drawn upon himself a fire from both parties in the Senate. The opposing portions of the Senate, who had heretofore been disposed to war against each other, had now united to war upon him. He was the friend of peace; and any proposition for peace, whether pacific or peaceful, should have his support—even to the last. He had been accused of meeting the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky with a sarcasm. How so? Was it by referring to that which was the boast of the Senator from Kentucky—that he was the steady and ardent friend of the protective system, which he had a right to support, with the views he entertained, that it had elevated the standing and promoted the prosperity of the country; while they who resided in the Southern States held the opposite opinion? It was, therefore, no sarcasm; it was not intended as such; but rather as a compliment, since it was the duty of the Senator from Kentucky, standing at the head of a great party, to sustain his principles. He (Mr. F.) had not said that the Senate should not receive the bill, for the introduction of which the leave was asked. What he had said was, that if the Senator from Kentucky would strike out the clause to which he objected as unconstitutional, he would give his vote in favor of granting leave, but he could not vote for granting the leave while that clause stood in the bill. He did not feel that he should be inclined to support the bill itself in its present form, because it asked too much. The gentleman from Maine had said that this was a proposition from strength to weakness. So it was at this moment, but it would not be so after the third of March next. Was not every Senator aware that a salutary change had taken place in public opinion on this subject; and after the close of the present session, was it not well known that they who were now the majority would have to submit to a majority entertaining opposite views, and representing the true opinions of a majority of the people? At the next session of Congress, it was anticipated that the majority of Congress would be in favor of the South, and that portion of the Union would then have the justice which they had so long asked for in vain.

The Senator from Mississippi had adverted to another bill which was pending before the Senate, and which he designated a bill to make war against South Carolina. When that bill should be before the Senate, it would be time enough to characterize it with epithets. He should feel it to be his duty to support that bill, because he believed that it was a constitutional measure, and that its effect would be, to prevent the citizens of South Carolina, who had adopted different views of their duties (one party adhering to their allegiance to the State, and the other considering their first duty as due to the United States,) from coming into conflict, and butchering one another.

Mr. CLAY said, whether the remark of the Senator from Georgia was intended as a sarcasm or not, he did not view it as material. He had prescribed to himself a course of action from which he would not suffer himself to be disturbed. He had resolved, that while he was engaged in this work of peace, nothing which might be thrown out in the remarks of gentlemen, whether personal or not, should provoke him to any warmth of reply. He was, he must confess, somewhat surprised at the manner in which his request had been received. The gentleman from Georgia had intimated that this bill was the work of the manufacturers. The fact was not so. The bill was exclusively his own, and had been framed in opposition to the opinions and wishes of some manufacturers with whom he had conferred. If he had listened to them, he should not have introduced this bill; but he had been moved by higher considerations, and had looked solely to the harmony and feelings of the whole Union.

Modification of the Tariff.

[SENATE.]

In reference to the constitutional section, he reminded the gentleman that the bill was not a bill to raise the duties, but to reduce them; and, therefore, did not come within the reach of an equitable objection. If it had been a bill to raise the rate of duties, the objection to it would have been a valid one. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DICKINSON] had formerly asked leave to introduce a bill, similar in its character, and containing a clause for raising a duty; but not an objection was made, and the bill was introduced. The constitution says that all bills to raise revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. This was a bill to reduce the duties, except in a single clause, and that clause relates to the act which had not yet gone into operation. It repeals the clause in that act which relates to the duty on woollens, and then re-inserts a scale of duty in its room. He did not believe that it was the intention of the constitution so far to restrict the right of the Senate, as to preclude the origination of a bill to repeal any existing law. Bills which come from the House were subject, in the Senate, to any amendment which a member may make, and which the Senate may think proper to make. It was perfectly clear, that if there was any thing objectionable in the details of the bill, it could be corrected in its progress after it had been introduced.

Mr. CALHOUN rose and said, he would make but one or two observations. Entirely approving of the object for which this bill was introduced, he should give his vote in favor of the motion for leave to introduce it. He who loves the Union must desire to see this agitating question brought to a termination. Until it should be terminated, we could not expect the restoration of peace or harmony, or a sound condition of things, throughout the country. He believed that to the unhappy divisions which had kept the Northern and Southern States apart from each other, the present entirely degraded condition of the country (for entirely degraded he believed it to be) was solely attributable. The general principles of this bill received his approbation. He believed that if the present difficulties were to be adjusted, they must be adjusted on the principles embraced in the bill, of fixing ad valorem duties, except in the few cases in the bill to which specific duties were assigned. He said that it had been his fate to occupy a position as hostile as any one could, in reference to the protecting policy; but, if it depended on his will, he would not give his vote for the prostration of the manufacturing interest. A very large capital had been invested in manufactures, which had been of great service to the country; and he would never give his vote to suddenly withdraw all those duties by which that capital was sustained in the channel into which it had been directed. But he would only vote for the ad valorem system of duties, which he deemed the most beneficial and the most equitable. At this time, he did not rise to go into a consideration of any of the details of this bill, as such a course would be premature, and contrary to the practice of the Senate. There were some of the provisions which had his entire approbation, and there were some to which he objected. But he looked upon these minor points of difference as points in the settlement of which no difficulty would occur, when gentlemen met together in that spirit of mutual compromise which, he doubted not, would be brought into their deliberations, without at all yielding the constitutional question as to the right of protection.

[Here there was a tumultuous approbation in the galleries, which induced the CHAIR to order the galleries to be cleared. On the expression of a hope, by Mr. POINDEXTER and Mr. HOLMES, that the order would not, at this time, be enforced, the CHAIR subsequently withdrew it; but gave notice that on any repetition of the disorder, the officers of the House would act without any further direction.]

Mr. DICKERSON said that, as the ayes and noes had been ordered, he felt himself bound to give a reason why he should feel himself constrained to vote against the granting of leave. It was not in reference to the merits of the bill; not that he strongly and entirely approved or disapproved of any of its provisions, that he should record his vote. Such a bill as this could not, in his opinion, originate in the Senate. The gentleman from Kentucky knew that he was, in no instance, disposed to go against any motion which came within the rules and rights of the Senate. He stated that he had originated the bill to which reference had been made by the instruction of the committee.

The gentleman from Kentucky said this was not a bill, the object of which was to raise the revenue. Now, he (Mr. D.) thought, that although a bill might be, nominally, a bill to reduce the revenue, some of its provisions, by reducing duties, might so operate as to raise the amount of revenue collected. He did not, however, read the clause of the constitution in the same way as the gentleman from Kentucky did. To raise revenue, according to the meaning of that instrument, was entirely a distinct thing from a mere question of the modification of duties. We have a bill which has been passed to raise revenue; and this, which is now under consideration, is a bill to raise revenue. The term, as used in the constitution, implies the collecting and bringing money into the treasury. This was the view he had always taken of the meaning of the clause. And he hoped that the Senator from Kentucky would excuse him, if, on the ayes and noes being taken, he should record his vote in the negative. Not that he was against the bill, although he had strong doubts whether, at this late period of the session, it could be productive of any good consequences.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that as, by its title, the bill appeared to be merely a bill to modify the existing revenue laws, it could hardly be rejected as a bill for raising revenue, which ought to originate in the other House, since there are many particulars in which all the existing revenue laws might be modified, without raising more or less revenue. As the bill has not been read, (said Mr. W.) we seem to know no more of it, regularly, than its title purports. That title describes a bill, which may constitutionally originate in the Senate: I shall, therefore, vote for the leave.

But I feel it my duty, Mr. President, to say a word or two upon the measure itself. It is impossible that this proposition of the honorable member from Kentucky should not excite in the country a very strong sensation; and in the relation in which I stand to the subject, I am anxious, at an early moment, to say, that as far as I understand the bill, from the gentleman's statement of it, there are principles in it to which I do not at present see how I can ever concur. If I understand the plan, the result of it will be a well-understood surrender of the power of discrimination, or a stipulation not to use that power, in the laying duties on imports, after the eight or nine years have expired. This appears to me to be matter of great moment. I hesitate to be a party to any such stipulation. The honorable member admits, that though there will be no positive surrender of the power, there will be a stipulation not to exercise it; a treaty of peace and amity, as he says, which no American statesman can, hereafter, stand up to violate. For one, sir, I am not ready to enter into the treaty. I propose, so far as depends on me, to leave all our successors in Congress as free to act as we are ourselves.

The honorable member from Kentucky says the tariff is in imminent danger; that, if not destroyed this session, it cannot hope to survive the next. This may be so, sir. This may be so. But if it be so, it is because the American people will not sanction the tariff; and if they will not, why, then, sir, it cannot be sustained at all. I am not quite so despairing as the honorable member seems to be. I know nothing which has happened, within the last six or eight months, changing, so materially, the prospects of the tariff. I do not despair of the success of an appeal to the American people, to take a just care of their own interests, and not to sacrifice those vast interests which have grown up under the laws of Congress.

But, sir, out of respect to the economy of the time of the Senate, I will pursue these remarks no farther at present; but will take an opportunity, to-morrow, to lay on the table resolutions expressing my general opinions on this interesting subject.

Mr. FORSYTH said, that as the Senator from Kentucky would not strike out from the bill the clause which he (Mr. F.) had considered as exceptionable, and as he found himself in a situation not to be sustained by many votes, he wished to fortify himself behind a decision of the Vice President, [Mr. CALHOUN,] on a former bill, very similar to the present. A Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BEXTON,] who was not now in his seat, asked leave to bring in a bill to modify the duties on alum salt. The very objection was made to that bill which he now made to the introduction of the bill of the Senator from Kentucky. The President had decided that, as a bill to regulate the duties on imports, in which salt was an item, was before the Senate, the bill of the Senator from Missouri would not be in order. [Mr. CALHOUN made an explanation in a single sentence, which we did not catch.] There was a clause in this bill to raise the duty. On this point his objection was founded. Gentlemen might place what construction they chose on the term "raising revenue." Used separately for raising or reducing revenue, the originating of the bill in this House was unconstitutional; but when a bill embraced both raising and reducing, it was constitutional. He begged to disclaim any idea of opposing the introduction of the bill on any other ground.

Mr. BUCKNER made a few observations, which could not be distinctly heard, as he spoke from under the gallery. He was understood as saying, that he was not prepared to state whether he should go the length of this bill or not; but he was willing to make great concessions to preserve the harmony of the Union; and, as he would not shut out any proposition of a pacific character, he should vote in favor of granting leave to introduce the bill.

Mr. KANE thought that, unless the bill introduced new subjects for duty, it ought not to be viewed as unconstitutional. He made one or two other observations, which were inaudible in the gallery, and stated that he should vote for granting the leave asked.

Mr. HOLMES said, he knew not how a measure to reduce revenue was a measure to raise revenue. Raising, is to lift up; and reducing, is to let down; and how letting down could be lifting up, he had yet to learn. He would be willing to hear gentlemen on the bill; and no one could in courtesy refuse to let a bill be introduced, which no one had heard. If all those members were to be presented, who had voted for the protective system, he wished to know if he was to be included in the indictment; and, if so, whether he was to be tried before the fourth of March, or afterwards? If he was to be tried afterwards, he should be dead. He had been a long time against the system, and some of the Southern gentlemen had warmly advocated it. At length Satan beguiled him, and he did eat. If he was to be tried after the fourth of March, he could sit down on his reserved rights; and they in the East knew how to nullify, when they could make a profit by it. There they had the advantage of South Carolina; she had beat the bush, but Georgia had got the bird; and now that Georgia has got the bird, she says to South Carolina, Don't beat the bush any more, because I have got the bird.

Mr. CHAMBERS suggested to the Senator from Georgia the propriety of withdrawing the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FOOT turned to the journals to show that the bill referred to by the gentleman from Georgia had been introduced, and that a motion, in relation to a point of order, had been laid on the table.

Mr. KING said he had no idea that this question would come up for consideration to-day. He had listened to the explanation of the gentleman from Kentucky with an unmixed pleasure; and, although he was not prepared to take the bill precisely in the form in which it had been reported, he hoped that the speech, so honorable to that Senator, in which he had come to the discussion of the subject, would be imitated by all those who should follow him. For himself, he wished to see this vexed question settled in a peaceful and equitable manner. The motion for leave to introduce a bill he had never seen refused to a Senator since he had a seat on this floor. The Senator from Kentucky might introduce his bill in any form he pleased. It must go to a committee, and that committee could amend it in any way they might think proper, or report it without amendment, and it would then be discussed in Committee of the Whole. He wished to let this bill go on in the ordinary course, and to see a measure in progress which held out the promise of a restoration of peace to the country.

Mr. FORSYTH expressed regret that he should have created so much discussion. He did not oppose the object of the bill; he would not have raised his voice on the subject, if the motion did not call on him to violate a provision of the constitution of the United States. He had referred the Senate to a case in which the Chair had evinced an inclination to decide that the bill could not be received. At the time when this intimation was given, he (Mr. F.) had thought that the decision was incorrect, and that then, as now, it was a question for the decision of the Senate, and not of the President. A bill of this character, however, ought to pass first under the consideration of the immediate representatives of the people. He refused leave to introduce this bill, because the constitution forbids that the first action on a bill of this character should be in the Senate. He had suggested, with a view to get rid of the difficulty, that the objectionable clause should be stricken out. The Senator from Kentucky had no especial favor for it; but the gentleman from Kentucky had not met his wishes. He would now, with a view to get over the difficulty, move to amend the motion for leave, by adding to it the words, "with the exception of those clauses which raise the duties on the articles named therein."

The CHAIR pronounced the motion to amend to be out of order.

Mr. CLAY said, that the clause which the Senator from Georgia wished to have stricken out was essential to the object of the bill. In the progress of the bill, the whole of its provisions, even the title, might be stricken out. He admitted that it was the practice to call all these bills revenue bills. This bill, however, might, with more propriety, be called a bill for the reduction of protection. In reference to the bill of the Senator from Missouri, it originated in this body, and contained an item raising the rate of duty; and it was on the question of the second reading that the President intimated a doubt whether it was in order.

He expressed his great regret that the Senator from Massachusetts did not view this measure in so favorable a light at this moment as he hoped that he would do on further examination of the bill. In reference to the dangers which surround the tariff, he would say, that he believed that there was a majority of the people of the United States decidedly in favor of protection in some form. Still he believed that, from some causes, which the gentleman from Massachusetts was as well informed of as himself, the system was at this moment exposed to very great danger. He concurred with his friend from Massachusetts in the opinion that these dangers might be temporary in their nature, and might be followed by a reaction, during which the tariff of protection might be revived. For one, he would say, without any affectation, that he felt himself to be growing old. He had seen enough of turmoil and strife; and if he could adopt any measure which would pacify the country, he would not trouble himself concerning what might be the effect of it some eight or nine years hence; but would take the present practical good, and remove that alienation of feeling which has so long existed between certain parts of this widely spread confederacy, so as to enable us to transmit to after-times the substantial blessings, as well as the name, of the glorious fabric of wisdom which our fathers bequeathed to us.

The call for the yeas and nays was then, with the assent of the Senate, withdrawn.

The question was then taken on granting leave to introduce the bill; and the bill having been read, as follows:

A bill to modify the act of the 14th July, 1832, and all other acts imposing duties on imports.

1. Be it enacted, &c. That, from and after the 30th day of September, 1833, in all cases where duties are imposed on foreign imports by the act of the 14th day of July, 1832, entitled "An act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," or by any other act, shall exceed twenty per cent. on the value thereof, one-tenth part of such excess shall be deducted; from and after the 30th day of September, 1835, another tenth part shall be deducted; from and after the 30th day of September, 1837, another tenth part thereof shall be deducted; from and after the 30th day of September, 1839, another tenth part thereof shall be deducted; and from and after the 30th day of September, 1841, one-half of the residue of such excess shall be deducted; and from and after the 30th day of September, 1842, the other half thereof shall be deducted.

2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the second section of the act of the 14th of July, aforesaid, as fixes the rate of duty on all milled and fulled cloths, known by the name of plains, kerseys, or kendal cottons, of which wool is the only material, the value whereof does not exceed thirty-five cents a square yard, at five per cent. ad valorem, shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed. And the said articles shall be subjected to the same duty of fifty per cent. as is provided by the said second section for other manufactures of wool; which duty shall be liable to the same deductions as are prescribed by the first section of this act.

3. And be it further enacted, That, until the 30th day of September, 1842, the duties imposed by existing laws, as modified by this act, shall remain, and continue to be collected. And from and after the day last aforesaid, all duties upon imports shall be collected in ready money, and laid for the purpose of raising such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the Government; and, for that purpose, shall be equal upon all articles, according to their value, which are not by this act declared to be entitled to entry, subsequent to the said 30th day of September, 1842, free of duty. And, until otherwise directed by law, from and after the said 30th day of September, 1842, such duties shall be at the rate of twenty per cent. ad valorem; and, from and after that day, all credits now allowed by law in the payment of duties shall be, and hereby are, abolished: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the passage of any law, in the event of war with any foreign Power, for imposing such duties as may be deemed by Congress necessary to the prosecution of such war.

4. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the articles now exempted by the existing laws from the payment of duties, the following articles, imported from and after the 30th day of September, 1833, and until the 30th day of September, 1842, shall also be admitted to entry free from duty, to wit: bleached and unbleached linens, manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be the component material of chief value, coming from this side of the Cape of Good Hope, and worsted stuff goods, shawls, and other manufactures of silk and worsted.

5. And be it further enacted, That from and after the 30th day of September, 1842, the following articles shall be admitted to entry free from duty, to wit: unmanufactured cotton, indigo, quicksilver, opium, tin in plates and sheets, gum arabic, gum senegal, lac dye, madder, madder roots, nuts and berries used in dyeing, saffron, tumeric, woad or pastel, aloes, ambergris, Burgundy pitch, cochineal, camomile flowers, coriander seed, cutsup, chalk, coculus indicus, horn plates for lanterns, or horns, other horns and tips, India rubber, unmanufactured ivory, juniper berries, musk, nuts of all kinds, oil of juniper, manufactured rattans and reeds, tortoise shell, tin foil, shellac, vegetables used principally in dyeing and composing dyes, weld, and all articles employed chiefly for dyeing, except prussiate of potash, chromate of potash; aquafortis, and tartaric acids, and all other dyeing drugs, and materials for composing dyes.

6. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act of the 14th July, 1832, or of any other act as is inconsistent with this act, shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the passage, prior or subsequent to the said 30th day of September, 1842, of any act or acts, from time to time, that may be necessary to detect, prevent, or punish evasions of the duties on imports imposed by law.

Mr. FORSYTH moved that the bill be now read a second time, with a view to its commitment.

This motion requires the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. DICKERSON objected, on the ground that it was too important a bill to be hurried through its stages.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the bill was ordered to be printed.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

The Senate then proceeded to consider the bill to provide further for the collection of the duties on imports.

The question being on the motion of Mr. FORSYTH to strike out the 3d section of the bill—

After a few words from Mr. FORSYTH in defence of his motion,

Mr. KING moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WILKINS asked for the yeas and nays, which being taken, stood as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bibb, Brown, Calhoun, Kane, King, Miller, Moore, Poindexter, Rives, Smith, Tyler—11.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN then made some observations against the motion to strike out.

Mr. BIBB spoke at some length in favor of the motion.

Mr. POINDEXTER moved that the Senate do now adjourn. Negative—yeas 12, nays 25.

The debate was then continued further by Mr. GRUNDY, Mr. KANE, and Mr. SPRAGUE, against the motion, and by Mr. FORSYTH in favor of it.

The question was then taken on the motion to strike out, and decided as follows:

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, the bill, as amended, was ordered to be printed.

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 13.

TARIFF RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WEBSTER rose, and stated that, in pursuance of the notice which he had given yesterday, he wished now to lay on the table some resolutions, expressive of his opinions on the important subjects in relation to which a bill was presented to the Senate yesterday. He would now send the resolutions to the table, and request that they might be read. They would then come up for consideration to-morrow, when he should take an opportunity to make a short explanation of his views of them.

The resolutions were then read, as follows:

Resolved, That the annual revenues of the country ought not to be allowed to exceed a just estimate of the wants of the Government; and that as soon as it shall be ascertained, with reasonable certainty, that the rates of duties on imports, as established by the act of July, 1832, will yield an excess over those wants, provision ought to be made for their reduction; and that, in making this reduction, just regard should be had to the various interests and opinions of different parts of the country, so as most effectually to preserve the integrity and harmony of the Union, and to provide for the common defence, and promote the general welfare of the whole.

But, whereas it is certain that the diminution of the rates of duties on some articles would increase, instead of reducing, the aggregate amount of revenue on such articles; and whereas, in regard to such articles as it has been the policy of the country to protect, a slight reduction on one might produce essential injury, and even distress, to large classes of the community, while another might bear a larger reduction without any such consequences: and whereas, also, there are many articles the duties on which might be reduced, or altogether abolished, without producing any other effect than the reduction of revenue: Therefore,

Resolved, That, in reducing the rates of duties imposed on imports by the act of the 14th of July aforesaid, it is not wise or judicious to proceed by way of an equal reduction per centum on all articles; but that as well the amount as the time of reduction ought to be fixed, in respect to the several articles distinctly, having due regard, in each case, to the questions whether the proposed reduction will affect revenue alone, or how far it will operate injuriously on those domestic manufactures hitherto protected; especially such as are essential in time of war, and such, also, as have been established on the faith of existing laws; and, above all, how far such proposed reduction will affect the rates of wages and the earnings of American manual labor.

Resolved, That it is unwise and injudicious, in regulating imposts, to adopt a plan, hitherto equally unknown in the history of this Government, and in the practice of all enlightened nations, which shall, either immediately or prospectively, reject all discrimination on articles to be taxed, whether they be articles of necessity or of luxury, of general consumption or of limited consumption; and whether they be, or be not, such as are manufactured and produced at home; and which shall confine all duties to one equal rate per centum on all articles.

Resolved, That since the people of the United States have deprived the State Governments of all power of fostering manufactures, however indispensable in peace or in war, or however important to national independence, by commercial regulations, or by laying duties on imports, and have transferred the whole authority to make such regulations, and to lay such duties, to the Congress of the United States, Congress cannot surrender or abandon such power, compatibly with its constitutional duty; and therefore,

Resolved, That no law ought to be passed on the subject of imposts, containing any stipulation, express or implied, or giving any pledge or assurance, direct or indirect, which shall tend to restrain Congress from the full exercise, at all times hereafter, of all its constitutional powers, in giving reasonable protection to American industry, countervailing the policy of foreign nations, and maintaining the substantial independence of the United States.

On motion of Mr. DALLAS, the resolutions were ordered to be printed.

TARIFF BILL.

The bill to modify the act of the 14th of July, 1832, and all other acts imposing duties on imports, was read a second time.

Mr. DICKERSON moved to refer the bill to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. GRUNDY said he only wished to say one word, but before he sat down, he should move to make a different disposition of the bill. It was a measure introduced in a spirit of conciliation and harmony, with a view to the settlement of the dangerous collisions of opinions which exist between different sections of the country. He thought that there was no standing committee of the Senate exactly fit to take charge of the subject. With all respect for the Committee on Manufactures, he should move to refer the bill to a select committee, to consist of seven members, chosen from different sections of the Union—such a committee as would be deemed competent to take care of all the various interests of the Union. He would move the reference to a select committee of seven, and expressed his hope that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] would be placed at the head of that committee.

Mr. CLAY expressed indifference as to the committee to which the bill should be referred. He would be willing to send it to the Committee on Manufactures, with whom, he took pleasure in saying, he had always acted harmoniously, and for the members of which he felt so much personal respect; yet, for the reasons which had been urged by the gentleman from Tennessee, he considered that it would be most expedient to send the subject to the committee for which that gentleman had moved. This did not seem to be a measure for the benefit of any exclusive interest, but for the promotion of the general harmony. He concluded with seconding the motion for a select committee.

Mr. DICKERSON admitted that there was no standing committee which had been raised on the ground of compromise; but as he believed that it was a bill which would operate severely on the manufacturers, he thought that the modifications which might be thought necessary should come from the Committee on Manufactures. Any modification which would make it fall more lightly on that interest would come from that committee. The author of the bill was a member of the Committee on Manufactures, and could explain the character and operation of the bill. The committee, perhaps, entertained more fears of the measure than they ought to feel; and the gentleman from Kentucky might be able to show that such was the fact. He thought that the bill ought to go to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed his gratification that the gentleman from Tennessee had made the motion, and that the gentleman from Kentucky had acquiesced in it. The subject belonged to no existing committee whatever. It was a project for restoring peace and harmony to the country; and he hoped that the motion for a select committee would prevail.

Mr. GRUNDY stated that he desired to put his motion on the ground that the bill did not look to any particular interest. The manufacturers were only to be considered in connexion with other interests. Why, then, should the bill be sent to that committee? This was a great question, looking far beyond any particular interest. It was destined to have a very great influence on the country, and he hoped it would be sent to a committee who would look beyond any particular interest.

Mr. BUCKNER expressed himself as opposed to a select committee. He gave full force to the arguments of gentlemen, that this was not a bill for the benefit of any particular interest, but he still thought that the manufacturers were entitled to be heard. He thought that the subject would be as well considered by the Committee on Manufactures as by a select committee. He thought that the bill would produce mischievous effects on the manufacturers. He said that he was willing to make great concessions to tranquilize the country. If the subject were to be sent to the Committee on Manufactures, the Senate would have the power to change the bill in any of its details. He was opposed to a motion, at the threshold, which would throw doubt on the ability or the impartiality of the Committee on Manufactures, which, for years, had had this subject under their control. He denounced a portion of the bill, as destructive to the interests of a portion of the people of Missouri.

Mr. BELL could not see any valid objection which could be set up to a select committee. He wished the bill to be examined with a disposition to compromise. It was proper that there should be a selection of the members of this committee from different sections of the country. If there was any prospect—and he feared there was not—of settling this agitating question in this way, he would not be willing to cloud it.

Mr. KING said he was in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee. There was a peculiar fitness in sending this question to a select committee. The standing committees were appointed with a reference to specific duties and interests. He wished to harmonize the conflicting interests in the country, and to settle this vexed question. He referred to a former case to show that this was a new case. He hoped there would be no serious objection to the motion.

Mr. HOLMES hoped that the bill would be sent to a select committee, made up from various parts of the country. He was glad the motion had been made by so good-natured a man as the Senator from Tennessee. That gentleman he believed to be the best natured man in the Senate, excepting himself.

Mr. BENTON thought it was unnecessary to send this bill to any committee. He stated some objections to the bill. He doubted whether there would be a majority in the next Congress opposed to a reasonable protection. This bill was based on the act of 1832. There were sixteen members of the Senate who opposed that bill because it was unconstitutional. If these Senators vote for this bill, they vote for that. Jonas was in the belly of the whale.

Mr. MOORE said a few words in favor of the motion for a select committee.

Mr. DALLAS said he was not now disposed to act on the bill as though he completely understood its provisions. There had been some resolutions laid on the table by the gentleman from Massachusetts, not now in his seat. They were very important, and might have an effect on the bill. Those resolutions would come up to-morrow, and he wished to hear the discussion before he gave his vote on this subject. He moved to lay the bill on the table.

The question was taken on the motion to lay on the table, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Chambers, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Hendricks, Knight, Robbins, Smith, Tipton, Wilkins, Wright—13.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hill, Holmes, Johnston, Kane, King, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Rives, Robinson, Seymour, Sprague, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggaman, White—26.

The question then recurred on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Manufactures, which was taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Buckner, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Knight, Prentiss, Robbins, Smith, Wilkins, Wright—12.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Black, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Foot, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Holmes, Johnston, Kane, King, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Rives, Robinson, Seymour, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggaman, White—26.

The bill was then referred to a select committee.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The act for the continuation of the Cumberland road from Vandalia, in the State of Illinois, to Jefferson, in the State of Missouri, was read a third time.

Mr. FOOT asked for the yeas and nays upon its passage, which were ordered, and stood as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Johnston, Kane, Poindexter, Robbins, Robinson, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Webster—16.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Black, Foot, Hill, King, Knight, Moore, Naudain, Prentiss, Rives, Smith, White—12.

So the bill was passed.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Matthew St. Clair Clarke, their clerk, stating that the House was ready to proceed to the counting of the votes given for President and Vice President, and were waiting to receive the Senate.

Mr. GRUNDY then moved that the Senate proceed to the House of Representatives, for the purpose of performing the duties referred to in the message; which motion having been agreed to,

The Senate, preceded by the President pro tempore, attended the hall of the House of Representatives; and, after having performed the duties which called them there, returned, at twenty minutes past two o'clock, to their seats in the Senate; when

Mr. GRUNDY offered the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That a committee of one member of the Senate be appointed, to join a committee of two members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by that House, to wait on ANDREW JACKSON, of Tennessee; and to notify him that he has been duly elected President of the United States for four years, commencing on the fourth day of March next; and, also, to notify MARTIN VAN BUREN, of New York, that he has been duly elected Vice President of the United States for four years, commencing on the fourth day of March next.

EVENING SESSION.

After a recess of two hours, the Senate reassembled at five o'clock; shortly after which, a quorum not being present,

Mr. WILKINS rose and said, that as he was quite in earnest when he had moved for the recess, in order that the business of the Senate might be proceeded with, he would now move that such Senators as were absent be sent for.

Mr. FORSYTH hoped the Senator from Pennsylvania would not press his motion; but a few minutes had yet elapsed, and he had no doubt but that the Senators would soon appear in their places. A motion of this description, he conceived, should never be had recourse to, but as a dernier resort; and he, therefore, hoped the gentleman would withdraw his motion.

Mr. WILKINS expressed his assent, and the motion was accordingly withdrawn.

SPECIAL ORDER.

On motion of Mr. WILKINS, the Senate then took up the bill further to provide for the collection of the duties on imports.

Mr. BIBB said, that it was not his wish then to touch on the general merits of the bill. He would divide the provisions of the bill, however, into two parts; military and civil. With regard to what he classed as the civil point, he would say, that he had no objection to give to the Judiciary more than ordinary powers, to meet any extraordinary exigencies that might arise; he was willing to do this by all acts that were constitutional. But, when he had said this, he was compelled to express his opinion that the third section exceeded this bound, and that it was unguarded, and too wide-spreading in its provisions. These provisions required to be amended, to bring them within the constitutional limits of this Government; and, with the object of guarding the constitution, we ran the risk, by these clauses, as they now stood, of breaking the constitution itself. In his opinion, prudence, caution, and great deliberation were necessary, lest a political spirit should hurry both parties into the adoption of measures that might hereafter become precedents, which they might not ever be able to get rid of. He would now declare, explicitly, that he was prepared, so far as regarded proper judicial powers, to vote for them, if left unconnected with the military powers. He was not, at that moment, ready to submit propositions to make the amendments necessary to his view; but he would appeal to the chairman of the committee, if he had not, on more occasions than one, and in the most friendly spirit, requested of that committee that they would turn their best attention to these clauses, as requiring amendment? He would entreat further time, either for himself or others who were disposed to do what the constitution would permit, in order to submit propositions to amend these sections. For himself, he had not had sufficient time to devise what he might consider a safe and secure mode to remove cases of a certain nature to different tribunals; or what might be necessary still further to provide for a supervisory power in the federal courts over State enactments. He therefore asked that the bill should not be hurried out of committee, but that it might still remain subject to those amendments which might go to support the Judiciary. He had, it was true, been requested by a gentleman who was acquainted with legal pursuits, that he (Mr. B.) would turn his attention, in order that, from the experience he might have derived from his professional avocations, he would endeavor to propose such an amendment as might be sufficient and constitutional; that would possess the golden mean; that would steer clear of Scylla on the one side, and Charybdis on the other; and so that all due power might be given to the Federal Government, without encroaching on the rights of the States. Though late and ardently engaged, his various avocations had not yet permitted him that time; and hoping that the bill might not be taken out of committee, he would conclude by moving that the question be postponed and made the special order for to-morrow.

Mr. GRUNDY said, that if it were understood that the debate which had been progressing for some time past were to be considered at an end, he would have no objection to the postponement; but he thought this could not be the case, and that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BIBB] would have ample time to propose his propositions. With regard to the peculiar provisions which had been objected to, he must say, that the committee have now put them into such shape that they are prepared to meet the decision on them without further change. He was for assisting the General Government to meet the present exigencies, and he was not willing to vote for the postponement.

Mr. BIBB said it was not his intention to prevent the debate from proceeding; and if any gentleman wished to address the Senate, he was willing to withdraw his motion.

Mr. MOORE expressed his intention of recording his sentiments on the measure; but not thinking that the discussion was about to come to a close, he did not feel himself sufficiently prepared to proceed at that moment. He was of opinion that much more time would yet be occupied before the discussion was concluded; others besides himself would have something to say, and he would therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WILKINS opposed the motion, and asked for the ayes and noes.

Mr. MOORE replied, that when such was the mode about to be adopted, he was quite willing then, unprepared as he was, to give his views. He was unwilling that the Senate should be harassed by the system that had been carried into operation, of calling the ayes and noes, on his account.

Mr. WILKINS said he did not know whether the allusion had been to him of harassing the Senate, but as regarded himself he cared but little for the opinion that had been expressed; he was only discharging his duty, and—

There were here cries of order, when

Mr. BIBB rose, and said he would now, on his own part, renew his former motion for postponement.

Mr. WILKINS asked for the ayes and noes.

Mr. KING said he was unwilling to trespass on the Senate; but in the remarks he was about to make, he was actuated by a true desire to bring the subject to a close. One of their body appeared not to know that by pressing the question onward was not the best mode to obtain his object. There could be nothing gained by such a course; remove the question from the committee, it would be equally open to continue the discussion. He (Mr. K.) was desirous that his colleague [Mr. Moore] should have a fair hearing, and he hoped that every member would have an opportunity to deliver his sentiments or offer amendments at his will.

Mr. WILKINS hoped it would now be in order for him to explain the course he had hitherto pursued. He conceived he had only done his duty. It must be admitted that the present was the most important measure that could be brought before them; and therefore did he think it should not be put off by unnecessary delay. It was three weeks since the bill had been first reported; it had been under debate for a fortnight; and how did it come, he would ask, that those gentlemen who would proclaim themselves as the only patriots to save the country, are still unprepared, are still desirous of delay? Why is it that those who are opposed to this measure, whenever it comes up, are raising those delays? Motion follows motion to adjourn, to postpone, to lay on the table. Why not meet it at once in a proper spirit? The allegation of gentlemen not being yet prepared, he was not willing to admit; he himself had been constrained to occupy the floor some days when he was equally unprepared; but he was willing to pursue his course; and, prepared or unprepared, discharge his duty to the best of his ability. As regarded the objection raised by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Bibb] to the judiciary clauses, and the opinion advanced of the removal of criminal prosecutions from the State courts being unconstitutional, let that gentleman make a motion at once to strike out the provision, and this would bring up the question. As regarded the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Moore], as he (Mr. W.) was not aware of that gentleman's intention to address the Senate, it could not be supposed that he had any desire to embarrass him. He was under the impression that another gentleman, a Senator from Virginia, [Mr. Rives], would occupy the floor.

Mr. BIBB, after a few remarks in reply, moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill, and to make it the special order for to-morrow, in order to afford him time to examine the third section more at his leisure.

The yeas and nays being ordered on this question, it was decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Calhoun, King, Miller, Moore, Poindexter, Tyler.—8.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Dudley, Dickerson, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Holmes, Johnston, Kane, Naudain, Robinson, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Webster, White, Wilkins, Wright.—30.

Mr. MOORE then rose to make a few remarks on the bill. He said he rose with no hypocritical pretence of an extraordinary attachment to the Union. As members of this body, said he, we have all sworn to support the constitution, and I concede to each as earnest a desire to fulfil this duty as I know that I myself feel. I, sir, am proud to be an American citizen; I am proud to be a citizen of the State of Alabama; I am proud of the honor of a seat in this Senate. But much as I prize this name, and proud as I am of the honor assigned to me by the partiality and indulgence of my fellow-citizens, I should be false to them, to their interests, and to myself, if I could permit this bill to become a law without having done all in my power to prevent it.

Much has been said about the course which South Carolina has adopted. I do not feel called upon to defend either her principles or her action; that task will be performed by those to whom she has assigned that duty.

In my opinion this bill presents another issue, which involves directly the rights, the interests, and the liberty of my constituents. It proposes to clothe the President of the United States with dictatorial and discretionary powers. It does more; it proposes to place the issue of civil war upon the discretion of a captain of a revenue cutter, the caprice of a young lieutenant fresh from school, or the folly of a tide-waiter.

It makes the President of the United States a national dictator, and converts the agents who may be intrusted with the execution of his supreme discretion into petty chieftains, who are required to trample upon the judicial authorities of the States. You see it places the military above the civil authority, and substitutes a military despotism for the peaceful administration of the laws.

But we are told by the honorable chairman of the committee who reported this bill, [Mr. WILKINS], that we may safely intrust these extraordinary powers to the hands of Andrew Jackson, because he assures us Andrew Jackson never has abused power." I congratulate the honorable gentleman upon the extent of his faith. It is at least equal to "the grain of mustard seed," and it may yet accomplish miracles. The honorable gentleman should remember that this bill proposes to authorize the President to transfer these extraordinary powers to his agents. Great as the President is, powerful as we all know him to be, he must employ agents to execute his will; and it necessarily follows that that discretion with which you clothe the President must be by him transferred to his agents, to the commanders of his army and his navy, to the collectors of the revenue, to his marshals and his bailiffs. I am not disposed to make a question with the gentleman about his faith in the President; but I would ask him, are you prepared to grant such powers on the faith which you repose in such agents as these? But, sir, away with such solemn trifling. I consider this a question of liberty, and not of faith; and I can assure him, that if his constituents, the free laborers, of which we have heard so much, permit their representatives to bring their liberties as a faith offering, a propitiation to conciliate the good will of the President, those of whom I am an unworthy representative place theirs above all price. Sir, the people of Alabama are as much devoted to this Union, as established by our fathers, as the people of any other State can be; they are devoted to the Union, but they are devoted to it, not as the means of oppression, not as the source of civil war, but as the palladium of liberty. I have said, sir, that I am not called upon to defend either the principles or the action of South Carolina. I have said that this bill makes another issue, which involves directly the rights, interests, and liberty of my constituents. The gentleman tells us about the free labor of the North; and they tell us that they never will consent that this free labor of the North shall be reduced to the same condition as the slave labor of the South. Do gentlemen forget that there are free laborers in the South as well as in the North? Do gentlemen forget that the object of this constitution and of our Union was to secure equal rights, peace, and happiness to all our citizens? If they concede this, (and none will be so lost to all sense of propriety as to deny the truth of the assertion,) what right has the free laborer of the North to demand that his labor shall be protected at the expense of the free labor, or even the slave labor of the South? Yes, sir, I say of the slave labor of the South. For, sir, with us, labor is labor; it matters not whether it be of the slave or of the free, of the bondsman or his master; in fact, there can be none in theory, but in the minds of those hypocritical pretenders in philanthropy, who would emancipate our slaves under the pretence that "all men are born free and equal," and butcher their masters with mercenary bayonets; but as the gentleman from Pennsylvania who spoke last [Mr. DALLAS] does not like the word mercenary, I will say the bayonets of power; because we insist that it never was intended by the framers of the constitution to tax the slave labor of the South for the purpose of protecting "the free labor of the North." Your northern gentlemen have a holy horror at holding a fellow-creature in bondage, but they feel no horror at the idea of sending an army to compel the owners of these slaves to pay over all the profits of these slaves into the pockets of the northern manufacturers and capitalists. They consider slavery a most heinous offence against God and man; yet they call upon us, in the name of all that is dear in religion and morals, to authorize them to overrun South Carolina with fire and sword, unless she will pay over to them the profits of her slave labor. Or, in other words, they are too pious, too benevolent, to own slaves themselves; but they ask us very modestly, sir, to convert the owners of slaves in South Carolina into their overseers; superintending cotton fields and rice plantations for their benefit.

SENATE.]

Election of Printer.—Tariff Resolutions, &c.

Yes, Mr. President, disguise this matter as you will, this is the question. We have long seen the tendency and object of the tariff policy. We deny your right to protect the free labor of the North, at the expense of the slave labor of the South. With us there is no distinction between the labor of the slave and the labor of the free, of the bondsman and his master.

The God of nature, nor the constitution, which alone has the right to determine what shall be law upon this subject, has made no distinction, and we will not permit this Government to do it; to yield such a power would be to permit the free laborers of the North to convert the masters of our slaves into the slaves of northern masters. And it is because I believe the bill involves this question, and because I know the people of Alabama have a common interest with the people of South Carolina in resisting this oppression, that I am opposed to this bill.

We hear gentlemen loud in the praises of the constitution, vociferous in their professions of attachment to the Union. I can tell them, nay, they have been told again and again, how they can maintain the constitution, and preserve the Union. Reject this bill, and modify the tariff; do justice, and the necessity for force will cease.

But some gentlemen seem to think they must support the President. I can understand why the Senators representing manufacturing States, and particularly those who never had any constitutional scruples upon the question of power, should support this bill. Although we are told this measure originated with the Executive, I can find no apology in that suggestion, which could justify me, as a Senator representing a Southern State—yes, sir, a slave-holding, anti-tariff State—if I were so far to sacrifice their interest as to vote for this bill. I know, sir, that the President has a commanding popularity among my people; the honest, unsuspecting planters and laborers of Alabama gave him their confidence when he was a plain unpretending planter like themselves. But they voted for Andrew Jackson to be the President of a free people, subject to all the restraints of the constitution; they did not expect that he would ask to be clothed with dictatorial powers, much less that he would march at the head of a standing army for the purpose of enforcing, at the point of the bayonet, the collection of odious, unjust, unequal, and unconstitutional taxes.

But I warn gentlemen to pause. Who is it that are now so anxious to clothe the President with these new, undefined powers? Are they not his old enemies? Are they not his late opponents? But, sir, I give them my thanks. I am the representative of a brave, generous, and, therefore, a confiding people. Yet, there are in Alabama, as there are in all other States, "waiters upon Providence"—men whose highest ambition it is to worship power.

The policy of our adversaries has been to purchase these false guides, and weaken our resistance by internal dissensions.

If gentlemen will disregard all our entreaties; if, instead of claiming the promise made the peacemakers, they still persist in the exercise of injustice and oppression; if, instead of reducing the duties and giving us peace, harmony, strength, and brotherly love, they force upon us this bill, they will do us one favor, they will force us to be united; they will unbind the eyes of our people; they will then see who it is that "have sung peace, peace, when there was no peace." I again would say to those gentlemen who suppose they are to reap a golden harvest of profit or of honors from this measure, "You may have the power to pass your bill through this House; you may have the physical strength and the same generous majority by which you have passed your tariffs; but you cannot enforce it. I defy you, with all the sycophants, hirelings, and office-seekers now waiting for command. You may sweep the streets of your cities, and empty your workshops and manufacturing establishments, at this enlightened hour, and in this free country, you cannot enforce it. We know our rights, and, knowing them, dare maintain and defend them."

The committee rose and reported the bill as amended; and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. POINDEXTER expressed a hope that the final decision would be postponed for a day longer; and

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN,

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 14.

ELECTION OF PRINTER.

The resolution fixing the election of a public printer for Friday was then taken up for consideration.

Mr. BENTON moved to lay the resolution on the table for the present. He reminded the Senate that he had introduced a resolution to alter the time for this election. That resolution had gone to the Library Committee, and, until the report of that committee should be made, he hoped this resolution would not now be acted on. He withdrew his motion at the request of

Mr. CHAMBERS, who stated that the House had fixed on 12 o'clock this day for the election of a printer. Consequently, the resolution of the Senator from Missouri was too late to have any effect on the election of the next printer.

Mr. BENTON said, that if this resolution were now to be acted on, he should feel bound to offer at length the reasons which had induced him to introduce his joint resolution. He renewed his motion to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was then agreed to—yeas 19, nays 12.

TARIFF RESOLUTIONS.

The Senate then proceeded to consider the resolutions offered yesterday by Mr. WEBSTER.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that it had been for some time his wish, on this most interesting subject, to express his own opinions, as briefly as possible, in the form of resolutions, and to follow up those resolutions with a few remarks. It would be agreeable to him to go on at once in the performance of this task, were it not for the standing order which required that the special order shall be called every day at 12 o'clock. As he did not wish to interfere with the important discussion which would commence at that hour, if the gentleman who proposed to occupy the floor to-day on that subject was now ready to proceed, he would postpone what he had to say on the subject of his resolutions until to-morrow.

Mr. FORSYTH suggested that the Senate would be glad to listen to the gentleman from Massachusetts at this time, even if he should transcend the hour for the calling of the special order.

Mr. CALHOUN said he would conform himself, in this instance, to the convenience of the Senator from Virginia who was expected to occupy the floor.

Mr. RIVES stated that he was entirely in the hands of the Senate. He was prepared to proceed with his remarks now, if such was the pleasure of the Senate, or to suspend them until after the Senator from Massachusetts should have been heard.

On motion of Mr. CHAMBERS, the resolutions were then laid on the table.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the bill to provide further for the collection of the duties on imports.

Mr. RIVES, of Virginia, then rose and addressed the Senate, as follows:

Mr. President: Stranger as I am in this body, and now

FEB. 14, 1833.]

Revenue Collection Bill.

[SENATE.]

almost a stranger in my own country, though in spirit and affection never separated from it, I feel that I owe an apology to the Senate for obtruding myself at all upon its attention. Sir, I do it with great reluctance, and with a deep sense of the disadvantages under which I labor. Most of the questions involved in the discussion of the bill now under consideration have sprung up during the period of my absence from the country; and the short interval which has elapsed since my return has afforded me neither the time nor the opportunity for a detailed examination of them. I bring to them, therefore, no other resources of argument or illustration than those settled principles and fundamental notions which are rooted in the mind of every American citizen, in regard to the constitution of his country.

Sir, the questions now to be settled are of the deepest import to the destinies of this country. They touch not the construction of this or that clause of the constitution only; they go to the whole frame and structure of the Government, and the vital principle of its existence. Sir, I should be recreant to my duty on this floor, as the representative of a State which, under Providence, had the chief agency in the establishment of this happy system of Government, if I did not attempt, however feebly, the expression of my views on such an occasion.

I am impelled to this expression, Mr. President, by another consideration. It is my misfortune to differ from my worthy and honorable colleague, as well as from other honorable Senators coming from the same quarter of the Union as myself, in several of the views I have taken of this subject. It is due to them, as well as to myself and those whom we represent, that the grounds of this difference of opinion should be stated and explained. And, in order to preclude all misapprehension, I beg leave to say, in the outset, that no one is or has been more thoroughly opposed to that whole system of policy usually denominated the American system than I have been, and still am. My voice, sir, has been often and strenuously, however ineffectually, raised against it in another division of this Capitol. I consider it unjust in principle, inexpedient in practice, oppressive and unequal in its operation—in short, an abuse of power contrary to the true genius of our institutions.

But, sir, what is entitled to far more consideration, the State which I have the honor in part to represent has repeatedly and strongly protested against this system; and it is but yesterday that her Legislature earnestly renewed her appeal to the councils of the nation so to modify the system as to remove the just causes of complaint which had arisen against it. Sir, this appeal, and similar appeals which have emanated from the Legislatures of other States, fortified by all those high considerations of patriotism, policy, and justice, which the crisis suggests, cannot fail to have their proper effect. There is every reason to believe that this distracting question will be settled, and speedily and satisfactorily settled, as it ought to be. But, notwithstanding these grounds of hope, one of the States of the Union has rashly undertaken to redress her griefs by a formal abrogation of the laws of the United States within her limits. She has declared the whole series of revenue laws, from the origin of the Government to the present day, to be null and void; has prohibited their execution within her borders, under high penalties; and has ordained various other measures with the express view of defeating and arresting their operation.

In this state of things, we are called upon to say if the Government of the United States shall acquiesce in this open defiance and violation of the laws of the Union, without taking any step whatever for their enforcement? For myself, I am free to say that I do not thus read my oath to support the constitution of the United States. I do not thus understand my duty to my country, or the interest and the honor of my own State. What, sir, will be the consequence, if South Carolina be permitted, without opposition, to nullify the revenue laws of the Union? Will not that uniformity of imposts, and that equality in the fiscal and commercial regulations of the Union, which are guaranteed by the constitution, be at once abolished by the arbitrary act of South Carolina, to her own advantage, and to the detriment of the other States? Sir, as a representative of Virginia, I am not willing that Virginia shall be compelled to pay taxes, while South Carolina, by her own illegal and unauthorized action, is suffered to go quit of them. Yet this must be the unjust consequence of acquiescence in nullification; or, otherwise, a result still more distressing to the whole country will ensue—the entire commerce of the country will be drawn to the free ports of South Carolina; the ports of the other States, with all the important branches of industry connected with them, will be consigned to ruin; and, at the same time, the whole revenue of the nation will be cut off and destroyed.

Bad as these consequences, or any of them, may be, there is yet another view of the subject of still higher importance. The example would inflict a mortal wound on the constitution. The Government would be thenceforward virtually dissolved, and we should inevitably fall back into the anarchy and confusion of the articles of confederation; if, indeed, after such an example of weakness, the States should continue connected by any tie whatever.

For one, therefore, I feel myself constrained, by the highest considerations of duty, to give my assent to such measures as may be necessary and proper to provide for the execution of the laws, while they remain un repealed. There are some provisions in the bill now under consideration of which I do not approve, as I shall have occasion to say more fully when I come to explain my own ideas of the legislation best adapted to meet the crisis. But we are met at the threshold with a preliminary denial of the right of the Government to adopt any measures whatever for the execution of a law of the United States which shall have been nullified by the authorities of a State. This position has been maintained by both the honorable Senators from South Carolina, and especially by the honorable Senator who spoke first, [Mr. CALHOUN,] in the remarks made by him at the time of submitting his resolutions which are now lying on your table.

How, sir, has this extraordinary position been attempted to be sustained? One would have supposed that a power so radically affecting the whole operation of our system as an absolute State veto of the laws of the Union, would have been in some form or other expressed in the constitution. Instead of this, we find an express declaration that the constitution and laws of the United States shall control and be supreme over the constitution and laws of the respective States. Yet the honorable Senator [Mr. CALHOUN] seeks to do away all this, by setting up the metaphysical deductions and ingenious creations of his own mind in the place of the positive terms of the instrument itself. Sir, I propose to follow the honorable Senator, step by step, in the process of reasoning by which he has attained so singular a result. And, as I am anxious to deal with his argument in all possible fairness, I will first state what I understood that argument to be, in order that, if I shall have fallen into a misapprehension of any part of it, the honorable Senator may set me right.

I understand the honorable Senator, then, thus: After stating that the problem is to ascertain where the paramount power of the system is, and that that power must be where the sovereignty is, he proceeds by saying that the constitution of the United States is a compact between the several States; that these States only are sovereign; that the Government of the United States is not sovereign, because, according to the principles of modern political science, sovereignty is not the attribute of any Government; that it resides in the people; that the only people known to the true theory of our institutions is the people of the several States, distinctly; that if the people of any one State in the Union, therefore, shall, in its sovereign capacity, interpose between its citizens and the Government of the United States, the act of a sovereign being always binding on its citizens, the citizens of that State can no longer owe obedience to the Government of the United States, or be properly subject to its action; but that if the act of the State, so absolving its citizens from obedience to the United States, be a violation of the compact with the other States, it is the State only as a political community that is responsible. I hope, sir, I have stated the reasoning of the Senator fairly, as I have wished and intended to do.

Now, sir, in regard to the first proposition laid down by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [MR. CALHOUN,] it gives me pleasure to say that I am entirely of accord with him. Here we draw our principles from the same pure fountain—the republican doctrines of '98 and '99, as asserted at that time by the Legislature of my own State. If there be any thing in politics or history resting on grounds of incontrovertible evidence and conclusive demonstration, it is that the constitution of the United States was adopted by the people of the United States, not as an aggregate mass of individuals, but as separate and independent communities. This, sir, is the foundation-stone of our federal system; and every attempt to displace it has resulted in acknowledged failure, and has only served to establish it the more firmly.

But, sir, are the other propositions of the honorable Senator [MR. CALHOUN] equally true? Is it true, that there is no other sovereignty, known to our political system, than that which resides in the people of each State distinctly? And here, sir, as the chief source of difficulty in all discussions of this sort is in the vague use of terms, let us fix what we mean by sovereignty. The elementary idea of sovereignty is that of supreme, uncontrolled power; and when applied to political organizations, I agree with the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [MR. CALHOUN,] that it cannot, with propriety, be predicated of Government, which is a delegated and limited trust, but that it resides exclusively in the body of the community, which creates and establishes the Government. I readily grant, then, that the Government of the United States possess no sovereignty. The honorable Senator [MR. CALHOUN] seems to have supposed that, this being admitted, it would necessarily follow that the only sovereignty known to our political system is in the people of each State distinctly, there being, as he contends, no other people, according to its true theory, than the people of the several States, separately considered. But, sir, this argument obviously overlooks the peculiar nature of our complex organization, which embraces two distinct species of communities; the separate communities, called the States, formed by the individuals who compose those States respectively; and the general community, called the United States, formed by the association of all the States into a political Union. There is one body politic or community as clearly resulting from the association of States in the one case, as there is such body politic or community resulting from the association of individuals in the other. In the body of the community, the sovereignty of each system resides; that of the federal system, in the community called the United States; that of the State systems, in the body of the community called the State. You will remark, Mr. President, that I here speak of the United States, as contradistinguished from the Government of the United States; and I contend that the term United States, as used in our political nomenclature, designates one body politic, one integral community, (although a community composed of States,) in which sovereignty resides, as to certain purposes, as truly as it resides in the States, or several communities composed of individuals, for the purposes of their organization.

I should not think it necessary, Mr. President, to dwell on an idea, which, to my mind, is so obvious, if I did not know that the suggestion of any unity in our federal organization had recently given rise to such dissatisfaction, and if we did not live in times when the best settled principles have been boldly called in question. It may not be amiss, therefore, to bring a few proofs to the support of what I have ventured to assert—that the United States do form, to certain purposes, one community, one integral political body. We are all agreed that the United States form a confederate republic. Now, sir, what is the definition of a confederate republic by that writer, who, among the political philosophers of modern times, seems to have best understood its characteristics, and to have most justly appreciated its advantages? Montesquieu says, "A confederate republic is a convention by which several smaller States agree to become members of a larger one, which they intend to form. It is a kind of assemblage of societies that constitute a new one," &c. The writers of the Federalist, in the 9th number, referring to what Montesquieu says on this subject, add, "The definition of a confederate republic seems simply to be 'an assemblage of societies,' or an association of two or more States into one State."

But, sir, let us appeal to a distinguished authority which is often invoked by the politicians of South Carolina, and for which I challenge a portion of their respect, on the present occasion. Mr. Jefferson, sir, in a letter to Mr. Edmund Randolph, which will be found in the 3d volume of his published correspondence, written on the 18th August, 1799, in the very crisis of that great struggle for constitutional principles which terminated in the "civil revolution" of 1801, and when he must be supposed to have weighed well all the bearings of his words, uses the following language: "Before the revolution, there existed no such nation as the United States; they then first associated as a nation, but for special purposes only. They had all their laws to make, as Virginia had on her first establishment as a nation. But they did not, as Virginia had done, proceed to adopt a whole system of laws ready made to their hand. As their association as a nation was only for special purposes," &c.

Sir, it would be easy to show, if the time of the Senate were not too precious to be consumed in unnecessary discussion, that the recognition here made of the United States as forming one nation, for certain purposes, is of particular weight, from the nature of the question which Mr. Jefferson was then discussing, and which would have rendered his course of argument much shorter and simpler, if he could have denied altogether the existence of any national individuality in the United States.

But, sir, without insisting on the particular weight of Mr. Jefferson's authority, in this view of it, I would ask if the same language has not been habitually used by all our great men who were contemporary with the formation of the constitution, and with the vital questions of construction to which the first ten years of its operation gave rise? We all remember, Mr. President, that General Washington, in that noble monument of patriotism and wisdom, his farewell address, speaks of the "unity of Government which constitutes us one people," and of the States as bound together by "an indissoluble community of interest as one nation." Mr. Madison, than whom certainly no higher authority can be appealed to, in regard to that constitution which is the workmanship of his own hands, thus writes in his letter to the editor of the North American Review: "The constitution of the United States, being a compact among the States in their highest sovereign capacity, and constituting the people thereof one people for certain purposes, cannot be altered or annulled."

ed at the will of the States individually, as the constitution of a State may be at its individual will."

But why add to this list of distinguished authorities, further than to cite the authority of the honorable Senator from South Carolina himself? In his letter to Governor Hamilton, published during the last summer, I find the following passage: "The General Government is the joint organ of all the States confederated into one general community." And again: "In the execution of the delegated powers, the Union is no longer regarded in reference to its parts, but as forming one great community, to be governed by a common will," &c.

If, then, the United States do form "one community, governed by a common will," sovereignty may and does exist in the body of that community, for the special purposes of the Union, just as effectually and unquestionably as sovereignty exists in the people of an individual State, for State purposes. My answer, then, and I flatter myself a conclusive one, to the argument of the honorable Senator, is, that the sovereignty of our federal system is neither in the Government of the United States, nor in the people of the individual States separately considered, but in that "great community" or body politic, called the United States, resulting from the association of all the States for special purposes. Mr. Jefferson, in the letter to Mr. Randolph from which I read the extract cited a few moments ago, says, very properly, that "the whole body of the nation" or community "is the sovereign power for itself."

There is a practical criterion, of very easy application in our American institutions, for determining where sovereignty resides. Sovereignty resides where the power of amending the constitution or fundamental law resides. In a single State, this power resides in the people of the State; and, of course, the sovereignty resides in them also. In the Union, this power resides in the federal community composed of all the States; and, according to an express provision in the constitution, requires for its exercise the concurrence of three-fourths of the States. According to this plain practical test, then, the actual sovereignty of the Union is in three-fourths of the States.

Here, again, I am happy to fortify myself by an authority, which, if not that of the honorable Senator himself, as it is generally understood to be, must at least command his very high respect. I allude to the report and exposition adopted by the Legislature of South Carolina in December, 1828. From that document I beg leave to read to the Senate the following extract:

"Our system, then, consists of two distinct and independent sovereignties. The general powers conferred on the General Government are subject to its sole and exclusive control, and the States cannot, without violating the constitution, interpose their authority to check or in any manner counteract its movements, so long as they are confined to its proper sphere; so also the peculiar and local powers reserved to the States are subject to their exclusive control, nor can the General Government interfere with them, without, on its part, also violating the constitution. In order to have a full and clear conception of our institutions, it will be proper to remark that there is in our system a striking distinction between the Government and the sovereign power. Whatever may be the true doctrine in regard to the sovereignty of the States individually, it is unquestionably clear that, while the Government of the Union is vested in its legislative, executive, and judicial departments, the actual sovereign power resides in the several States, who created it, in their separate and distinct political character. But, by an express provision of the constitution, it may be amended or changed by three-fourths of the States; and each State, by assenting to the constitution with this provision, has surrendered its original rights as a sovereign, which made its individual consent necessary to any change in its political condition, and has placed this important power in the hands of three-fourths of the States, in which the sovereignty of the Union, under the constitution, does now actually reside."

Here, then, Mr. President, we have a distinct acknowledgement, in accordance with the principles I have laid down, that the sovereignty of the federal system is not in the people of any one of the States, acting separately, as the honorable Senator now contends, but in three-fourths of the States, acting concurrently. The honorable Senator has told us that the paramount power of controlling the General Government must reside where the sovereignty of the system resides. The problem stated by him was to ascertain where that power does reside, and is here conclusively solved by his own State, in a solemn exposition drawn up by himself. The plain result is, that the paramount or sovereign power is not in the people of any one State, but in three-fourths of all the States.

This important document, also, in acknowledging that there "are two distinct and independent sovereignties" in our complex organization, recognises the correctness of another of the positions I have laid down—that there is sovereignty in the United States, in regard to the purposes of the Union, as well as sovereignty in the several States, for State purposes. It has become fashionable, of late, to deny that there is any sovereignty in the United States, (I speak, of course, of the United States as a political community, and not of the Government of the United States,) and to claim for the States, separately, an absolute, complete, and unqualified sovereignty, to all intents and purposes whatever. Sir, this is a novelty unknown to the founders of the constitution, and has sprung up in the hotbed of excited local politics. At the period of the adoption of the constitution, it was distinctly made known, and universally understood, that to the extent to which sovereignty was vested in the Union, that of the States severally was relinquished and diminished. What is said, sir, by the convention which framed the constitution, in communicating their work to Congress to be submitted to the people? The following unequivocal language is held in the letter addressed by the convention to Congress, on that occasion, and signed by General Washington, as president of the convention: "It is obviously impracticable, in the Federal Government of these States, to secure all the rights of independent sovereignty to each, and yet provide for the interest and safety of all. Individuals entering into society must give up a share of liberty to preserve the rest," &c. Let not any attempt be made to lessen the weight of this declaration by representing it as the expression of the individual sentiment of General Washington, by whom the letter was signed. The draught of the letter was carefully prepared, under the orders of the convention, by the same committee which was charged with giving the final shape to the constitution itself; and both were sanctioned and adopted by the convention, at the same time. It was, then, the solemn explanation of their own act by the convention themselves, made known to the people, and understood by them, when the States ratified and adopted the constitution.

But, sir, let us trace this matter a little further. Among the contemporary publications, explaining and recommending the new constitution, the essays of the Federalist, as well for the distinguished ability with which they were written, as for the high character of the authors, two of whom were members of the convention which framed the constitution, were universally read and profoundly considered. In the letter of Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Gerry, an extract of which was read the other day by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. DALLAS,] it is said with great force and propriety, that the constitution should always be understood "in the sense in which it was advocated by its friends, and adopted by the States." Now, sir, let us see in what light it was presented to the people, in reference to this question of State sovereignty, by its distinguished advocates and expounders, the writers of the Federalist. Nothing would have been better calculated to procure its ready adoption by the States, than to have told them that it left their sovereignty entirely unimpaired. But, sir, its honest and enlightened advocates, the writers of the Federalist, attempted no such imposition on the good sense of the people. They told them, distinctly, that "sovereignty in the Union, and complete independence in the members, are things repugnant and irreconcilable."—Fed. No. 15.

In the 45th No. of that publication, where Mr. Madison is noticing the objection that the new constitution would curtail the States of some important attributes of their sovereignty, instead of denying the charge, as it might have been politic to do in order to appease the jealousy of State pride, he boldly admits and justifies the fact. He tells the people of America, that if it be demonstrated that the Union is necessary to secure their happiness, necessary to secure them against foreign wars, against war and contention among the States, against violent and oppressive factions, against overgrown military establishments, and against all the other nameless ills that would be the inevitable consequence of separation, it is idle to object to a constitution, without which that Union cannot be maintained, that it would curtail the States of a portion of their sovereignty. On the contrary, he adds, that so far as a sacrifice of a portion of State sovereignty shall be necessary to the objects of the Union, thus shown to be indispensable to the happiness of the people, the voice of every good citizen must be, let the sacrifice be made. Sir, the sacrifice was freely made, to the extent required by the great objects of the Union; but all that portion of sovereignty not necessary to be vested in the Union for those high purposes still remains unimpaired in the respective States.

In pursuance of this leading truth, the language habitually used in the Federalist to characterize the sovereignty of the States is, the "residuary sovereignty of the States," or "the portion of sovereignty remaining in the States," after that which is surrendered to the Union. In rapidly glancing over this celebrated collection, I find the expression "residuary sovereignty of the States," as distinguished from a complete and undiminished sovereignty, used in three several numbers, (Nos. 39, 43, 62,) all written by Mr. Madison, whose guidance, I confess, I always follow with peculiar confidence; for no man, from the relation in which he stands to the constitution, can be supposed to be more thoroughly imbued with its true philosophy. It is a remarkable circumstance, as evincing the unvarying fidelity of Mr. Madison's mind to this fundamental truth of a partial surrender of sovereignty by the States, that at the distance of more than ten years from the publication of the Federalist, in his celebrated report of the Virginia Legislature of '99, he again uses the same form of expression—"the residuary sovereignty of the States."

Sir, that report, in recognising, as it does in express terms, "the sovereignty of the United States," as well as in attributing to the several States a residuary sovereignty only, shows that the idea of an absolute and undiminished sovereignty still remaining in the States was as little entertained by the fathers of the political church, from which the Senator from South Carolina professes to derive his tenets, as by the founders and original advocates of the constitution. In further illustration of this point, since Virginia authority has grown very much into vogue, I may be permitted to refer to the address of the Legislature of Virginia to the people of the State, which accompanied the famous resolution of '98. In that address, generally supposed to be the production of John Taylor, of Caroline, as thorough-going a champion of State rights as the Senator from South Carolina could desire, we find the following declaration: "It was then admitted that the State sovereignties were only diminished by powers specifically enumerated, or necessary to carry the specified powers into effect;" thus acknowledging, of course, that, to that extent, the State sovereignties had been diminished.

Sir, I claim myself to be an humble but devoted disciple of this good old school of '98 and '99, and I might speak, if it were proper to do so, of some little opportunity I have enjoyed of being instructed in its doctrines by the great men who were its teachers and founders. I cherish their doctrines, sir, as I do their fame, with reverence; and I will adhere to them with my latest breath. But as I believe in and value those doctrines, I utterly reject the spurious interpolations which have been attempted upon them by modern scholiasts and commentators.

The republicans of '98 and '99, Mr. President, never contended that the States retained, under the constitution, an absolute and undiminished sovereignty; that they still possessed what they had given up; that the whole was not diminished by the subtraction of a part. But they contended that all the sovereignty which had not been voluntarily surrendered to the Union was inviolably reserved to the States; that the States are sovereign within their several spheres, as the Union is in the sphere marked out to it; and that the harmony of the whole system is only to be preserved by each power revolving in its proper orbit. It was reserved for modern times to assert that eccentric and lawless State sovereignty, which "shoots madly from its sphere," to arrest the movements, and to nullify the acts of the federal authority.

The honorable Senator from South Carolina, while admitting, in one part of his remarks, that the people of the States had delegated a portion of their sovereignty to be exercised through the General Government, said, that to delegate, however, was not to part with; that, as between principal and agent, the delegated power might, at any time, be resumed; and that, consequently, the people of the several States might, at their pleasure, resume the powers they had granted to the General Government. Now, sir, while I will not deny the truth of the general proposition, that, as between principal and agent, the principal may at any time resume the powers which he has granted, I do utterly deny the application of it which has been made by the gentleman from South Carolina. In the first place, this is not merely a question between the people of South Carolina and the common agent of the States, the General Government; but it is a question deeply involving the rights and interests of third parties, to wit, the other States. But if it were purely a question between South Carolina and the General Government, South Carolina alone could not resume the powers which had been granted to the latter. She is but one out of twenty-four principals, who jointly granted these powers; and she can no more, so far as constitutional right is concerned, by her single act, resume the powers thus jointly granted, than an individual citizen of a State can resume the powers jointly granted by himself and the rest of the society to their State Government. Gentlemen seem to confound the relation in which the people of a State stand to the Government of the United States with that in which they stand to their own State Government. The people of South Carolina may at any time resume or modify the powers they have granted to their State Government, because, in relation to that, they form the entire delegating body; but, in relation to the Government of the United States, they are but one twenty-fourth part of the delegating body, three-fourths of which are, by the express terms of the compact, required to make any alteration in the Government.

Mr. CALHOUN here said that he had been misapprehended by the Senator from Virginia; that he had not said that the people of a State might resume the powers which had been granted to the General Government, but that they had a right to judge of the extent of those powers, and whether they had been exceeded.

Mr. RIVES continued: It was more probable that the honorable Senator, amid the diversity of new doctrines which had been broached, had forgotten all that he had said. The Senator from South Carolina certainly did contend that the people of a State might resume the powers which they had granted to the General Government; and in this I am sustained not only by my own recollection, but by the printed report of his remarks, which seems to have been very carefully prepared, and, I presume, under his own eye.

Mr. CALHOUN again explained: He had contended that if a State should resume the powers granted to the General Government, such resumption would only be a breach of compact, for which the State, as a community, would be responsible, and not its citizens individually.

Mr. RIVES replied: If, Mr. President, it be admitted that an attempt, on the part of a State, to resume the powers granted by it and the other States to the General Government would be a breach of compact, then it necessarily follows that no State has a right, under the constitution, to make such resumption. In other words, no State can have a constitutional right to break the constitution. In regard to the effect of such an unconstitutional act of a State, in reference to the obligations of its citizens to the Union, I shall presently show that it cannot in any manner disturb the regular action of the General Government on individuals.

But, before I do so, permit me to remark here again upon that confounding of things entirely distinct in their natures, of which we have had so many examples in the course of this discussion. I could not but observe, the other day, that the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BRAN,] in developing the principles of the Senator from South Carolina, had appealed to the Declaration of Independence, in support of the right of the people of a State to resume the powers granted to the General Government. Now, sir, does not the source from which the honorable Senator derived this right fix its true character as being revolutionary, and not constitutional? What, sir, was the Declaration of Independence? Was it not a declaration of natural, not of conventional rights; of revolutionary, not of constitutional remedies; of remedies not founded on or consistent with the continuance of the constitution, but springing into existence from such a fundamental violation of its guaranties, as to amount to a virtual dissolution of Government? Sir, I should be the last man to deny or to impair that sacred right of resistance to oppression which is consecrated by the Declaration of Independence—the right of every people, whenever their Government shall prove destructive of those great ends for which all government was instituted, “to throw off such Government, and to provide new guards for their future security.” But, sir, this is not the ground on which South Carolina has placed herself. She seeks to throw off, not the Government, but the obligations it imposes; to enjoy its protection, but to yield it no obedience; to participate in all its benefits, but bear no share of its burdens. And all these contradictions are to be reconciled by the talismanic interposition of State sovereignty!

Now, sir, let us see how this is to be done. The argument of the gentleman from South Carolina is this: that as the citizen was originally bound to obedience to the General Government by the act of his State, in its sovereign capacity, a like act of his State may release him from that obligation; that if the act of a State, absolving its citizens from obedience to a law of the United States, should be a breach of the compact with the other States, it is the State alone which is responsible; and that there is, thenceforward, no right on the part of the General Government to execute the law by acting on the individual citizens of the State. Sir, this argument is plainly founded on a total misconception of the nature of our present political system, and of the characteristic differences between it and the articles of confederation. From the moment of the adoption of the present constitution, a direct relation is created between the Government of the United States and the citizen. The authorities of the Union no longer act through the States by requisition, as under the articles of confederation, but directly on persons and things, by its own laws. The great object of the change of system was to render the Government of the Union entirely independent of the action of States, in the performance of its high constitutional functions. For this purpose it was not only invested with the power of making laws, but of executing them, by regular judicial and executive organs, and by the physical force of the country also, if need be; for it will not be forgotten that, among the powers expressly vested in Congress, is that of “providing for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union.” To mark still more unequivocally the intention of the new constitution to place the Government of the Union, in the exercise of its powers, above the control of individual States, it is expressly declared that the “constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, &c. shall be the supreme law of the land, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.”

Now, sir, would not all these characteristic features of the new constitution be utterly effaced by the doctrine of the gentleman from South Carolina? and should we not be brought back by it at once to the fatal weakness and inefficiency of the articles of confederation? Would not the Government be superseded in its direct and authoritative action on individuals, the vital principle of the present constitution? Would not its laws become mere requisitions, subject at any time to be defeated or arrested at the will of a State? Would it not, in short, lose every characteristic property of government, and become a mere league? Such, sir, are the inevitable effect and fatal tendency of the doctrines now broached—to subvert, by refined constructions, the present constitution of the United States, and to set up again in its place the abandoned articles of confederation.

Do we not already, Mr. President, hear the constitution of the United States, in various quarters, and in the gravest manner, denominated a league; a treaty of alliance and confederation? It was with great regret, sir, that I heard my worthy and honorable colleague, [Mr. TYLER,] the other day, call it in express terms a league, and insist upon the close resemblance and identity, in many respects, which he supposed to exist between it and the articles of confederation. Sir, to me the two systems are as opposite as light and darkness. The articles of confederation were a true league, constituting a common consultative body for all the States, but depending entirely on the sovereign will and pleasure of each State for the execution of its measures. The present constitution creates a Government—a Government, it is true, resting on compact between the States, and limited by the terms of that compact; but still, to the extent of its granted powers, possessing all the means and organs of efficient action, as completely as any other Government under the sun. Compare the two instruments, sir, and their very form admonishes you at once of this radical difference. The one is, in form as in substance, a treaty, by which “the States severally enter into a firm league of friendship with each other.” The other is, “a constitution, ordained and established by the people of the United States.” It is true that you will find, in the articles of confederation, an enumeration of many of the powers which are vested by the present constitution in the Congress of the United States. But, sir, the great power, the vital power of carrying these powers into effect, was wholly wanting. The measures of the old Congress were addressed to the States, and depended for their effect on the action of the States. It was the principle of legislation for political communities, and not for the individuals of which they are composed, that constituted the radical vice, and led to the total and melancholy failure of the articles of confederation. The great object of the new constitution was to correct that fatal defect, and to extend the authority of the Union directly to the persons of individuals. The difference, in this respect alone, between the two systems, makes a perfect contract running through all their operations and results.

Revenue Collection Bill.

Gentlemen would do well to refresh their historical recollections a little on this subject. Have they forgotten that melancholy picture of embarrassment, humiliation, and distress, every where exhibited in this country, in the interval between the close of our revolutionary struggle and the adoption of the present constitution, all resulting from the fatal inefficiency of the articles of confederation? Our most sacred engagements with foreign nations, as well as with our own citizens, unfulfilled; theirs with us consequently unperformed; the requisitions of Congress upon the States regarded "as the idle wind;" the non-compliance of one State an example for the refusal of another; commerce paralyzed for the want of uniform regulation; credit, public and private, extinguished; industry languishing; every thing, in short, tending to anarchy and confusion; and, in one part of the Union, the banner of rebellion and defiance to the laws openly unfurled? From all these calamities and disasters we were happily rescued by the adoption of our present constitution. Would gentlemen, by construing away all its vital energies, "its whole constitutional vigor," to use the expression of Mr. Jefferson, convert it back into those inefficient articles of confederation for which it was substituted, and thus renew the reign of anarchy and of public and private distress which attended that ill-fated system?

There was another observation of my honorable colleague, founded, as it seems to me, in the same erroneous view of our system, from which, in all kindness and respect, I am compelled to express my dissent. He adverted to the instructions given to the delegates of the States in convention "to revise the articles of confederation," not to abolish them, as a proper guide in determining the character and operation of the present constitution. But, sir, it appears to me, that so far as the true character of the constitution is concerned, the inquiry is not what the delegates in convention were instructed to do, but what they actually did, and what the people of the United States gave their assent to by their subsequent ratifications? The members of the convention, from high considerations suggested by the deranged and critical state of the country, may have felt themselves justified in exceeding their instructions; and yet their work, when subsequently sanctioned by the adoption of the people, would not be the less legitimate and valid. Every thing depended upon the voice of the people, to whom the constitution was submitted for ratification. If they should disapprove it, though it might be in exact pursuance of instructions, the work would be of no effect. If, on the other hand, though departing from instructions, it should be approved by the people, that high approval would blot out all antecedent irregularities.

The true question always is, not what project of a convention may have been originally contemplated by this or that State, or brought forward by any member of the convention; but what constitution was actually adopted by the States? It is that constitution, the people's constitution, and not the project of Luther Martin, of Mr. Paterson, or of any other member of the convention, which we have sworn to support.

The true character of that constitution depends on the sense in which it was understood and accepted by the people of the States at the time of its adoption; and that, again, as Mr. Jefferson so forcibly remarked in his letter to Mr. Gerry, on the sense in which it was explained and advocated by its friends. It is in this view that the papers of the Federalist are entitled to greater weight in fixing the true construction of the constitution, than any other commentary whatever; for it was in reference to the explanations given by it of the new system of government proposed, that the public mind throughout the United States formed its judgment in the final adoption of the constitution.

Now, sir, in regard to this matter of instructions, it was distinctly admitted by the writers of the Federalist, and other friends of the constitution, that the convention had, in some respects, departed from their instructions. But still the departure was more in form than substance. Their authority, it is true, was "to revise the articles of confederation, and to propose alterations and further provisions therein;" but the purpose of that revision was expressly declared to be, to render "the federal constitution adequate to the exigencies of government and the preservation of the Union." These were the great objects to be kept constantly in view by the convention, and should never be lost sight of by us in our interpretations of their work. If, to accomplish these objects, it was found necessary to propose an entirely new system, the departure from the letter of the instructions in this respect was but a sacrifice of form to substance; a preference of the end to the means.

Sir, the great end of the assembling of the convention, that which was called for by the universal voice, was an efficient Government; an institution "adequate to the exigencies of government and the preservation of the Union."

Sir, if it were not for the great sensitiveness which has been discovered of late in regard to the term "national," I might remind gentlemen that in the resolution of the old Congress under which the convention assembled, the object of its labors was expressly stated to be the establishment of "a firm national Government." I am very far, Mr. President, from saying that the Government actually established is a national one, in the sense which is now generally attached to that term. But, sir, I cannot, in compliance with the temper and fashion of the times, so far renounce the ideas and language which, till lately, were universally familiar to the American mind, as to say that this Government has no national features. Sir, though federal in its basis and principal relations, it does possess some national features, and those of an important character. In the very relation involved in this discussion, the operation of the Government in the execution of its powers, it is national, not federal. The fundamental distinction between a federal and national Government, in this respect, is, that the former operates on the States composing the confederacy, in their political capacities; while the latter operates directly on the individual citizens. In this respect no one can deny that the present Government of the United States is strictly national. In the representation of the people, in the other branch of the Legislature, the Government is also clearly national; while in the representation of the States in this branch, and in other important respects, particularly the foundation on which it stands, of compact between the States, and the limited extent of its powers for special purposes, it is decidedly federal. But, sir, on this subject I will only refer gentlemen to a well known number of the Federalist, [the 39th,] written by Mr. Madison, where they will find a thorough analysis of the Government in all its relations, and where it is clearly shown that it is neither wholly federal nor wholly national, but a composition of both. Sir, no construction of the constitution can be a sound one, or lead to results just in theory or safe in practice, which does not keep steadily in view this mixed character of the Government, and look as well to its national as to its federal features.

I have been led, Mr. President, into this digression on the general character of our present political system, as distinguished from the articles of confederation, to which it is said to bear so close an affinity, because I do firmly believe, that if the doctrines now contended for shall prevail, as complete a subversion of our existing institutions will have been effected, practically, as if the constitution of the United States were formally abolished, and the articles of confederation again established! Is not the distinguishing feature, the vital principle, of the present constitution, the power which it vests in the Government of executing its laws by a direct action on individuals? But it is contended that the Government of the Union may at any time be superseded in this direct action on individuals, for the purpose of executing its laws, by the interposition of a State declaring a law of the United States to be null and void. If this be so, is it not obvious that the Government of the Union is, at once, reduced again to that dependence on the authorities of the individual States, in the performance of its constitutional functions, which it was notoriously the chief object of the present constitution to avoid and remedy?

That the interposition of a State, acting in her sovereign capacity through a convention of the people, as in the case of South Carolina, is of no more avail to arrest the execution of the laws of the United States than an interposition in her ordinary political capacity, is apparent from the language of that clause of the constitution which asserts the supremacy of the constitution and laws of the United States, "any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." The constitution of a State is always the act of a State in her highest sovereign capacity; and if it can oppose no obstacle to the laws of the Union, as is here declared, it follows that neither the sovereign nor the legislative interposition of a State is sufficient, under the constitution, to defeat a law of the United States.

If any thing further were wanting to show that the interposition of a State cannot, under the constitution, absolve the citizen from his obligations to the Union, conclusive proof is furnished by the rejection of the amendment proposed in the convention by Mr. Luther Martin, which was brought to the view of the Senate, a few days since, by the honorable Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON.] Mr. Martin, with the express view, as he tells us, of securing the citizens of the respective States against the effects of their responsibility to the United States, where, in obedience to the authority of their own State, they should oppose the laws of the Union, submitted a proposition in the following words, as an amendment to the article in the constitution concerning treason: "Provided that no act or acts done by one or more of the States against the United States, or by any citizen of any one of the United States, under the authority of any one or more of the said States, shall be deemed treason, or punished as such," &c. This proposition, sir, was rejected; and the inference drawn from the fact by Mr. Martin is irresistible, that it was intended to preserve the constitutional authority of the Union, over the citizens of the United States, in full force and effect, whatever might be done or enjoined by a State to the contrary.

But among the new constitutional theories to which the controversies of the times have given birth, it seems to be now gravely contended that there is no such thing as a citizen of the United States; that it is only as citizens of a particular State, and in virtue of their allegiance to that State, that the people of this country are under any obligations of obedience to the Government of the Union.

Mr. TYLER here said that he had not asserted that there was no such thing as a citizen of the United States. He had asked, who had ever seen a citizen of the Government of the United States?

Mr. RIVES resumed. My honorable friend will perceive that this is but an evasion, not a solution of the difficulty. Who, sir, has ever seen a citizen of the Government of Virginia? There is no more a citizen of the Government of Virginia than there is a citizen of the Government of the United States.

The relation of allegiance, sir, is not between citizen and Government; it is between citizen and sovereign. It is the whole body of the community which is, with us, the sovereign; and it is to that sovereign that allegiance is due. Now, sir, I have already shown that the United States, for certain purposes, do form one great political community, in which the sovereignty of the Union resides, just as the sovereignty of the respective States resides in the people of each State separately considered. It is to the United States, then, in their sovereign character, and not to the Government of the United States, that allegiance is due. That there is a direct relation of allegiance between the United States and the citizens of this country, so far as the objects of the Union are concerned, is sufficiently manifested, not only by what is intrinsically implied in the term "citizen of the United States," which is frequently used in the constitution, but by the fact that the constitution provides for the punishment of treason against the United States." Treason is essentially the breach of the allegiance due to the sovereign power against which it is committed. There is, then, a direct allegiance due from the people of this country to the United States, as citizens of the United States, to the extent of the sovereignty which, for special purposes, resides in the Union. We are, at the same time, citizens of our respective States; and, as such, we owe allegiance, each one to his own State, to the full extent of the sovereignty abiding in the States severally. To each power we owe allegiance, within the limits of their respective sovereignties; to neither beyond.

But, sir, it is said that allegiance and protection are reciprocal, and that as our protection in all the most interesting relations of life is derived from our respective States, to them our allegiance is exclusively due. It has been contended that we derive no protection from the United States, except when we are on the ocean, or in foreign countries, beyond the limits of the States. If this were so, still it would be something that we are efficiently protected by the strong arm of the Union, where the States are powerless to protect. But, sir, is it true that we receive no protection from the United States, while we remain within the limits of the country? Do not the United States, on the contrary, protect us even against the arbitrary and unjust legislation of our own States, in declaring, as the constitution declares, that "no State shall pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts?" Is it not the United States which, through the medium of the judicial power, secures to us an impartial administration of justice in all controversies with citizens of other States or foreigners? Is it not the United States, again, which secures to us the privileges and immunities of citizens in the other States? What power is it that protects us in the enjoyment of our most inestimable political rights; which guaranties to us the blessings of a "republican form of government," which defends us against the excesses of "domestic violence" and faction, as well as the calamities of hostile "invasion?" Is it not this same despised United States? Sir, wherever we are, at home or abroad, on the bosom of the ocean, or by the tranquil fireside, whether danger threaten us in our civil, political, or international relations, the broad ægis of the Union is over us, and covers us with its ample protection. Let it not be said, then, that we derive no protection from the United States, which might merit some small return of allegiance. Sir, proud as I am of the title of citizen of Virginia, grateful as I am for the unmerited favor which that honored mother has shown to me, I yet feel, with the father of the country, that "the just pride of patriotism is exalted" by the more comprehensive title of citizen of the United States; that title which gives me a share in the common inheritance of glory which has descended to us from our revolutionary sages, patriots, and heroes; that title which enables me to claim the names of the Rutledges, the Pinckneys, and the Sumpters of South Carolina, of the Hancocks, the Adamases, and the Otises of Massachusetts, and all the other proud names which have illustrated the annals of each and all these States, as "compatriot with my own."

I have thus, Mr. President, reviewed the fundamental tenets of that new school of constitutional law which has sprung up within the last four or five eventful years of our political history. I have endeavored to show that they have no foundation whatever in any just view of the constitution; that they are directly at war with the contemporary understanding and expositions of its founders; and that they derive no countenance whatever from the principles of that genuine republican school, which re-established the constitution in its purity, after the temporary perversions to which it had been subjected. These modern doctrines, I do firmly believe, are, in their tendency, utterly subversive of that happy system of government, the preservation of which is not only the sole security for liberty with us, but the last hope of freedom throughout the world. If, in the depth of these convictions, I shall have fallen into a warmer tone of discussion than is my habit, it will be attributed, I trust, to its true cause, and not to any want of proper respect or kind feeling towards the members, one and all, of this body.

Sir, we live in times when it is a solemn duty which every man owes his country, to speak his opinions without disguise or equivocation, even at the risk of giving offence to some of those whom it would be his greatest pleasure, as well as his highest ambition, to content in all things. I have been already admonished, sir, that a sword is at this moment suspended over my head, which may descend and sever the worthless thread of my political existence for the act of public duty I am now performing. Sir, if it should be so, I shall have at least one consolation—the consciousness of having fallen in defence of the constitution of my country, and of that liberty which is indissolubly connected with it.

Sir, I take leave to say, that there breathes not the man who is more devoted than I am to the maintenance of the just rights of the States. It is in that faith that I was brought up, and in that faith I shall continue to the last. It is in the salutary influence and power of the States, under distinct and organized forms of action, and the wise partition of power established between them and the authorities of the Union, that our system possesses guaranties and advantages unknown to any other which ever existed. Sir, the gentlemen who have claimed to be the special champions of State rights here, appear to have a much more limited idea of those rights than I have. They speak of State rights as if they consisted exclusively in the right of opposing acts of the General Government. But, sir, according to my notion of them, they comprehend all rights of political power whatever, not delegated to the United States; all such being expressly reserved by the constitution to the respective States.

But, it is asked, where is the security for these rights? In the first place, the constitution evidently intended to provide, in the organization of the General Government itself, important securities against encroachments on the reserved powers of the States. This body itself, representing, as it does, the States in their co-equal and sovereign characters, was especially intended to guard the rights of the States against invasion from the federal authority. Elected as its members are, by the Legislatures of the States, and responsible to them, it could not be doubted that they would be animated with a watchful and jealous sensibility to the rights of their constituents. One-half of the States, as represented in this body, though
